It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Amendment of the Constitution.

The House, on motion of Mr. McDUFFIE, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, in the chair, on the resolutions for the amendment of the constitution.

Mr. BRYAN addressed the committee as follows:

Mr. Chairman: I regret that, to the other disadvantages under which I labor in addressing the committee in this stage of the debate, that of bodily indisposition should be added; but as I have the privilege of the floor to-day, I am determined to exercise it.

I am not desirous to impose upon this committee a general essay upon the constitution; but I confess, sir, I am solicitous to explain the reasons of my vote, and willing to assume all the just responsibilities of my station. In doing this, as briefly as I can, I may be permitted to regret my political inexperience, and want of constitutional learning; but, sir, I derive some consolation from the belief, that, if I am inexperienced, I am also unprejudiced. I have not been reared at the feet of any political Gamaliel; my opinions of men and measures, erroneous though they may be, are my own; they have not been assumed by compact, and therefore, sir, I feel myself at liberty to correct and amend them as experience may dictate. Upon the subject of this constitutional reformation, I have earnestly endeavored to discover the true meaning and spirit of the constitution, and am sincerely desirous to carry these into full and complete effect. God forbid that I should ever be so weak or so wicked as to displace one stone of this hallowed temple where liberty delights to dwell, for any other purpose than to secure her permanent abode. I most solemnly assure the committee, that, if I could be impelled by other motives—more especially, sir, if I should attempt to unfix a column to promote party views or individual aggrandizement, I should deem myself an imitator—yes, sir, a humble imitator of the wretch who applied the torch of destruction to the Ephesian temple to gain an execrable immortality.

It would be a vain regret, sir, to express my sorrow, that I cannot spread before the committee the rich classical repast with which they have been so sumptuously regaled by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. EVERETT.) It has not been my lot, like him, to breathe the inspiring zephyrs of the land of Homer; I have not had my imagination fired, and my heart exhilarated and ennobled by treading the plains of Marathon and Platea; I have not mused amid the ruins of Athens, and gathered lessons of political wisdom from the silent, but impressive memorials of her departed greatness; nor has fair science, "rich with the spoils of time," unfolded to me those secret treasures which she could not conceal from that honorable gentleman.

I come not here, sir, from the Lyceum or the Portico; I come, sir, from the court-yards and cotton-fields of North Carolina; and I come, sir, to proclaim the wishes and assert the rights of the people I have the honor to represent. My life, sir, has been spent among the people of my native State; the most valued part of my political information has been derived from association and converse with my fellow-citizens. I know their wants, and I feel them too; I know, sir, that they wish to participate in the election of the Chief Magistrate of this Union, and that they are dissatisfied with the present mode of expressing their voice—if expression it may be called.

In endeavoring to reply to the argument of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, I hope he will do me the justice to believe that I do so in a spirit of kindness and respect. I should do violence to my own feelings were I to act otherwise; for, although I differ from him materially on some points, yet, when I can agree with him, I do so with lively satisfaction. He has told us, sir, that it would be unconstitutional to make these amendments. Unconstitutional! sir. This assertion is certainly contradictory to experience—to the constitution itself; and the argument seems to move in a circle. We know, sir, that amendments have been made; that one of these, the amendment of 1804, by confining the choice of the States, when the election devolves upon the House of Representatives, to three, instead of the five highest on the list of those voted for by the electors, has made a material change; it impaired too, sir, a federative power, and increased a popular one. Suppose, sir, that it should be necessary to vest in the General Government powers which an emergency might render essential for the preservation of the Union. Cases might occur which I do not even wish to imagine. Must these powers be usurped at the hazard of revolution and bloodshed? Must we sit here like the Roman Senate—quietly fold our arms, and await our destruction with dignity? or must we not rather apply for these powers in the mode prescribed by the constitution? Our ancestors well knew that they could not pierce the veil of futurity, and provide for events beyond the ken of mortal wisdom. They provided a remedy, sir, for evils which might be disclosed by experience and practice; and they provided a security against amendments proposed from “light and transient causes” by the mode in which alone they can be effected. The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts has sought to draw an argument in support of his position from the proviso of the fifth article of the constitution, “that no amendment which may be made prior to the year 1808, shall in any manner affect the first and fourth clauses in the ninth section of the first article; and that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate.” Now, sir, to my mind, this clause, so far from helping his argument, militates most strongly against it; it indicates, to my understanding, that this special exception was necessary to exempt from amendment, for a limited time, the first and fourth clauses mentioned in it, and to confine any amendment of the federative feature in the Senate, which should deprive a State of its equal right, to the special case of the States consenting to it. I should, therefore, sir, most strongly infer, according to a very old and sound rule of construction, that the power of amendment in other cases, was to be inferred. Self-preservation is the primary law of societies, as well as of individuals, and, if necessary, we must act upon it.

- The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts seems to think that the powers of the President have been greatly magnified by my honorable friend from South Carolina, (Mr. McDuffrie;) he deems them very limited, and not the proper object of much jealousy. I can assure him, sir, that he thinks very differently from the fathers of the revolution, and the framers of this constitution, and the States who adopted it. The powers of this executive chief excited very lively apprehensions in the bosoms of some of the purest and wisest of our forefathers. Some thought they had an “awful squinting” at monarchy—they imagined that they could discern “the diadem sparkling on his brow, and the imperial purple flowing in his train.” And how, sir, did the advocates of the constitution endeavor to lull these apprehensions? Not, sir, as that honorable gentleman has done, by endeavoring to persuade the people that his powers were not great; but that they were necessary to give proper consistency and strength to the system—that he was properly checked by the other departments—that he was elected for short periods, and liable to impeachment—but, above all, that he was dependent upon the people. Let us examine, sir, a few of his constitutional attributes. He is the representative of his country, among the nations of the earth. He originates treaties, and, with the advice of the Senate, confirms them; and they are the supreme law of the land. It is his prerogative to receive ambassadors, and with the advice of the Senate, to send them. He is Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States. His qualified veto gives him an important agency in legislation itself. He can elevate to offices of the greatest dignity and emolument. His patronage embraces the distribution of millions. He operates upon the hopes and fears of thousands. Although he has not the constitutional power of making war, yet by means of his other powers he can at any time place his country in a beligerent state. Suppose he should refuse to receive the British or French ambassador, or send him home with contumely and insult. Suppose, under the act for the suppression of the slave trade, he should order our cruisers to capture vessels in the Mediterranean, or upon some unfounded suspicions. Indeed, sir, many cases might be supposed, when, by an undue exercise of a constitutional power, he might draw upon us the anger of a foreign nation. But, says the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, the King of Great Britain can elevate to the peerage the humblest individual, and ennoble him and his posterity. Indeed, sir, he seemed to describe the dazzling honors of a coronet with so much rapture, that those who did not know him might have suspected that, during his residence abroad, he had conceived an affection for what Chatham could not refuse.

Before I dismiss this brief examination, sir, lest I should be mistaken, I will take the liberty to say, that, although I believe the powers of the President to be great, yet I believe them to be necessary for the safety of the Republic. What the jealous statesmen of the revolution, with Washington at their head, have given, I will not presume to impair. The stress or intent of my argument, sir, is to show, that the greater power, the greater necessity that the due dependency on the people should be preserved.

Amendment of the Constitution.

[H. OF R.]

I will admit, sir, that, before any amendment is adopted, its adaptation to the genius and spirit of the Government ought to be satisfactorily ascertained; for it is obvious that maxims and political reasons, which would justly be entitled to great weight when applied to a consolidated Government, one and indivisible, such as Britain, or any of the ancient Republics, would be inapplicable to a Government compounded as ours is, of national and federative features. They too often serve to create false analogies, and lead us astray from the true points of inquiry. The checks and balances of the British Constitution are contrived and intended to protect and preserve the King, Lords, and Commons, who are all integral parts of the same State—different classes of the same political society. The checks and balances of our constitution are intended to protect the Union, the States, and the people. The States, according to the theory of our constitution, are independent members of a Confederacy, and are, themselves, in many respects, sovereign. We must, therefore, always keep in our mind's eye, this leading and animating principle, when we sit in judgment upon this great work of our fathers. In all human affairs, "self-love, the spring of action, moves the soul." This principle is ever active and vigilant, and may be relied upon as a faithful sentinel for its own preservation.

The framers of the constitution well knew that the States were the best guardians of State rights—the people of popular rights; it was only necessary, therefore, to give them, respectively, in this form of government, adequate power, and their self-love and interest might be relied upon, for their exercise and preservation: if this could be done, and the political machine which was to be moved by these powers so adjusted, that they should have a harmonious and salutary action, the grand object of all government was attained—they had then a self-creating political movement, whose object was the happiness of the governed. It would be collateral, Mr. Chairman, to the present inquiry, and would also be presumptuous in me to attempt to point out to the committee the many indications of these mixed principles. The subject before us regards solely the constitution of the President and Vice President. Was it to be supposed that they should lose sight of these controlling principles in the mode of appointing this great officer—the Executive Chief of the confederated Republic—whose constitutional action was to have so important, so pervading an influence in the character of the Government—the policy and the destiny of the nation? No, sir, it was not to be expected, nor has it so occurred. The constitution declares that "each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in Congress," &c. It then proceeds to direct that they shall meet in their respective States, and ballot for President and Vice President, and point out the mode of conducting the election by the Electoral Colleges.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the constitution here, by the word "State," means the Commonwealth—the political society—the people, or at least that portion of them who exercise the elective franchise; and therefore, that, whenever the State Legislatures have exercised the power of appointing the electors, instead of simply directing the mode in which the State should appoint them, they have violated the rights of the people. It would have been very easy, if the power was intended to be given to the Legislatures, to have used expressions plainly indicative of such an intent—and the inference that they would have done so, is rendered to my mind irresistible, by recurring to the first clause of the third section, which prescribes the mode of electing Senators. The expression there is, "The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof," &c. But the honorable gentleman from Virginia, the second from that State who spoke in this debate, (Mr. STEVENSON,) contends, and his argument is supported by the honorable gentleman who immediately preceded me, (Mr. EVERETT,) that it is not only constitutional for the Legislatures to exercise this power of appointing the electors, but that it was even expected they would do so. Sir, I do most conscientiously differ from these gentlemen, and I will endeavor, by the indulgence of the committee, to show that, if the contemporary exposition of this part of the constitution, by its advocates, is to be relied upon, that it was not so understood and explained. If Hamilton and Madison, combined, and agreeing upon this point, are entitled to credit, it was intended that the people should exercise this power of appointment.

I refer, sir, to the "Federalist," a series of essays written before the adoption of the constitution, by Madison, Hamilton, and Jay, for the purpose of explaining and recommending it to the people of the United States, and which is now resorted to, by all parties, as the ablest and most authoritative exposition of its true intent and meaning. In No. LXVIII., Hamilton, speaking of the mode of electing the President, says, "It was desirable that the sense of the people should operate in the choice of the person to whom so important a trust was to be confided. This end will be answered by committing the right of making it, not to any pre-established body, but to men (electors) chosen by the people, for the special purpose, and at the particular conjuncture." "A small number of persons (electors) chosen by their fellow-citizens from the general mass, will be most likely to possess the information and discernment requisite to so complicated an investigation." The language of Mr. Madison, in the Convention of Virginia, which assembled in 1788, for the purpose of considering whether they should adopt this constitution, is equally, or more, clear and explicit. Instead of the people's voting immediately for President, which he thought the population and extent of our territory might render impracticable: "instead of this, (immediate suffrage,) the people choose the electors—this can be done with ease and convenience, and the choices will be more select." If we examine the debates of this Convention, we shall find that it was so understood, also, by those who opposed the constitution. This meaning was assumed as the basis of argument on both sides; and, if we reflect a moment on the very many able men who sat in that Convention, it would be most violent presumption to say, they were mistaken, with all their talents and all their lights.

If we assume, then, that this was the intention of the constitution, let us see what has been its operation. Have the people chosen the electors? I ask this question, Mr. Chairman, in the name of my constituents, and I wish an explicit answer. From the omission in the constitution to prescribe a specific mode, (which I think I shall be able to show, if my strength will permit, was done intentionally and wisely,)—from this omission, I say, sir, a great latitude of construction, and a great diversity of practice, has originated. In some States the Legislatures appoint—in some the general ticket system prevails—in some few the district system—and in others a compound of some two or all of these modes. My honorable friend from South Carolina, (Mr. McDUFFIE,) has depicted the mischiefs of this confused and unsettled system, in such strong and glowing colors, that I cannot presume to add any thing to their effect. It is true, sir, that, by the present mode, combinations may be, and have been, formed, which have prevented a fair expression of the popular will. The people are called upon to vote a ticket, (under the general ticket system,) containing 15, 24, or 36 names—to vote for, to choose persons, of whom they may never have heard before—of whose qualifications they have never had an opportunity of judging—whose integrity has never been tested—and if this ticket had dropped from the clouds, they must take it or lose their vote. Call you this choice, sir? I have always thought, sir, that choice involved selection of one or more from others—"from the general mass"—that it involved knowledge, comparison, voluntary preference, and was a right of more or less value, according to the importance of its object. What temptation and opportunity is presented by this system, for intrigue and management! What apathy and indifference are manifested by the people, for such a feeble and dubious exercise of this great constitutional privilege! Even under the excitement of the late election, how many neglected the exercise of this right! And, should it not be, sir, the policy of every wise Government to interest its citizens in its organization? Under the present system, how many worthy citizens remain at home, under the paralyzing influence of the conviction that they can do no good—that the election is in the hands of the cunning few, and that it is a mere mockery for them singly—without concert; without the animation derived from a prospect of success, to pretend to withstand the disciplined cohorts opposed to them. This lethargy is almost worse than faction itself. It is more secret—more insidious in its approaches. It disguises itself under the name of moderation, and aversion to debate and strife, when it too often proceeds from a criminal indifference to those rights which our ancestors bled and died to secure. They are men of business—they can't lose the chance of turning a penny to promote any public measure. It would seem, sir, as if some of them had taken, in earnest, the sarcastic advice of the Roman satirist—

"Virtus post nummos."

Let any man look abroad—through the Union, I mean, and deny, if he can, that this is a faithful picture. Surely, sir, it requires no prophetic voice to warn us against so dangerous a delusion. Surely, sir, we will spare a little time to listen to the "Farewell Address" of the Father of his Country.

I admit, sir, that it is not sufficient to show the existence of an evil unless it can be remedied, either wholly or partially—but, I insist, sir, that the adoption of the District System, as proposed by the good old State I have the honor, in part, to represent, so inadequately—and a direct vote, in Districts, for President and Vice President, will cure the most alarming of these evils. The constitution, by interposing the electoral colleges, undoubtedly intended that they should exercise a sound discretion in the choice of a President—they were "to analyze his qualifications, and judiciously combine motives of choice." Fed. No. 68. But, sir, the people of this country, as has been shown in this debate, and elsewhere, have not been content with simply the right of originating the colleges, even when committed to them by their State Legislatures—they have always required a pledge, or some evidence, of the elector or electors, for whom they intended to give their ultimate vote, before they would give their vote to him or them. Here, then, sir, the intention of the constitution has been manifestly defeated—this seems to be a case in which experience suggests amendment. The people, sir, although they will hear argument and reason, yet will finally judge for themselves. But even here I would lay my hands on this venerated instrument with great reluctance. The pure and enlightened views of its framers plead strongly in its behalf; and although we may not now discover the evils which may result from the change, yet time—time and casualty may disclose them. But, sir, as I believe that the design of its framers has been defeated, I would hazard this amendment.

MARCH, 1826.]

Amendment of the Constitution.

[H. OF R.]

It would have, sir, I think, the effect of rousing the people from their torpid quietism; it will make them feel that their voice is heard—that their vote is felt; and the voting directly and immediately for the man of their choice, will of itself be productive of a lively satisfaction. They will then know that their vote is given as they wished it should be, and is beyond the control of any political legerdemain. They will not be agitated by the merits of the several electoral candidates, but their eye will repose singly on the man of their ultimate choice. I understand a case has occurred in Maryland, where there were two electoral candidates for the same Presidential candidate, and one for another Presidential candidate, and, although the district gave a large majority for the Presidential candidate who had two friends as electoral candidates, yet the third candidate obtained the greatest plurality, and thus the vote of the district was given to that candidate for the Presidency, against whom there was a large majority. This cannot happen when the people vote directly for the President. An honorable gentleman from New York, (Mr. STORZ,) has asked those who contend for this expression of the popular will in this mode—why not extend the principle? and has alluded to a species of population which, without being citizens, is counted in estimating the ratio of representation from the Southern States. Sir, if he had shown us that this amendment would have conferred any additional power on these States, the observation would have had some bearing; or if he had shown that they would have derived any peculiar advantage, it would have been more plausibly introduced into debate; but as it is—whatever it may be—it is not an argument.

The honorable gentleman from Virginia, who spoke first, (Mr. AROHER,) has discoursed with much State pride on the freehold—viva voce suffrage of Virginia. He has told us that the mode of voting by ballot is a sneaking way; that they “sneak up to the polls,” and that he would exile himself if the freehold qualification was abolished in Virginia. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have understood that a large portion of the citizens of Virginia, particularly in the West, are very anxious to have their constitution amended, in order to be permitted to exercise the elective franchise; but, perhaps, after the honorable gentleman's threat to leave them if they do, they may desist. I imagine, sir, that it would be an easy matter for any other State to give her citizens the same independence as the citizens of Virginia have, by adopting the same mode—by making a freehold necessary to vote, and by protecting that freehold from the payment of debts; they might then, sir, be so independent as not only to tell a candidate viva voce, that they would not vote for him—but also that they would not pay him a just debt—and that, too, “viva voce,” sir. But, sir, with the right of suffrage the constitution has laudably omitted to interfere; nor does this amendment seek to interfere. The constitution has omitted it, sir, as I said, for the wisest reasons.

The requisites to the rights of suffrage are very different in the different States, and even in adjoining States; in Virginia, as we have seen, none but freeholders can vote—in North Carolina, sir, it is the birthright of every free-man. If, therefore, the constitution had attempted to fix a uniform rule on this subject, the strange anomaly might have been presented of a man's voting for the highest officer in the Union, who could not vote for the lowest State officer. It might also have interfered materially with the polity of a State. This amendment, therefore, sir, does not at all interfere with State rights; their quantity of power remains the same: its ratio of adjustment is not disturbed—and either with regard to the Union, or each other, they preserve the same relative rights. It will also prevent the arraying of State against State—as the supporters of the President will be diffused through the Union; unreasonable jealousies will thus be prevented, and sectional feelings and appellations, against which the Father of his Country entertained so much apprehension, will be deprived of one of their most powerfully exciting causes, and it may well be doubted, whether any citizen of any State, with an American feeling, would not greatly prefer that the candidate of his choice should be President, than that his State should give an undivided vote.

The proposition that the Senate should elect, points clearly to the State power; and this qualification being retained when it was transferred to the House of Representatives, shows conclusively that this was a point not to be conceded. Indeed, sir, the convention repeatedly decided against any mode by which this officer should be elected, without a participation by the States as States: the plan finally adopted was the result of fair compromise, and was much complained of at the time, as giving too much influence to the large States. Let us recollect, too, sir, that, by the amendment of 1804, which I before mentioned, this State right has been considerably abridged.

The power of the House, as exercised in this election, is really the only purely federative feature that now remains. The Senate do not vote by States, but individually. But, sir, the great argument relied on is the liability of this House to corruption—to undue dependency by the expectation of honors and offices. I know, sir, that patronage addresses itself to some of the most powerful feelings that reign in the human breast—to hope, to pleasing hope—that passion which animates the lottery adventurer, and the monarch on the embattled plain; to the desire of distinction, from which the wisest and best are not exempt; to ambition, which, however immoderate, persuades itself that it is our country, and not ourselves, that we serve. I admit, sir, that the arguments of the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr.

McDUFFIE,) deserve great consideration; but, sir, they prove too much, if any thing—they certainly prove, as the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. EVERETT) has shown, that we ought not to be entrusted with the mighty powers of legislation, which the constitution has vested us with, and which involve the weal or woe, not only of this nation, but perhaps of the world. I cannot see those frightful omens which some gentlemen think they can discover in the political horizon. I see no bulwark of the constitution broken down; the ramparts are entire, and the sentinels, I trust, are at their posts. I have not heard the tocsin of alarm sounded by the State legislatures, nor have I seen the flaming brand passed from hill to hill.

The late Presidential election duly and constitutionally devolved upon this House, and was duly and constitutionally made, and every good citizen is, I trust, disposed to judge "all those in authority" by their measures.

But, sir, if the deformed features of corruption have been here manifested, is there no mode of expelling the monster, but by digging up the foundations of the constitutional edifice? If the golden shower has penetrated the massy walls of the Capitol, close the avenues; if we cannot resist temptation, let us fly it. Let us pass a self-denying ordinance—exclude members from office. But do not, sir, because we are frail, disfigure the monuments of our ancestors' wisdom and virtue. Let us rather endeavor to elevate ourselves to their standard, than destroy the standard itself. I have thus endeavored, Mr. Chairman, not only to express my opinion, but to assign my reasons. I was not disposed to shrink from responsibility by a silent vote for these amendments. I feel a conviction, sir, that I have at least endeavored to do my duty: and, sir, there is no feeling I prize more highly, or would purchase more dearly.

Mr. POLK then took the floor, and spoke to the following effect:

Mr. Chairman: After the able and very interesting discussion, with which we have been favored upon the present occasion, but little remains to be said upon this important subject. And I should, sir, upon this, as I have done upon other occasions, have contented myself to have given a silent vote, but for the acknowledged importance of the great question upon which we now deliberate, and that I represent here a portion of the free people of this country. As their humble organ, I should be censurable, indeed, not to express their will upon a subject which is not local in its character; which does not affect, in the decision which we are called upon to make, any one State, or portion of this Union, to the exclusion of another; but upon a subject, in which the whole people of this mighty Confederacy feel much concern. Yes, sir, said Mr. P., the proposed amendments to the constitution, contained in the resolutions upon your table, involve, as it seems to me, a question of vast interest to the people of this country. They involve, sir, the question of their sovereignty. That this is a Government based upon the will of the People; that all power emanates from them; and that a majority should rule; are, as I conceive, vital principles in this Government, never to be sacrificed or abandoned, under any circumstances. In theory, all sound politicians admit the abstract proposition, that the people of this country are sovereign; that they are the source of power; and that, in a representative Republic like this, the majority should rule, and the minority submit. These constitute the basis, upon which rest all your political institutions. But, in practice, how does their sovereignty operate in the election of the Chief Magistrate of the nation? Are the people, in fact, sovereign? Does the power that elevates this distinguished individual to this high station, always emanate from them? Do a majority always prevail? The history of past events answers the question. The possibility, much less the increased probability, that it may be otherwise, under the present provisions of the constitution, strongly urges the necessity of making some amendment, whereby the desirable end may be attained, that the individual who is called to preside over the destinies of this nation may be the choice of a majority of its citizens. But here, sir, I am met at the threshold, by the argument of the gentleman from New York, (Mr. STORMS,) and told, that it never was intended, by the framers of the constitution, that the people should exercise the important function of electing the President and Vice President of the United States; that the popular principle, in relation to this election, was limited; that it was a mixed power, partaking of the popular and federative principles; that it was intended that there should be a great rallying point for the States, in the House of Representatives, when the primary electors should fail to make a choice, and when the contingency should happen, that the election should devolve upon Congress. If the gentleman be right, in the proposition which he has assumed, I am free to admit that I have been wholly mistaken, and totally wrong, in my conceptions upon this subject. But, before I attempt to answer the argument of the gentleman, suffer me here, Mr. Chairman, to make this general remark. Almost every gentleman who has addressed the committee upon this occasion, (I believe I should not err if I were to say all,) seem to have viewed this subject as though we were about to perform an ordinary act of legislation under the constitution; as though we were about to enact an electoral law, to carry the provisions into effect: and not as though we were called upon, by the propositions now before us, to amend the fundamental law of the country—the constitution itself. And if the gentleman from New York was right in his premises, as to the intention of that bright galaxy of statesmen who composed

Amendment of the Constitution.

the convention of '87—that framed the constitution, (which I am far from believing, and cannot admit,) still I would maintain, that, after near forty years' experience of the practical operations of this constitution, it was sound policy, and important to the stability, duration, and harmony of the Union, to amend the constitution, and give this important power directly to the great body of the American people. But, sir, is the gentleman from New York right? Was it, as he supposes, never intended that the people of the United States should elect the President? If, sir, I had no other argument to light up my mind to a correct conclusion upon this point, than those that are legitimately to be drawn from the constitution itself, I should be amply sustained in the opinions I have formed. Is it reasonable that the people of the United States, who had but recently broken the chains of their slavery, and shaken off a foreign yoke—who were about to form for themselves a system, a free and republican system, of Government—is it reasonable, I repeat it, sir, that they should have intended to disfranchise themselves in this important particular—the election of the first officer of the Republic? What, sir, is their language, in the preamble of this constitution? “We, the People of the United States,” &c., “do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.” But I will not fatigue the committee, by reiterating the able arguments of the honorable member from South Carolina, (Mr. DRAYTON,) drawn from the constitution itself, upon this part of the subject. It is fresh in the recollection of every gentleman, and proves satisfactorily and conclusively, to my mind, that the framers of the constitution contemplated and intended, that the people should be the electors of President and Vice President; that they viewed a recurrence of this election to the House of Representatives as a remote possibility, and one which would seldom, if ever, occur. We are not, however, left to ferret out their intention by the letter, or by the construction of the constitution alone. Other evidences are within our reach. What were the opinions of a distinguished member of that Convention, as contained in the writings of the Federalist, so frequently referred to in the course of this debate—what, sir, were the opinions of Alexander Hamilton? With all his anti-democratic principles, did he contend, in the numbers of the Federalist, written by himself, and designed, together with the numbers of his able coadjutors, (Mr. Madison and Mr. Jay,) to furnish to the American people a fair exposition of the new constitution—written at that critical period, too, when this constitution was suspended before the conventions of the States, for ratification or rejection? Did he contend that the President was not to be elected by the people? No, sir! Whatever might have been his own individual opinion of what the constitution ought to have been, he knew too well the intention of the Convention as to what it was. In the 68th No. of that work, he says, it was desirable that the sense of the people should be ascertained in this important election; that, for this purpose, the election was not made to depend on any pre-existing or pre-established body of men, who might be tampered with, to prostitute their votes; but the choice was referred to an immediate act of the people of America; and that it was intended that the President should be independent of all others, but the people, for his election. I have not the number to which I refer, before me, but I state it substantially correct. In the Convention in Virginia, to whom this constitution was submitted, for ratification or rejection, what were the opinions entertained by its distinguished members? Did they understand that the people were not to elect the President? No, sir. Governor Randolph, in answering an objection which had been made to this part of the constitution—that foreign influence would operate in the election of the President—says: “The electors must be elected by the people at large. To procure his re-election, his influence must be co-extensive with the Continent; and there can be no combination between the electors, as they elect him on the same day in every State. When this is the case, how can foreign influence or intrigue enter?” The late venerable President of the United States, (Mr. Monroe,) who has gone into retirement, and, I am sorry to say it, sir, in penury and want—for, whatever else may be said of him, it may be truly said, he was a faithful and useful public servant, in those trying times when his country realized the value of his services—he said, upon this occasion: “The President ought to act under the strongest impulses of rewards and punishments, which are the strongest incentives to human actions. There are two ways of securing this point. He ought to depend on the people of America for his appointment and continuance in office. He ought, also, to be responsible, in an equal degree, to all the States, and to be tried by dispassionate judges. His responsibility ought, further, to be direct and immediate.” Mr. Mason, and Mr. Madison, too, who were distinguished members of the Convention of Virginia, do not seem to have understood this subject as the gentleman from New York professes to do. They maintained that “the choice of the people ought to be attended to.” But, at the period when this constitution was presented to the States for ratification, it was an alarming crisis to the people of this country. The Articles of Confederation had proved inadequate to the great purposes of self-government. The question presented to the States was, ratification or rejection of the new constitution. Rejection, and anarchy, and confusion, with despotism in their train, were most likely to be the consequences; and though some objections might have existed to the constitution, in this particular, as possible, in a remote degree, yet, under the circumstances, ratification was better than rejection. At that period, it was thought by the sages of that day, distinguished for their talents and political sagacity, that it was barely possible that the election could devolve on Congress. They had fixed their eyes upon that distinguished man, "the Father of his Country," as the first who was to fill this high office—an individual upon whom all united with one voice. They could not pierce the veil of futurity, and see the new system fully develop itself. What they could not anticipate or foresee, we have realized. Is there any gentleman here, with his past observation and experience, who will hazard the opinion, that this election will hereafter but seldom devolve upon Congress? Is there any gentleman here, who will deny that, under existing circumstances, this important election, under the present provisions of the constitution, must, in all probability, most generally, terminate in this House? If such must probably be the result, is not the intention of the constitution, and of its framers, that the people should elect the President, defeated? If, by the unforeseen operations of the constitution, the people have, in effect, been deprived of an important right, which they ought to possess and exercise, and which I maintain was intended to be given to them, are we not called upon, by the most solemn obligations, to restore it to them?

But, to consider this subject more systematically—the resolutions under consideration naturally divide themselves into two distinct propositions: 1st. That the constitution shall be so amended, that the election of President and Vice President shall, in no event, devolve upon the respective Houses of Congress. And 2d. That the constitution shall be so amended, that each State in the Union shall be divided into as many districts as there are Senators and Representatives in Congress, from each respective State, and that each district shall give one vote.

In examining these two propositions, although distinct in themselves, I shall not view them as distinct and substantive propositions, unconnected with each other in their effects and operations, as some gentlemen have done.

In support of the first proposition, it will be necessary briefly to notice some of the defects of the present constitution, and why it is that the election of this high officer should, in no event, devolve upon Congress. The first reason which suggests itself to my mind, why it should not there devolve, is, that the President is not an officer of Congress; he is not an officer of the House of Representatives, but he is the Chief Magistrate of the whole people of the Union, and should be directly responsible to the people for his conduct in office, and be dependent upon them for his re-election. The surest guarantee that, in his administration, he will consult the interests of his constituents, and, to the extent of his ability, pursue a wise policy, is the certainty, that, at the expiration of his term, he must return again to the body of society, and submit his public conduct to the scrutiny of impartial examination; is the certainty that, if he has disregarded or negligently mistaken the best interest of the country, he will not be again elevated to that high station, but must seek the "post of honor in a private station;" must share with the body of his fellow-citizens their burdens, and must participate with them, the evil effects of his own policy. But if he is remotely responsible to the people, and dependent directly upon a select or pre-existing body of men for his appointment, it is human nature, and he will study more to conciliate his immediate electors, than to advance the interest of the community. But, sir, the election ought, in no event, to devolve upon the House of Representatives, for a much more important reason, and one which, with me, is conclusive. It is, because a minority as well in the Electoral Colleges, under the present provisions of the constitution, as a minority of representatives in Congress, may elect him, and thereby destroy and overturn in practice what all admit in theory—that a majority should rule. According to the present provisions of the constitution, there are as many electors for President and Vice President, as there are Senators and Representatives in Congress. By the last apportionment, which I shall take as an example, for the purpose of illustrating the argument, the number of electors is 261. A majority of the whole number of electors is necessary to a choice in the primary Colleges; and if the Colleges of Electors fail to elect, then, out of the three highest on the list of those voted for by the electors, the House of Representatives, voting by States, is to choose the President. Suppose, for example, sir, that A and B are the prominent candidates before the people for the Presidency. C is likewise a candidate. A receives 120 electoral votes, B receives an equal number, and C receives the remaining 21 votes. C may have been supported by one or two of the States, or may have received the votes of a part of the people of some one of the larger States. A, B, and C, in this event, are presented to the House of Representatives, the three highest on the list of the electoral votes, out of whom the House is to choose the President. An election, under these circumstances, takes place in the House, where the votes are taken by States; and C, who has received a small minority of electoral votes, may be elected President of the United States by thirty-one Representatives, upon this floor, out of two hundred and thirteen, the whole number of Representatives: for thirty-one Representatives here, from the thirteen smaller States in the Union, have it in their power to control and to give the votes of thirteen States, and thereby elect the President against the will of the remaining one hundred and eighty-two Representatives, as is demonstrable thus:

Amendment of the Constitution.

[H. OF R.]

	No. of Reps.	Reps.

Illinois	1 do.	1

Thus the whole number of Representatives upon this floor, from thirteen of the smaller States in the Union, is only forty-five. A majority of the representation from each State have it in their power to control, and give the vote of that State; and thirty-one Representatives here constitute the sum of the majorities of the delegations of thirteen States of the Union. Thus C, with only twenty-one electoral votes, against the remaining two hundred and forty electoral votes, and with thirty-one Representatives, against the remaining one hundred and eighty-two Representatives, may be elected the President of the United States. But suppose a case still more extreme—it is certainly possible it may occur, and therefore I am justifiable in using it—suppose C receives but one solitary electoral vote, and the remaining two hundred and sixty are equally divided between A and B. In this event C is constitutionally presented to the House of Representatives as one of the three highest on the list. With but one single electoral vote, thirty-one gentlemen upon this floor, have it in their power to elect him the President of the United States. Will gentlemen say these are extreme cases, and will probably never occur? I answer, it is possible they may occur, and cases approximating to them, and the same in principle, will, in all probability, often occur. But shall I be told that the Representatives of freemen will never be so lost to a sense of duty and responsibility to the people, as to disregard their will, and palm upon them a President not of their choice? Experience is the best of tutresses, and from her we may learn many salutary lessons. I refer gentlemen to the memorable contest in the House of Representatives, of 1801, between the venerable Jefferson and Aaron Burr. The latter had not received a single vote in the contemplation of the people, or of the electors, for the Presidency; the friends of the former for the Presidency had supported the latter for the Vice Presidency. Yet, having received an equal number of votes, the one evidently intended to be President, and the other Vice President, under the then provisions of the constitution, it became necessary for the House of Representatives to determine, voting by States, which of them should be President. With all these facts staring them in the face, a portion of the Representatives of the people at that day, were not so scrupulous of violating the people's will, as to surrender, without a struggle, the Chief Magistracy to the man of their choice. No, sir; a doubtful issue ensued, when the sable curtains of the night were drawn around; midnight balloting after balloting followed; this mighty Confederacy was shaken to its centre: for days the result was suspended. Fortunately, the American people in that struggle ultimately prevailed; a victory of principle and of the people was obtained; a majority still ruled. And who can tell, sir, what might have been the consequences, if it had terminated otherwise? I shudder to contemplate what might have been the fate of this happy country. But I shall not fatigue the committee, by indulging in conjecture upon this unpleasant subject. I have referred gentlemen to this part of our history to show, that if, in that case, the contest was rendered doubtful for a season, where the individual had not, in contemplation of the people, received a single vote for the Presidency; that it may occur, under the present provisions of the constitution, where an individual may have received a very small number of Electoral votes, as in the cases I have supposed.

It may happen, sir, that a minority may thus elect the President, when the election devolves upon this House, from personal partialities to the individual elected, and thus palm upon the nation a President evidently not the choice of a majority of the people of the United States; not the choice of the immediate constituents of those gentlemen, upon this floor, who may elect him; and not the choice of a majority of the Representatives in Congress. It may happen, sir, that the first choice of the Representative here, holding in his hands the power of controlling the vote of his State, may not be returned to the House as one of the three highest upon the list. The second choice of the Representative may be essentially different from the second choice of his constituents, if the election were again referred back to them. The Representative may be ignorant of the will of his constituents, or if he know their will, he may affect ignorance of it. But the doctrine is maintained by some politicians in this country, and I appeal to your experience to know, sir, whether it has not been openly avowed upon this floor, that there is no connection between the Representative here, and his constituents at home; that the Representative here is not bound to regard or obey the instructions of those who send him here. For myself, I have never entertained such opinions, but believe, upon all questions of expediency, that the Representative is bound to regard and obey the known will of his constituent. Other gentlemen, however, entertain different opinions; and when such opinions are entertained and openly avowed, what security have the people that their rights will be preserved, when the preservation of them depends upon the accidental, interested, or capricious will of their public servants? Thus the President may be elected by a minority of the Representatives in Congress, who may be of opinion that they have conscientiously discharged their public duty.

But is there no danger, sir, when the election of the first officer of the first nation in the world is to be made by a select and pre-existing body of men, that even the Representatives of freemen may, in an evil hour, be tempted to depart from the path of duty, receive the wages of iniquity, and prostrate at the shrine of some ambitious aspirant to the Presidency, the public will, and with it the best interests of the country? Shall we assume to ourselves the high prerogative of being uncontaminated and incorruptible, when the same attributes are denied to all the rest of mankind? Is immaculate purity to be found within these walls, and in no other corner of the earth? Have you not yourselves, sir, in your legislation in relation to this very subject—the election of a President—given incontestable evidence that you are distrustful of human nature? Why is it, that, by the act of Congress of 1792, designed as it was to carry into effect that part of the constitution in relation to the election of a President, you provide that the electors in each State shall be elected within the thirty-four days immediately preceding the first Wednesday in December, in every fourth year, the day upon which the electors, throughout the Union, are required to give their votes? Why this short intervening period between the choice of the electors, and the day upon which they shall give their votes? It was a wise provision, made to prevent the possibility of tampering with them; to prevent intrigue, corruption, bargaining, and sale; to prevent the interference of political jugglers; and to keep pure the stream as was the fountain, the people, from which it flowed. So particular have you been upon this subject, and so cautious to preserve the purity of the electors, that you have given them but a short and transitory existence; and if any one of them should be elected more than thirty-four days before the day upon which he is required to vote, the presumption of your law is against him, and his vote will not be received. But is not the House of Representatives likewise a pre-existing body of men? Are they not collected together at one point for weeks together, between the period when it is ascertained that the primary electors have failed to make a choice, and the day upon which they are called upon to vote? Is it not as probable, to say the least of it, that they may be tampered with to prostitute their votes, and that they may be corrupted, as that twenty-four separate electoral colleges, dispersed over the twenty-four States of the Union, might be? In the one case you have been distrustful, and have provided against the possibility of undue influence of any kind, so as to thwart the public will. In relation to the electoral colleges, you have adopted, by your laws, the salutary maxim, “lead us not into temptation.” Would it not be quite as safe to adopt it in relation to ourselves?

But we are told by the honorable gentleman from New York, (Mr. STORRS,) that, for the honor of this House, a suspicion should not be indulged that its members could be corrupted. Let it not be told, says he, at the court of St. James, or upon the continent of Europe, that even suspicion had been openly entertained upon the floor of the American Congress, that any of its members were corruptible. And the gentleman from Massachusetts, too, (Mr. EVERETT,) denies in broad terms the corruptibility of this House. Sir, it is a humiliating idea, a painful thought, I admit, that the Representatives of freemen could, under any circumstances, barter away or disregard the rights of the people for their own individual aggrandizement. But human nature is the same in all ages of the world. All past history has shown that it is unsafe to rely upon virtue alone when strong temptations are presented. And what stronger temptation to corruption and the abandonment of principle than the Presidency, can be held out to an ambitious man aspiring to that high office? The President of the United States, when elected, has an immense patronage to bestow; has many honorable and lucrative offices in his gift. And what stronger temptation than to receive the patronage in his power, can be held out to the few assembled here, who have it in their power to elect him? I apprehend, sir, if this election shall frequently devolve upon Congress, that a door will be opened to corruption, intrigue, and to office hunters; and I apprehend, further, that through that door the evil-doer may one day enter, and sap the foundations of this happy Republic. Other countries have been revolutionized and involved in anarchy and confusion, upon whose ruins despotism has erected her throne. I hope, sir, my apprehensions may be unfounded; but surely it is prudent in us to take warning from their example, and close the door through which unprincipled men may enter, and obtain an advantage. It should be remembered, too, that, in many of the States of the Union, the Congressional elections, for the next Congress, have transpired some twelve or eighteen months before the Presidential election; the member is either defeated by a more favored citizen of his district, who is to supply the place here, and his direct and immediate responsibility to the people is destroyed; or he has been previously elected, and is assured that he will at least hold his seat here, if he desire it, for another term. If he has been defeated at home, he seeks elevation and promotion elsewhere; if he has been successful at home, he hopes his good constituents may forget his political sin before the next election; if he should still desire to hold the seat, he hopes, by the assistance of Executive influence, he may effect some local measure that may reconcile his constituents, or balance in their estimation the evil deed he has committed. Another argument, Mr. Chairman, of the gentleman from New York, struck me with peculiar force. If, says he, this Government is ever destroyed, it will not be by men in power, but by men out of power. And the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. EVERETT,) who succeeded him, used a similar argument, and told us, that if the Government was ever destroyed, it would not be by a President elected by a minority of the people, but by a President elected by an overwhelming majority of the people; by some "military chieftain," that should arise in the land. Yes, sir, by some "military chieftain," whose only crime it was to have served his country faithfully at a period when that country needed and realized the value of his services. I know, sir, there are some politicians in this country who are continually in alarm, or affect to be so, lest the people should destroy the Government. And I know, sir, there are others, and I am bold to say I am of the number, who are of opinion that, if this happy Government is ever destroyed, (which God forbid!) it will be by the encroachments and abuse of power, and by the alluring and corrupting influence of Executive patronage. Rely upon it, sir, that if you should ever see an Administration of this country, whose elevation, whose measures, and whose policy, are not supported by the good feelings and opinions of the people, there will be more danger, infinitely more danger to be apprehended from them, than all the ideal dangers which the gentlemen seem to apprehend are covertly lurking among the great body of the people of this Union.

Amendment of the Constitution.

I shall not, said Mr. P., dwell upon another argument, which has been very properly used by some gentleman in the course of this debate—that when the election comes to this House, it is calculated to interfere with, and impede the ordinary business of legislation. It has not been my fortune to witness the effects of an election here; this is the first time I have had the honor to be a humble Representative of a portion of this people upon this floor. I could wish, upon this great occasion upon which we deliberate, that they were more ably represented. But though, sir, I have not witnessed the scene, I have read of its effects upon two occasions, in the history of my country, and can well conceive that members of Congress will be too apt to neglect all the important subjects of legislation, in devising plans, intriguing, and managing, to promote the success of their favorite candidate. If there should be no corruption, still it is calculated to distract their deliberations. It will produce excitement; arouse all the angry feelings of our nature; create heart-burnings, party feelings, and sectional jealousies, detrimental to the public welfare, and dangerous to the duration and stability of the Government. The effects produced will not, probably, terminate with the election itself, but will mingle and be felt in your deliberations for years afterwards.

We can no longer, as our fathers did, contemplate the immortal Father of his Country, upon whom all united in elevating to this high station: nor can we call into our service the immortal author of the Declaration of Independence. A new generation are about to assume the places of their fathers; many are the aspirants to this high station; public opinion is divided, and cannot, in future, be often concentrated on any one individual. Under these circumstances, it is idle to suppose that this election can be prevented from terminating ultimately in the House of Representatives. That it will often devolve here, cannot be doubted; that it should not do so, I have attempted, and, I hope, satisfactorily, shown.

These are some of the objections to the constitution in its present form, and some of the reasons which have presented themselves most forcibly to my mind, why the election of President and Vice President should in no event devolve upon Congress.

I come now, said Mr. POLK, briefly to consider the second resolution, submitted to the consideration of the committee by the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. MODURRIGAN,) which proposes that each State in the Union shall be divided into as many districts as there are Senators and Representatives in Congress from such State.

The object of this proposition is to give to the people of every section of the Union, as near as may be consistently with important rights reserved to the States, which are not proposed to be disturbed, their equal relative weight in the election. To do this, the public sentiment should be fairly ascertained—and in order to obtain a fair expression of the popular will, it is a self-evident proposition to my mind, that some uniform mode of collecting the public sentiment should be established throughout the Union. Under the present provisions of the constitution, and the practice under them, according to the various and diversified modes of election, prescribed by the respective State Legislatures, do the people in every section of the Union, in fact, possess and exercise their equal relative weight in the election? Is the public sentiment of the whole people of the Union correctly ascertained? No, sir! It is demonstrable, if an election be made at all by the Electoral Colleges without involving the national calamity (for such I view it) of a recurrence to the House of Representatives, a little more than a fourth of the people of the United States may choose the President. If I succeed in establishing this fact, the necessity for uniformity and amendment will, as I conceive, be apparent, if we hold to the principle that a majority should rule. What are the various modes of election at present established in the States? In some, the district system prevails; in others, the Legislatures have assumed to themselves the power of appointing electors; and in one State of the Union (Kentucky) a compound of the district and general ticket system is the mode prescribed by the Legislature. The State being entitled to fourteen electors, is divided into three districts, in one of which four electors are chosen, and five in each of the other two districts. I shall not here stop to inquire why this artificial arrangement of districts in that State was made. Whether it was made upon an emergency, and designed to throw majorities in each district in favor of a particular party, or of particular men, is wholly immaterial to the present inquiry. In this state of things, a bare majority of the people of the six larger States in the Union may, by adopting the general ticket system, the Gerry-mandering system, or by assuming the election to the Legislatures, elect the President, though a respectable minority, and very nearly half of the people of those six States, and the whole of the people of the eighteen remaining States, may be in favor of some other candidate. For example:

	Electors.		Electors.
New York has	36,	a majority is	19
Pennsylvania,	28,	do.	15
Virginia,	24,	do.	13
Ohio,	16,	do.	9
Massachusetts,	15,	do.	8
Kentucky,	14,	do.	8
	<hr/>		<hr/>

Thus, sir, in these six States, there are 133 electoral votes, a majority of the whole number in the Union, and sufficient, if united, to elect the President in the primary colleges.

But the people in those six States are divided in opinion, and very nearly equipoised as to numbers, between two contending candidates, A and B, for the Presidency. But A has small majorities over B, in each of those States. If the district system were established, the friends of A could give him 72 electoral votes, and the friends of B could give him 61 electoral votes. B, too, in the case supposed, might be supported by the remaining eighteen States, or by such majorities of them as, when added to his 61 votes, would be sufficient to elect him. But by compressing the friends of B in those six States, into the support of A by the effect of the general ticket system, or by elections made by the Legislatures; by literally suppressing the voice of the minorities, in each of those six States favorable to the election of B; by denying to almost half the population of those States the right of suffrage, or of being heard in the election—you, in truth, enable a minority of the people of this Union, amounting to but little more than the fourth of the whole population, to elect the President against the will of all the rest of the people of the Union, amounting to almost three-fourths of our whole population. But will it be said, that this likewise is an extreme case, and will probably never occur? I answer it is possible it may occur, and cases approximating to it, and the same in principle, if the election is kept from the House of Representatives, in all probability will occur.

This, then, is our dilemma. Under the present provisions of the constitution, either a minority of the whole people of the Union, by a combination of the large States, must elect the President, or we must submit to the national calamity of an election in the House of Representatives. Which shall we choose? Neither is compatible with the genius of our free institutions, or the sovereignty of the people. And here will the larger States object to the district system, and say, we cannot part with the advantage which we now have, of moving in a solid, unbroken phalanx, and giving to our favorite candidate an undivided electoral vote, by suppressing the voice of the minority in the State, by means of the general ticket system, or elections by the Legislatures? I answer that the larger States will receive an ample equivalent for this surrender, in the certainty that the election can never devolve upon the House of Representatives, where, voting by States, a minority, as I have attempted to show, and I hope successfully, may elect.

Will the smaller States object to that part of the resolutions now under consideration, which proposes so to amend the constitution as that the election shall in no event devolve upon Congress, and say, we cannot part with the advantage which we have of voting by States, when the election shall devolve upon the House of Representatives, and whereby we, though a minority, may have it in our power to elect a President? I answer, that the smaller States will receive an ample equivalent for this surrender, in the certainty that the larger States cannot combine and move in an unbroken body in the electoral colleges, and thereby enable a minority of the people of the Union, by suppressing the voice of their respective minorities in the large States, to elect the President, as I have attempted to show, and I hope successfully, they might do. The resolutions, then, viewed together, and not as substantive and distinct propositions, in relation to their effects and operations, propose a compromise to the larger and smaller States, that they should meet upon middle ground, and surrender the advantages which the one or the other might possess in certain contingencies, each receiving a mutual consideration from the other for the surrender thus made. It is a surrender of advantages, too, which neither should wish to retain; a surrender made not to each other, but to principle, upon the altar of their common country.

But, will the larger States object, and say, though uniformity in the mode of election be important and desirable, in order to obtain a fair expression of the public will, yet we cannot agree that that mode shall be the district system?

MARCH, 1826.]

Amendment of the Constitution.

[H. OF R.]

We prefer that the general ticket system should be the mode established in all the States, or we prefer that the choice of electors should be made by the Legislatures in all the States, and that the one or the other of these modes should be uniform throughout the Union. I answer, by neither of these modes can the evil complained of be remedied. If the general ticket system be the uniform mode established, the larger States would still retain their present power. If the Legislatures in all the States choose the electors, the larger States would still retain their present power. And, by either of these modes, the predominant party or faction in power, in each State, by suppressing the voice of the minority, may move in a solid front, and elect the President. If it be contended that this is an advantage which all the States would equally possess, the idea is a mistaken one. Such is the difference in the size, and quantum of population, in the several States, that a majority, whose voice is totally suppressed in the election in one of the larger States, may be as great—nay, more than five times as great—as the whole population of one of the smaller States. To illustrate this, take, for example, the States of New York and Delaware, one of the largest and one of the smallest States in the Union. Suppose New York to be divided in opinion between two candidates, in an impending Presidential election, in the proportion of 19 to 17 of her 36 electors. If the district system prevailed, one of the candidates would receive 19 electoral votes, and the other the remaining 17 electoral votes. But, by establishing the general ticket system in New York, a large minority, and very nearly half of her citizens who would be entitled by the district system to give 17 electoral votes, are literally destroyed, and impressed into the service of the majority. In Delaware, the whole population can only give three electoral votes. Thus, the minority in New York, whose voice is totally suppressed in the election, would be more than five times as great as the whole population of Delaware. But suppose Delaware likewise to be divided in opinion in the proportion of one to two of her three electors. By the district system, Delaware would give two votes to one candidate for the Presidency, and one to the other. Establish the general ticket system in Delaware, and her three votes will be given to one candidate, thereby suppressing the voice of a minority of that State, who, by the district system, would be entitled to give one vote. One vote of the minority, then, by the general ticket system, is suppressed in Delaware. But in New York, by the same system, seventeen votes are suppressed. Thus the minority in New York, whose voice is suppressed by the general ticket system, is seventeen times as great as the minority in Delaware, whose voice is suppressed by the same system. Thus, sir, it is seen what great inequality would be produced in the election of a President by establishing the general ticket system as the uniform mode in all the States. The same result would happen by establishing the mode of electing by the Legislatures as the uniform mode in all the States. The great excellence of the district system is, that each district throughout the Union would contain very nearly the same quantum of population, would be composed of contiguous territory, and would be very nearly of the same size; and each district would be entitled to give one vote. And if, sir, minorities should be found to exist, in a Presidential election, in each district, as they may, is it probable that there will be such a disparity, such a disproportion between the respective minorities of adjoining or different districts, where all are of the same size, as would exist between the minorities of different States, differing as they do in size, some containing more than thirty times as great a population as others; and, when, by the general system, each State would compose one district. I was amused, sir, but not convinced, by the argument of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. STEVENSON,) the object of which was to show the superiority of the general ticket system over all others, and that minorities in the district would prevail. That honorable gentleman adduced, as an apt example, in illustration of his argument, an occurrence, which he says took place in one of the districts of Maryland, in the late Presidential election. In one of the districts in that State, he says there were a majority of the people in favor of the election of Mr. Adams; that there were two candidates for elector favorable to that gentleman, and one in favor of General Jackson; that, in consequence of a division of the friends of the former, between the two candidates for elector, neither of whom would decline in favor of the other, the elector, friendly to the latter, received a plurality of votes of the district, and was elected. Now, sir, what the facts were, in relation to that particular district, adduced as an example, I am not particularly informed; but, I understand it became more a contest between distinguished individuals, who were opposing candidates for elector, and who had, respectively, many personal friends, than a contest between the candidates for the Presidency themselves; and is, therefore, no test of the real sentiments of the people of that district, and no conclusive illustration of the gentleman's argument. But, sir, if it were, I have it in my power to furnish that honorable gentleman with a fair rebutter, which occurred in that election, by the operations of his favorite—the general ticket system. The State of Ohio voted by general ticket. Did the gentleman who received the undivided electoral vote of that State, in fact receive the support, even of the majority of the people of Ohio? No, sir; supported as he was, by a very small number of votes over one of his competitors, and if all the returns had been correctly received, it is very doubtful whether he obtained even a plurality over him. Yet, sir, he received, in the electoral colleges, the whole vote of the State of Ohio, against the sentiments of a considerable majority of the people of that State; and yet, sir, this, I suppose, constitutes the excellence of the general ticket system, in the estimation of the gentleman from Virginia. The individual, too, whom the gentleman conceives was, by the operation of the district system, deprived of an electoral vote in one of the districts of Maryland—yes, sir, the same individual who had received the smallest number of the votes of the people of Ohio, when the election ultimately devolved upon this House, received the vote of that State.

But, sir, I concur in opinion with the gentleman from Louisiana, (Mr. LIVINGSTON,) who, a few days ago, submitted a resolution, proposing to dispense with the electors altogether. The people require no such agency. I believe them to be wholly unnecessary. Dispense with them altogether: let the people vote directly for the President, without their intervention, and the objection to the district system, as in the case in Maryland, which has presented itself so forcibly to the mind of the gentleman from Virginia, will be removed. When the people vote directly for the President, there can be no division between contending candidates for elector, in favor of the same candidate, and the majority of the people of each district can control and give the vote of that district. Another advantage of the district system is, that the sentiment of each mass of the community throughout the Union, composing a district, is fairly elicited, and made to have its due and proportional weight in the general collected sentiment of all the districts in the Union. The sentiment of no portion of the Union is suppressed. All are heard, and have their proper weight in determining the election. I do not design, Mr. Chairman, (said Mr. P.,) to embarrass this discussion, by entering into details. If the great principles contemplated by the resolutions on the table, are retained, details are comparatively unimportant, and a spirit of compromise and accommodation of opinion should prevail, in relation to them. I shall, therefore, merely suggest to the consideration of the committee, the plan which has presented itself to my mind, as preferable to any other, and leave it to them to determine how far it will afford a remedy for existing evils. It is in substance this: Each State shall be divided, by the Legislature thereof, into as many districts, composed of contiguous territory, and containing, as near as may be, an equal quantum of population, as shall be equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives in Congress from that State. The people of each district shall vote directly for the President and Vice President, without the intervention of electors. The person, in each district, who may have received the highest number of votes for President, shall be holden to have received one vote; and the person who may have received the highest number of votes for Vice President, shall be holden to have received one vote. And if it shall be ascertained that no person has received a majority of the whole number of districts in the Union, let the election be referred back to the people, who, upon the second balloting, shall, in like manner, vote for one of the two highest upon the list of the former balloting for President, and so of the Vice President. The details of this general outline of a system, to embrace the objects contemplated by the resolutions, can be easily drawn, so as to render it practicable, and easy to effect the choice in this way. But, if other gentlemen can suggest a more acceptable plan, in its details, not varying the general principles, I am not wedded to this, and have merely suggested it, lest it might be said, by some, that, however great the objections may be, to the present provision of the constitution, it would be impracticable to adopt any mode by which the evil could be remedied. Neither shall I, Mr. Chairman, detain the committee by enumerating, in addition to those I have mentioned, many other objections to the general ticket system, or to the appointment of electors by the Legislatures. It would be unnecessary for me to do so, after the able exposition of the honorable mover of these resolutions, (Mr. McDUFFIE,) in the opening of this debate, upon this part of the subject. Some other objections, however, have been made to the plan of amendment proposed, in the course of the discussion, which demand to be noticed.

The honorable gentleman from New York (Mr. STORRS) has been more abundant in objections to the proposed plan of amendment than any other gentleman who has addressed the committee; and though I am aware, sir, when I approach an argument of that gentleman, I encounter an old and experienced politician, hackneyed in debate, yet differing with him in opinion, as it is my misfortune to do, in almost every view he has taken of this subject, I will boldly meet him, and avow the reasons of that difference. That gentleman tells us, with a warning voice, that when we approach this constitution, we stand upon holy ground; that when we attempt to amend it, we lay violent hands upon this mortal work of our ancestors. He tells us he entertains great reverence for that instrument; that he would not disturb one principle which it contains: and, in the same strain in which he thus addresses us, he informs us that there is an insuperable objection to the plan of amendment proposed, because a portion of a certain description of population, negro slaves, in the Southern and Western States, will be represented in this election. Now, sir, by the present constitution, for which the gentleman professes such great reverence, and would not alter or amend it in any particular, three-fifths of this population are represented in the election. By the proposed amendment, they are only represented. The amendment does not propose to disturb this principle, but leaves it precisely upon the ground where it is placed by the present constitution. So that it was wholly unavailable, and I must say, unnecessary, to bring up this question in order to ascertain the comparative merits of the present constitution, and the proposed amendment. I have regretted exceedingly, sir, that scarcely any subject of general concern can be agitated here, without having this unfortunate subject of slavery, either collaterally, or incidentally, brought into view, and made to mingle in our deliberations. It is a subject of peculiar delicacy; but, as it has been noticed upon this occasion, not only by the gentleman from New York, but likewise by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. EVERETT,) and the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. INGERSOLL,) suffer me to say a word or two in reply. When this country became free and independent, this species of population was found amongst us. It had been entailed upon us by our ancestors, and was viewed as a common evil; not confined to the locality where it was, but affecting the whole nation. Some of the States which then possessed it have since gotten clear of it: they were a species of property that differed from all other: they were rational; they were human beings. In fixing the principle of representation, it was thought right, by the framers of the constitution, that they should at least be in part represented. And, accordingly, three-fifths of them are to be represented; but, at the same time that they are to be represented, this provision is incorporated into the constitution: "Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned amongst the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective numbers." If they are to be represented then, direct taxes are to be paid according to that representation, whenever the emergencies of the Government require it. And when the dark cloud of war hovers in your horizon; when a foreign foe invades your country; when your finances are deranged; when money, in the estimation of some the sinews of war, must be raised; when, in order to raise it, direct taxation must be resorted to; and when, sir, conventions are held, in some sections of the Union, to thwart the operations of the Government, and for purposes best known to their members; when the militia, in other sections of the Union, are withheld from the public service—do our neighbors commiserate our condition; do they sympathize with us, and say, we are oppressed with unnecessary burdens because we are required to pay taxes for this species of population? No, sir, it is all right then. Do we complain, sir, that we are thus required to pay taxes for them? No, sir, we do it cheerfully, and without a murmur. I hope, therefore, that this unpleasant subject, not involved in the remotest degree, in the great questions under consideration, may be suffered to rest. I should not have noticed it, if it had not been frequently adverted to by gentlemen who have preceded me. I hope, sir, I shall be pardoned for the digression.

Amendment of the Constitution.

[H. OF R.]

Another argument of the gentleman from

New York is, that, in all elections, the minority have no rights, and must submit; that in an election by his favorite system—the general ticket—the minority of a State have no rights, and must submit; and he instances the election of a Governor of a State by the people of the State, in which case, he says, the minority have no rights and must submit. Sir, the abstract proposition that a majority shall prevail, and a minority submit, is not controverted; but the analogy of the gentleman is an unfortunate one; all reasoning from analogy is dangerous, and apt to lead into error. A case more analogous to the question we are now considering, would have been, that the Governor of a State, elected by the people, does not receive the unanimous and undivided vote of every county in which he happens to receive a majority.

Another argument I shall briefly notice. The gentleman thinks that, by the general ticket system, his old friend in former days, the Caucus, would be much easier crushed and put down, at the centre of the State, than thirty-six caucuses scattered over thirty-six districts, in the State. Sir, upon the subject of caucuses, I know, an honest difference of opinion exists. For myself, I have never entertained but one opinion upon this subject. I had the honor, in the Legislature of my own State, to record my vote in support of those resolutions against a caucus, which produced so much excitement, and led to so much discussion, in the public journals of the country, some two or three years ago. I have seen no reason to change that opinion. I cannot subscribe to the doctrine of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. ARCHER,) that there must be, in every State, some leading politicians, who control and dictate, and give tone to public sentiment. I believe that the people, if left untrammelled by this complicated machinery of a caucus, are competent to act for themselves; but, at the same time that I entertain these opinions, I do not proscribe others who entertain different ones.

But, sir, another objection, made not only by the gentleman from New York, but by others who have engaged in this discussion, is one very important in its character, and should be maturely considered. It is, that the plan of amendment proposed, interferes with State rights, and tends to consolidation of the people of the Union. Sir, no man deprecates more than I do, any violation of rights secured to the States by the Federal Constitution: no gentleman upon this floor will, upon all occasions, more pertinaciously guard against the yawning gulf of consolidation: and, if I should foresee or apprehend that the plan of amendment proposed, would have any such tendency, with all my convictions of its importance, I should pause and hesitate before I acted. I would in no instance, knowingly, have an agency in producing such effects. But, sir, I can see no such danger; the district system has, to my mind, a directly contrary, a diffusing tendency. The argument of the honorable gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. McDUFFIE) upon this part of the subject, has not been met in debate; it has not been approached in a fair, open, and statesmanlike manner; it has been evaded: and I am free to say that, to my mind, it is unanswerable. By this plan you propose not to take the power of electing the President from the States, and to vest it in the General Government, but, on the contrary, you propose to take the contingent power of electing the President and Vice President from Congress, and to give it to the people of the States. Are you producing consolidation, or interfering with State rights, when you do not propose to accumulate more power to yourselves, but to divest yourselves of a part of the power which you possess, and to vest it in the people of the States? Sir, when I speak of State rights, I mean, as I understand the constitution to mean, not the rights of the Executives of the States, not the rights of the Representatives in Congress from the States, not the rights of the Legislatures of the States, but, I mean the rights of the people of the States. The Executives, and Legislatures, and Representatives in Congress, of the States, are the public servants and functionaries of the people of the States, and can have no rights contradistinguished from the rights of the people of the States.

Does the plan of amendment proposed, take from the large States any of their rights? No; on the contrary, it gives to the people of every portion of such States, the power of being heard and felt in the election. It takes from their servants in the Legislature, it is true, the power of suppressing the voice of the minority in the State, by the operations of the general ticket system, or by the election of electors by the Legislature; but it gives the power which it thus takes from their servants, which may be, and is often abused, not to the Federal Government, but to the people of those States themselves. Does the plan of amendment take from the small States any of their rights? No; it is not conceived that the capricious, interested, or arbitrary opinion of a single member of Congress on this floor, when the election devolves upon the House, constitutes a State right, by which I mean the right of the people of the State. The vote of the State may be given by the Representative in direct opposition to the will of the people of the State; and entertaining the opinion, as some profess to do, that the Representative, when the election comes here, is constituted an elector, and an umpire by the constitution, to act according to his own will, regardless of the wishes of his constituents; and, judging from past events, is it not most likely that the votes of the small States will generally depend upon the accidental opinion of the Representative? That opinion may, and often will, misrepresent the wishes of the people of the State, by giving the votes of the State against their will. This ideal, and contingent right, then, supposed to be vested in the small States, is more in the name than in the substance. Does the proposed plan of amendment interfere with the two electoral votes in each State, predicated upon the federative character of the Senate, and the sovereignty of the State? Does it take from the States the power of prescribing the qualifications of voters in each State? No; nor does it disturb or interfere with any other of the rights reserved to the States. Another argument was used, sir, if argument it may be called, by the honorable member from Massachusetts, (Mr. EVERETT,) which struck my mind, on account of its novelty, with peculiar surprise. That honorable gentleman, with all his classical and political learning, in his zeal to oppose all amendment to the constitution at this time, and search out all the possible reasons that could exist against it, insisted, before the committee, that any attempt to propose amendments to the constitution was unconstitutional. Was the gentleman serious in this puerile conception? He told us we had taken an oath to support the constitution, and can we, said he, propose to amend or alter it without violating that oath? And he amused us, too, sir, in illustration of his views upon this part of the subject, with a hypothetical case, in which he figured to us, that if he should meet my honorable friend from South Carolina (Mr. McDUFFIE) in the gallery of the House, and obtain his pledge to support, upon the floor, a favorite measure of his which is unconstitutional, would he, (Mr. McDUFFIE,) said the honorable gentleman, do so, if, on reflection, he found it to be unconstitutional?

But we are admonished by those who are opposed to amendment, that we should be cautious in touching this charter of our liberties—the constitution—lest, in attempting to amend it we should make it worse. Sir, in the main, that valued instrument is without a parallel in the history of the world, and speaks its own eulogy; but it was made by men, and man and all his works are imperfect. The wise framers of that instrument well knew, that, in forming a system of government under a written constitution, in many of its features unlike any that had preceded it, in any age, or in any country, that difficulties, then unforeseen by them might occur, in the future operations of the system. So sensible were they that it was not the work of inspiration, but of men, that it might be imperfect, and fail in some of its important operations, that they wisely incorporated into it the method of its own amendment. And I appeal to the history of those times, to know whether the constitution would ever have been ratified by the States, if it had not been for this very article that made provision for its own amendments; if it had not been for the hope and confident expectation that future amendments would be made? In many of the States that did ratify it, declaratory amendments were recommended to be made a part of the constitution. Virginia, Massachusetts, New York, South Carolina, and some others that did ratify it, at the time of ratification, proposed that amendments should be made. North Carolina, the State from which my honorable friend before me (Mr. SAUNDERS) comes, who has ably addressed the committee upon this subject, and the State of my nativity, was among the last to come into the Union. She, too, paused, and hesitated, and doubted, but was ultimately induced, by this very clause, to ratify it; and she, too, proposed amendments. And have not salutary amendments been made to the original constitution, as reported by the convention, and ratified by the States? At the first Congress held under the constitution, twelve additional articles were proposed to the States for ratification, in the manner prescribed by the constitution. Ten of them were ratified by three-fourths of the States, and became a part of the constitution, and now constitute your bill of rights, and secure to the citizen some of his most important privileges and rights. At the third Congress held under the constitution, an additional article, in relation to the suability of States by the citizens of another State, or the subjects of a foreign State or power, was submitted by the States for ratification, in the manner prescribed by the constitution; it was subsequently ratified by three-fourths of the States, and became a part of the constitution.

Amendment of the Constitution.

[H. OF R.]

After the celebrated contest of 1801, between Mr Jefferson and Aaron Burr, to which I have alluded, had demonstrated the defective provisions of the then constitution, in relation to the election of President and Vice President, another amendment was proposed by Congress to the States for ratification, to avoid the recurrence of a similar difficulty. The amendment thus proposed was promptly ratified, and became a part of the constitution. All these amendments have been made to the original constitution, as framed by the convention. From that period to the present, no other amendment has been made; but as we have grown older in the knowledge of our Government; as we have witnessed its practical operations, we have learned from experience its defects. And, sir, though I reverence its framers, and thank my God that my destiny has been cast in a country governed under the mild, free, and happy auspices of this constitution; though I rejoice that I live in a country where the trembling subject does not bow submissively at the throne of power, but in a country where all are equal; yet I cannot be blind to its defects; I cannot idolize it. I believe that it has wholly failed in this important particular—the election of a President; that an evil exists in this part of the system; and I believe that the plan of amendment proposed, affords the remedy, and, therefore, I have given it my feeble support.

On motion of Mr. PEARCE, the committee then rose.

Dismal Swamp Canal.

An engrossed bill "to authorize the subscription of stock in the Dismal Swamp Canal Company" was read a third time.

Mr. HAYDEN called for the yeas and nays on the question of the passage of the bill, and the call was sustained by the House.

Mr. POWELL said that the yeas and nays had been ordered upon the engrossment of the bill; and that consequently it was not expected they would be again required at this time. For the purpose of giving every gentleman an opportunity of voting upon the bill, he moved for a call of the House. This motion was not agreed to.

Mr. MANGUM said, this bill involved a subject of great importance, and as the yeas and nays had been ordered, he wished every member to have an opportunity of voting on it; and with that view, wished that the bill might be permitted to lie on the table until to-morrow, as the House was now not full. The vote on the bill, on Saturday, was looked upon as the triumph of certain principles, and was exultingly held up as such by certain prints in this city. Mr. M. therefore wished the sense of the House to be fully expressed on the question, that every member might toe the mark; and to afford all of them this opportunity, he moved that the bill be laid on the table.

This motion was also negatived—ayes 69, noes 94.

The question was then taken on the passage of the bill by yeas and nays, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 102, nays 72.

So the bill was passed and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

And the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, March 14.

Amendment of the Constitution.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. McLANE, of Del., in the chair, on the motion of Mr. McDUFFIE to amend the constitution, in relation to the election of President and Vice President of the United States.

Mr. PEARCE rose, and addressed the committee: The question now under discussion I consider of great importance to the small States, and to none more than the small State which I have the honor to represent; and if, consequently, I should ask for all the indulgence that has been given to others, would my request be an unreasonable one? Pardon me, then, for the little time I shall consume in contending, pro aris et focis, for the rights and interests, political force and power, of the small States—for those rights, without the exercise and enjoyment of which, they would become political ciphers, without weight, and without influence.

I will, in the first place, call the attention of the committee to the propositions that have been submitted, twenty-one in number, all differing in some respects, to show that, if amendments are called for, there are but few in this House who can tell what they are, or how they should be made. If, under any circumstances, Mr. Chairman, amendments were, or would be necessary, (and I do not think they would be under any,) I should contend, that existing circumstances and the present time, would not justify any amendment whatever. It appears to me that many of the propositions have grown out of the late Presidential election, and they are made in reference to another election, and, perhaps, to the election of a particular candidate; they are predicated upon the supposed existence of an evil, as to which there are, in the minds of many, very serious doubts, and, taking it for granted that the evil has existed, nothing will satisfy gentlemen but an amendment to the constitution. Propositions of this kind, created or produced by these imaginary evils, are not new in the history of our Government; they were anticipated by the framers of the constitution, and were guarded against, as far as those venerable sages found it expedient to guard against them.

Hence, that wise and salutary feature in the constitution, requiring two-thirds of both Houses of Congress to propose amendments to the constitution, and requiring all amendments, thus proposed, to be ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, before such amendments would become a part of the constitution. Sir, it was never intended that the constitution should be affected by every wind; that it should become the sport of the whim, or caprice, or passion, of every discontented individual, or every man who fancied himself aggrieved or injured. There will be found men enough in every country, who will fancy themselves injured, and, to gratify them, the constitution must be altered. At a critical period in the history of our country, when the late war bore hard upon the people in that section of country from which I come, the Legislatures of several States appointed delegates to meet at a place in Connecticut, rendered memorable by their meeting. Those delegates recommended to the several States the propriety of proposing such amendments to the constitution, as would prohibit Congress from passing any law laying an embargo for any period longer than sixty days. Near this time, the people of Kentucky, dissatisfied with the conduct of one of their senators, who voted against the late war, the Legislature of that State proposed such alterations in the constitution of the United States, as would reduce the term of a Senator in Congress to four years; and the people of Tennessee, who act with unusual despatch, in peace and war, actuated, perhaps, by similar motives, the Legislature of that State proposed amendments to the constitution, which passed both branches, with only six dissenting voices, fixing the senatorial term at three years. Suppose these various propositions had been attended to; suppose all the propositions to amend the constitution that have been made, since its adoption, had been followed up with actual amendments, what would our constitution now have been? Cherish this spirit of innovation, this disposition to make the constitution bend to all the grievances that some men suppose exist, and what will our constitution be in a few years to come? A Mosaic pavement, in truth; here a piece of white stone, and there a piece of black.

So far as relates to the propositions now under discussion, I have not heard any call from the people, that ought to be heeded or regarded. The resolutions adopted by the Legislature of Tennessee, have not yet been concurred in by a single State. The New York Legislature, as well as that of Massachusetts, have reported against them. Neither South Carolina nor Georgia has taken any order upon them; and if any State has, it is unknown to me. Yet, from the tenor of the remarks of some gentlemen, who have addressed the committee, one would be led to believe that the people were ripe for revolt, or, to use the quoted language of the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. POLK,) were ready "to cry aloud, and spare not." Yet the people, who are able, through the Legislatures of the several States, to do, in effect, what we are called upon to do for them, are peaceable, quiet, contented, and satisfied. When they are dissatisfied, I have no doubt we shall hear from them, and they will be listened to. I have heard of three physicians, who, by concert, met the same man at different places, within a given time, each telling him that he was unwell, that he was dangerously ill, and who succeeded in persuading him, though in perfect health, that he was, in fact, dangerously ill. Do gentlemen look for like success in their attempts to satisfy the people their rights are sacrificed, and their liberties in danger? If they do, they will, as I apprehend, be disappointed. There is yet left too much virtue, there is yet remaining too much intelligence. I am, Mr. Chairman, almost prepared to say, that all the amendments to the constitution, which have hitherto been made, were unnecessary. Perhaps the 11th article, relating to the suability of States, was necessary; but the ten preceding ones are, as so many declaratory acts, a bill of rights, an enumeration of rights reserved, but the reservation of which did not depend upon the enumeration of them. They are, in fact, like the propositions of my honorable friend from Massachusetts, (Mr. BAILEY,) giving to Congress the power to make roads, to cut and construct canals, when a large majority of this House have no doubt Congress has now this power, and when a large majority of the nation is as well satisfied as to the power of Congress, as this House is.

I come, now, sir, to the amendment of the constitution, which was made in 1804, relative to the election of President and Vice President. This was the result of a supposed evil manifested in the election of Mr. Jefferson, in 1801.

MARCH, 1826.]

Amendment of the Constitution.

[H. OF R.]

If numerous ballotings were evils, they were indeed manifested; but those kind of evils exist in all our State Legislatures, in the election of Senators to Congress, as well as in the election of other officers. Similar evils exist in all the Eastern States, where, in questions submitted to the people, majorities are necessary to a choice; but, with a full knowledge of them, and the consequent inconvenience and delay growing out of them, the people of the New England States have always submitted to them. In the Presidential election referred to, no one will contend that the people's choice was not elected by the House of Representatives, and that, if a minority President was subsequently elected, a majority President was at that period chosen. But, sir, in regarding too much the inconvenience of that election, and applying a remedy to it—an alteration of the Constitution of the United States—I am apprehensive the rights of the small States were invaded, the effects of which were not foreseen, but will hereafter be seriously felt; and that all the small States which voted for that amendment were guilty of a suicidal act; an act which divested them of one-half of their force and political power; and, adopt the proposed amendments, they will have but a very little, if any, left. It will be conceded, that the small States have a contingent power, and political force, valuable to them as members of the Confederacy, whenever the election of President devolves upon the House of Representatives; and any amendment of the constitution which takes away this contingent power, or renders the exercise of it less frequent, affects the rights of those States which are benefited by the exercise of it. Then the question recurs, was the election more liable to come to the House, previous to the amendment of 1804, than it now is? If it was, then the alteration or amendment was one detrimental to the interests of the small States. But this is not all: that amendment took from the small States an influence in the primary election, which they might have exercised, and which they cannot now exercise. Prior to that amendment, the State of Rhode Island, by her vote alone in the primary election, might have elected the President, or might have determined which of the two candidates voted for, for the Presidency and Vice Presidency, should be the President; and in the election of 1800, if the eight votes of South Carolina had been given to the federal candidates, Adams and Pinckney, (and it was supposed they would have been,) Rhode Island would have elected the President, inasmuch as Mr. Adams received one more of the electoral votes of that State, than General Pinckney. The committee will indulge me while I read one or two extracts from the speech of the late Governor Griswold, of Connecticut, on the amendment of 1804:

"The Constitution of the United States is a compact formed by the several States, to and for the general good. It is well known to have been produced by a spirit of compromise among the several States; that much difficulty arose in its formation; and perhaps in no one article of the constitution could have arisen greater jealousies between the larger and smaller States, than that pointing out the mode of electing the Chief Magistrate. The larger States, as is natural to suppose, would contend for an election according to the number of inhabitants in each State, as they thereby would secure more votes; the smaller States, on the principle that it was a confederation of States, would contend for an equal vote; that is, to vote by States, and not by population or numbers. To settle the difficulty, the present article was agreed to, and thereby both of the above principles, as contended for by the larger and smaller States, adopted to a certain extent; the mode being a mixture of both principles. First, it permits the election of President to be by numbers; that is, giving each State votes in proportion to its population; whereby the larger States, considered in their corporate capacity as States, have the advantage of the smaller States, in their corporate capacity as States. But, in case of a failure of choice in the first mode, then the second, of choosing by States, is to be pursued, whereby the smaller States have an equal vote with the larger States.

"In no other place than on this floor, are the smaller States on an equal footing with the larger States, in the choice of the President of the United States.

"It follows, then, of course, that the greater the chance of bringing the States to a vote on this floor, the more advantageous it is to the smaller States; as, here, the smaller States are as powerful as the larger States. By the constitution, as it now stands, there are two chances for a choice of President on this floor: 1st, when there are more persons than one who have a constitutional majority of votes, and are equal in number; 2d, when there is no person who has a constitutional majority. Only one of the above cases can happen at a time; but there is always a chance for one of the two to happen. But, by the proposed amendment, the first beforementioned chance can never happen; it is wholly taken away, and only one possible chance of voting on this floor by States is left; for, when your ballots designate who is voted for as President, it can never happen that more persons than one can have a constitutional majority of votes. One chance, then, of voting on this floor by States being taken away, by the proposed amendment, it follows, irresistibly, that the smaller States will be injured, and the larger States benefited.

"The present mode for bringing forward candidates for the office of President and Vice President is the least liable to call forth art, intrigue, and corruption; the uncertainty of the event, and the difficulty of making arrangements, are strong checks to the artful and designing. But, the moment the mode pointed out by this resolution is adopted, the door for intrigue and corruption is open; the candidates and their friends can calculate with certainty, and apply the means direct; the power of party, influence of office, art, cunning, intrigue, and corruption, will all be used, and used to effect, because the object is certain."

And now, Mr. Chairman, permit me, in this stage of my argument, to notice one remark of the honorable gentleman from Virginia, who first addressed the committee, (Mr. ARCHER,) that the election of President by the House of Representatives was considered, by the framers of the constitution, as a mere dernier resort, and one which it was calculated would seldom occur. As the constitution stood before 1804, this House was the most probable resort of election, and the framers of the constitution intended it should be: for more than three months and a half, out of the four, the convention were in session, they steadily and uniformly adhered to an election by Congress, and voted down every form of proposition which served to take it from Congress and give it to the people. I will not read the whole of the proceedings of the Convention of 1787, inasmuch as they have been repeatedly referred to; one or two of these extracts will suffice:

"JUNE 2.—In Committee of the Whole, Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, moved to postpone Mr. RANDOLPH's motion, in relation to the Executive, in order to take up his motion, to divide the States into districts, for the choice of electors; this motion was negatived; Yea, Pennsylvania and Maryland, New York divided. Nays, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Delaware, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia.

"It was then voted, that the President should be chosen by Congress for seven years; Yea, Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York, Delaware, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia. Nays, Pennsylvania, Maryland.

"JUNE 19.—The Committee of the Whole reported to the House the resolutions as agreed to—that the President should be appointed by Congress, for seven years, and be ineligible a second time.

"JULY 17.—The ninth resolution from the Committee of the Whole being under consideration, it was moved that the President should be appointed by the people, and not by Congress; Yea, Pennsylvania. Nays, 9. It was then moved that he be chosen by electors appointed by the State Legislatures; Yea, Delaware and Maryland. Nays, 8. It was then voted, unanimously, that the President should be chosen by Congress."

I will not, Mr. Chairman, detain the committee by further reading of the proceedings of the Convention. I have gone far enough to show, that an election by the House was not to the framers of the constitution, by any means, an unexpected event. And I think I have now shown, that the amendment of 1804 was an invasion of the rights of the small States: and, if they are stripped of one right, and divested of one power after another, the time will soon arrive, when they will have nothing remaining, nothing that is worth possessing. If the fundamental principles of Government are to be changed for "light and transient causes," what guarantee have the small States, that will secure to them their equal representation in the other branch of the Legislature? Already we are threatened with a convention of the people, in which every part of the constitution can be altered!

I will now, Mr. Chairman, examine the different modes of appointing electors. "Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number of senators and representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress." This is evidently, to my mind, a State right, and cannot be altered without impairing the rights of the State. Many have contended that the State Legislatures have no right whatever to appoint the electors, and that the framers of the constitution never intended, never contemplated, such an appointment, when, at the first election of President, the electors were appointed in every State in the Union, with the exception of three, by the State Legislatures. These appointments were made when the people could, and no doubt did, avail themselves of the aid, counsel, and services, of the framers of the constitution themselves. The Federalist has been frequently resorted to, as a contemporaneous exposition of the constitution. It has been read to warrant, to illustrate, and to enforce, every argument that has been made. To show that the State Legislatures could appoint the electors, in the opinion of Mr. Madison, although this mode is not with me a favorite one, I hope to be indulged with one extract from No. 45, page 855:

"The State governments may be regarded as constituent and essential parts of the Federal Government, whilst the latter is in nowise essential to the operation or organization of the former. Without the intervention of the State Legislatures, the President of the United States cannot be elected at all; they must, in all cases, have a great share in his appointment, and will, perhaps, in most cases, of themselves, determine it."

In many cases, the State Legislatures may appoint the electors with the fullest approbation on the part of the people: in some, they would be warranted in making the appointments from expediency, policy, and from necessity. Let us advert to the election of Washington to the Presidency, when there was scarcely a dissenting voice, or one raised in opposition to him. In his election, was the appointment of the electors by the State Legislatures an encroachment upon the rights of the people? When Mr. Jefferson was, for the second time, a candidate for the Presidency, there was hardly an organized opposition to him, and in many States in the Union, there was no opposition. Under such circumstances, was the exercise of this appointing power by those State Legislatures who thought proper to exercise it, an invasion of the people's rights? There are cases, I repeat, in which the exercise of this power by the State Legislatures may be justified from necessity, and policy also. Take, for illustration, the case of a State, one-half of which, in time of war, is in the possession of the enemy—this may be considered an extreme case, but it was the situation of Maine during the late war—an election by districts would be impracticable.

ble; and, although the territory, in the possession of the enemy is, for some purposes, considered in the light of a foreign territory, I ask gentlemen, if the electoral votes of a State are to be curtailed by this temporary possession? If not, then, ex necessitate, the Legislature must appoint. We learn from the gentleman from North Carolina, who first addressed the committee, (Mr. SAUNDERS,) that the Legislature of that State once exercised this appointing power, and, in doing so, nobly sustained Mr. Madison. Sir, the case referred to by that honorable gentleman, is a case in point, to show that it is sometimes expedient, and may be good policy, for State Legislatures to exercise this power. The case referred to, was one during the late war; and combinations were then the order of the day; the avowed objects of which were, a speedy peace, and a glorious termination of the war. There was too much reason for believing that these were not the real objects. The votes of Pennsylvania and North Carolina were necessary to secure the re-election of Mr. Madison, and, "to make assurance doubly sure," the Legislature of North Carolina interposed. They were, in my opinion, justified in exercising a right, which, by the constitution, it was lawful for them to exercise, and, under similar circumstances, would be again justified. If the choice of electors had been submitted to the people, the result might have been different, and still that result would not have been a fair expression of the voice of the people of the State, but an expression of the opinions of those who were at home, when ten thousand of the independent freemen of that State might have been abroad, fighting the battles of their country.

In further illustration of this policy and expediency, suffer me to advert to another case, of which I am reminded by seeing near me my worthy friend from Massachusetts, (Mr. EVERETT.) In reference to the political or party distinctions, as they have existed, the town of Marblehead, distinguished as the birthplace of one Vice President, and other illustrious men, and more distinguished for the enterprise, laudable zeal, and uniform patriotism of its citizens, stood, at the commencement of the late war, in the proportion of six hundred and fifty voters on one side, to about sixty or seventy on the other. During the war, the citizens of that place were fighting the battles of their country, in the army, in the navy, on board of private armed vessels—on the land, on the lakes, and on the ocean. The town was literally drained of its population; and, during the war, at one period, the minor party succeeded in electing their candidate to the Legislature of the State. Sir, the political sentiments of a State may be changed in the same way as were changed the political sentiments of the town referred to. I ask, then, sir, if it would be a stretch of power, on the part of any State Legislature, whose members are chosen by a full expression of the opinions of all the people of a State, when at home, and quietly pursuing their wonted occupation, which should exercise this appointing power, although the majority of the people at home, and the majority brought about in the way referred to, entertain opinions different from those of the members of the State Legislature?

These are my reasons, Mr. Chairman, against taking from the State Legislatures the right to exercise this power. I do not presume it will be often exercised: seldom when it is known that the people are averse to the exercise of it; and there may be cases in which it ought to be exercised. I will claim the indulgence of the committee, whilst I examine the proposed mode of choice by districts. It has been already shown that, by this mode, a minority may elect: and the late vote in Maryland has been referred to, where a minority of those who voted, elected seven of the eleven electors. In a late congressional election of Representatives to Congress, by districts, in the State of New York, of the members elected there were chosen, to use terms introduced in the course of this debate, fourteen Clintonians to twenty Bucktail members, when the aggregate votes given to the Clintonians far outnumbered those given to the other party.

The election by districts might, in many cases, restrain the power of large States, and lessen their force and influence, more especially those large States that had not a candidate of their own; and if, coming as I do, from one of the smallest States in the Union, I could be actuated by motives which, I hope, have not influenced others, I should not object to this; but I am not influenced by such considerations; willing to retain all the powers the constitution conferred upon the smaller States; and willing, at the same time, the large States should derive from the constitution all the advantages their numbers can give them. In districts, there is a better field presented for intrigue and corruption; as you lessen the sphere of operation of some men, you enable them to concentrate their forces, and to act with more success and efficiency. There is one view which I shall take of the election by districts, which is different from the views of any of those who have preceded me. It is contended that the district system is necessary to preserve the rights, the power, and influence of the small States. I hold directly the reverse to be the case: district the small States, and, in the primary elections, they will lose what little political force and influence they now have. And why? Because the large States, hereafter, will have the President and Vice President; they will be men who reside in those States, are born there, or are a favorite of those States. From State pride, and the esprit-du-corps, which will always have an influence, they will hereafter present an undivided vote, let the mode of election be what it may, by general ticket, by Legislature, or by districts. The small States, and the States of secondary grade, having no candidates, faction may tear them, and division destroy their force. New York and Pennsylvania have nearly as many of the votes as five of the Eastern States, six of the States lying in the valley of the Mississippi, and New Jersey, and Delaware; the proportion is as sixty-four to seventy-one. Select from New York the candidate for the Presidency, and from Pennsylvania the candidate for the Vice Presidency, and those States will hereafter give an undivided vote, whether the choice be by districts, legislature, or general ticket; but divide the thirteen States to which I have referred, into districts, perhaps the time will never arrive, when one-half of their votes will be given to any one candidate. We cannot judge of the future by the past; the local, the political distinctions, which have existed, will not last forever; and we ought to recollect that, in making this amendment, or the other amendment to the constitution, if we now have in view one political interest, or another interest, the course that will best promote the interest of this or that man, the constitution, with the amendments that may be made, may outlive all those interests and all the individuals, that can be affected by the immediate operation of the amendments that may be agreed to. Leave it optional with the States to elect by district, or otherwise, as may best subserve their own purposes, and as the people of the several States may think best—for they will govern, they will be heard, and will have that mode which they prefer—gentlemen need not give themselves any apprehensions on this subject.

As to the mode of electing members of Congress, in all but the Eastern States, a plurality alone is all that is required to make a choice; in the New England States, the candidate that is elected, must have a majority of all the votes polled. Here, then, is an essential difference as to the mode of choice—a difference I have been made sensibly to feel. Much has been said about a minority President; non constat one-half of the representatives on this floor are minority representatives. The honorable mover of these resolutions may come here as a representative, when a large majority of his constituents may be opposed to his election. I do not think that will soon take place: for I learn that gentleman is deservedly popular in his district; and if zeal, fidelity, and a display of shining talents in advocating their interests, and guarding their rights, can secure popularity, he will with them long continue to be popular. Yet, in that gentleman's district, if A has two thousand and fifty votes, B two thousand and forty-nine, and C two thousand and forty-nine, A is elected, although there is almost a majority of two to one against him; and A, elected under such circumstances, is, undoubtedly, the people's candidate, and is elected by the people. There is, at present, among the States, no uniformity as to the time of electing members, although Congress under the Constitution of the United States, have the power of fixing the time; yet, they never have interfered, and a committee raised upon that subject, at this session, have reported almost unanimously against any interference on the part of Congress. If there be evils growing out of this state of things Congress has wisely left the remedy in the power of the several States, to be applied as they may think most judicious.

I come now, Mr. Chairman, to the other proposition, and certainly the most important one, if the rights and interests of the small States are to be either guarded or protected—the proposition which contemplates the removal of the election of President from the House of Representatives, and the loss which the small States will consequently sustain; judging from the tenor of the remarks and arguments of the honorable mover, they are to have no compensation, and are to be in no way indemnified. This contingent power is all-important to the small States, and, without it, some of them would have never become members of the Confederacy, nor come into the Union. Rhode Island did not become a member until late in the year 1790, and then by a majority of only two votes, in the second convention that was called to adopt the constitution; and this result was produced by bringing to bear the weight and influence of the wealth and aristocracy of the State. Such were the jealousies and apprehensions of the people of that State; so tenacious were they of their rights; they reluctantly yielded their assent, and joined the Confederacy. But, sir, if the members of that Convention had been told, that within thirty-six years of the time the people of that State became members of the Union, propositions would be made, seriously discussed, and strongly, ably enforced, calculated to deprive that State of the benefits one of the features in the constitution gave to it, and the one that was best calculated to preserve the political power of small States, Rhode Island would never have become a member of the national Union, nor come into it other than a conquered province. We need but look into the constitution to show that it was formed in the spirit of compromise and in reference to State rights; and any alterations which affect those rights, is such an infringement upon the compact itself as to destroy the compromise upon which it was formed. The compromise is seen in the equal representation in the Senate, in the treaty-making power, in the apportionment of representatives and direct taxes, and in the choice of President and Vice President, on the final vote, in the House of Representatives; and no part of the compromise is more important to the small States than the latter. To show the light in which the Convention viewed the great work they had completed, I will read one or two extracts from the letter of Washington, written after the constitution was framed:

"It is at all times difficult to draw, with precision, the line between those rights which must be surrendered, and those which may be reserved; and, on the present occasion, this difficulty was increased by a difference among the several States as to their situation, extent, habits, and particular interest. The constitution which we now present is the result of a spirit of amity, and of that mutual deference and concession which the peculiarity of our political situation rendered indispensable."

If the constitution was formed in the true spirit of compromise, it may not be improper to inquire into the relative loss and gain between the large and small States; and if, upon investigation, it shall be found that the common and practical operation of the constitution has been such, and will continue to be such, as to lessen the weight of the small States, with all their contingent advantages, they will be fully justified in claiming and exercising all the rights which were fully guaranteed to them. When the constitution was framed, presented to the people, and adopted by the small States, it was expected the number of States would be increased; but no one anticipated the rapid increase, and no one anticipated the incorporation of States out of territories not within the old dominion of the United States; and every addition of States which has been made to the Union, has decreased the power of the old States, in the Senate of the United States; and has, by making necessary an increase of the representative ratio, decreased also the power of the old States in the other branch of the National Legislature. When the constitution was adopted, the federative voice bore proportion to the popular voice, of twenty-six to sixty-five; there were then thirteen States, with twenty-six Senators, and sixty-five Representatives; of which New Hampshire had three, Massachusetts eight, Rhode Island one, Connecticut five, New York six, New Jersey four, Pennsylvania eight, Delaware one, Maryland six, Virginia ten, North and South Carolina each five, and Georgia three. Now, the federative voice bears a proportion to the popular voice, of forty-eight to two hundred and thirteen. When the constitution was adopted, Rhode Island, with one Representative, had one sixty-fifth of the whole representation, and Delaware the same; but now, Rhode Island, with two Representatives, has not one hundred and sixth part of the whole representation, and Delaware has now a two hundred and thirteenth part of the whole. Each had one-thirteenth of the representation in the Senate; now, but one twenty-fourth. Each had one-thirtieth of the electoral votes; now, Rhode Island has about one sixty-fifth, and Delaware one eighty-seventh. Each had, on the final vote, in the House of Representatives, one-thirteenth—and now, one twenty-fourth. Small States, in apportionments, suffer more than large ones, by their fractions. Take from Rhode Island one Representative, and you take one-half of her whole representation: take from New York one, that State will have thirty-three remaining: and if Rhode Island should lose one Representative, that State must have a large fraction for years. Delaware has now a fraction of thirty-two thousand; and, if the late apportionment bill, as reported by the Committee of the Whole, when under discussion, had become a law, Rhode Island would have been left with a fraction of thirty-eight thousand. Small States are continually liable to suffer in this mode. Once, in every ten years, Rhode Island must struggle for one-half of her representation.

What, sir, is the effect of this fraction, considering the usages, as well as many of the established rules of the Government? In the distribution among the several States of many of the Government favours, I do not speak of Executive patronage, the representative ratio is resorted to as a rule. This is the standard by which the appointment of cadets for the military school is governed. I have now, Mr. Chairman, on my desk, a bill which has been reported, creating a school fund, which contemplates a distribution of the same, according to the number of Representatives in each State; and, upon the principles of this bill, your State has a fraction of thirty-two thousand, which can derive no benefit whatever from it. Small States must always suffer, in the distribution of public moneys. When standing alone, their expectations must be small, or they will certainly be disappointed. The most successful argument that was urged, and probably, the most judicious one, that was made in favor of the fortifications now erecting in Rhode Island, was bottomed upon the importance of the fortifications to other States. The waters of the Narragansett Bay were the key to Long Island Sound, and the Chesapeake Bay. Suppose, sir, a question should arise, in the location of the contemplated naval school, between Delaware and the State of New York—and Delaware, for the sake of the argument, we will say, was the most suitable place, would the small State of Delaware, with one Representative, able and distinguished as he is, stand an equal chance, here or elsewhere, with the great State of New York, with her thirty-four Representatives? These are inconveniences which the smaller States must calculate upon. Suppose two men were equally qualified for the Presidency, and had equal claims, one living in Delaware, and the other in New York, Pennsylvania, or Virginia—which would be the most likely to succeed? Sir, I doubt, if Washington had been a citizen and resident of one of the smallest States, whether he would have been elected a second time.

While the smaller States have not had, by the common operation of the constitution, all the benefits and advantages which they had a right to expect, I will proceed to show, that the influence and political power of some of the larger States have increased, beyond the calculations of the framers of the constitution; and, perhaps, the increase has been much greater than the States to which I shall refer anticipated. I approach, Mr. Chairman, this subject with reluctance, cum manibus certe tremulis—knowing, how sensitive many gentlemen on this floor are, whenever the subject I propose, but for a moment, to examine, is brought into discussion, and believing it right, that their sensations should be excited, whenever any discussion should remind them of their unpleasant and unfortunate circumstances: but, sir, gentlemen will do me the justice to believe me, when I tell them I speak the undissembled sentiments of my heart, when, in my opinion, I declare, that the proposed amendment aims a deadly blow at the political power of the State to which I am indebted for a seat in this House. Shall I not, then, be justified by the occasion, in drawing an argument from any legal source, that will have a tendency to show the fallacy of the arguments in favor of the resolutions, and the injustice of the proposed amendments? The constitution was framed and adopted by the States, in a spirit of compromise: and shall one portion of the States enjoy all the benefits, while another shall be deprived of what it was intended they should enjoy? Sir, one portion of the States have enjoyed all that they could ever have expected, or hoped for—nay, more. I speak in reference to States with “a population of a certain kind.” I will not, on this occasion, nor on any other, if I can possibly avoid it, in this hall, use a term not used in the Constitution of the United States. Who can read the third paragraph, in the second section, and first article, of the Constitution of the United States, and not see the concession made by many of the small States, to the States to which I shall call the attention of the committee. “Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three-fifths of all other persons.”

That this feature of the federative system was considered, at the time the constitution was framed, an advantage to those States having the kind of population to which I have referred, no rational man can doubt. So important was it considered, that it is a well-known fact, that two of the States refused to recommend the constitution, when formed, or to be bound by it, until the first clause in the ninth section of the first article of the constitution was inserted. At the time the constitution was framed, as well as at the period it was adopted, but a few among us thought this population would increase: it was the unceasing prayer of every philanthropist in the country, that it would not; and it was consequently supposed that those States which had this population, would derive no additional advantages from it, in the ratio of representation or otherwise. But, sir, how stand the facts, at this period?

At this moment, this species of population amounts, perhaps, to more than one million seven hundred thousand, and, at the next census, will furnish one-third of the representation from those States where it exists. Those States, with this compound of population and property, have had the full benefit of this feature in the constitution introduced for their benefit. They have, in fact, had the benefit without paying, except in a few cases, the quid pro quo agreed upon: our revenue, except in a very few cases, has been derived from commerce; and but a small part of our war debt has, or will be, paid off by direct taxation. I will not pursue this subject further. The gentleman from Tennessee has intimated it ought never to be referred to, and has told the committee, that, if this population does exist, in the late war some of the States withheld their militia, when called for by the General Government: and this refusal by some States, is to shut out of sight, in this discussion of State rights, the part of the constitution referred to, and the political power given to some States by the means of it! Sir, all the old thirteen States, and particularly the smaller States, who have relied upon their relative importance in the Senate, which is in the inverse ratio of the number of that body, have witnessed a diminution of their strength, in the admission of States into this Union, out of territories not included within the limits of the old domain, at the adoption of the constitution. It is, perhaps, too late to controvert the constitutionality of such admission; and, if it could be questioned, and I think it well might be, necessity, which knows no law, would be resorted to for a justification: the territory must be purchased, to secure the free navigation of the Mississippi, and the deposit at New Orleans; and the purchase could not be effected, without an express stipulation in the treaty of cession, binding the United States to admit “the inhabitants of the ceded territory into the Union, as soon as possible, according to the principles of the federal constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights of citizens of the United States.”

Two States have already been carved out of this territory; and, in the course of time, perhaps, some eight or ten more may be. When the constitution is examined, and it is found to have been “ordained and established for the United States of America,” and for the territory which belonged to the United States, the same being an appendage to the United States: when we view the restricted power, relative to the admission of new States; [here Mr. PEARSON read the third section of article fourth, of the constitution,] it may well be questioned, whether the convention that framed or the State conventions which adopted, the constitution, supposed it capable of a construction that has been put upon it, and which, in this respect, it has received. If they did not, then, here has been an unexpected operation of the constitution, diminishing the power, if not impairing the rights, of the small States, and, in fact, of the whole of the Old Thirteen.

Sir, if public confidence, and a desire to retain

MARCH, 1836.]

Amendment of the Constitution.

[H. OF R.]

it, can give any assurance of a faithful discharge of duties, a Representative of the nation ought to be considered as safe an agent, as a member of a State Legislature. Every member of this House has a good share of the confidence of forty thousand people; a town, a borough, or a district, with comparatively few inhabitants, may return a member of a State Legislature. Again, we are told by the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. McDUFFIE,) that, hereafter, no man can aspire to the Presidential chair, who has not distinguished himself on this floor, or who has not shown himself eminently qualified to discharge the duties of President, by the discharge of the duties of some of the departments of Government. Be it so. Who are the best qualified to judge? And who can best judge of the qualifications of such men? The members of this House, who associate with them, know them well, and see them every day, or the members of a State Legislature, who can know them only by reputation? If, sir, the election is to be sent back to the States, to be by them settled by a vote, in districts, each State to have one vote, my objections will be found applicable to a vote in that mode—perhaps they will apply with more force; the votes in one district, will settle the vote of a State, and twenty men, or less, can control the vote of the district, and those men foreigners, mere birds of passage: for, we are told, by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. EVERETT,) that, in some States, the elective franchise is extended to aliens, and persons not naturalized.

An honorable gentleman from New York, (Mr. CAMBRELENG,) cannot give to the Administration his support. Hinc Lacrymæ. That gentleman is also opposed to an election by the House of Representatives. If the distinguished citizen who now fills the Executive chair, had been elected by the people, would my friend from New York have been satisfied? If not, his objection may not be so much to the mode of election, as to the man elected. But, my friend from New York cannot give to this Administration his support. This declaration created at first, in my mind, some disagreeable sensations, and gave rise to some melancholy reflections. I did not know that the wheels of Government could move, if Hercules withheld his strength. One hundred and eighty clerks in the different departments, I had been told, had been anxiously watching the progress of the appropriation bill, and anxiously waiting its final passage. They were sensibly alive to the subject-matter of this bill. I felt for them: but, since I have ascertained this bill has, or is, in a fair way to become a law, and that the sun, more benign to us than he has been to many of our friends further north, for the last two or three weeks, has, as usual, rose, and, some part of the time, shone, and set, my mind has been greatly relieved. But the gentleman from New York will not try the present Administration by its measures: this he cannot submit to, although his distinguished and magnanimous leader is perfectly willing so to do. Perhaps the gentleman from New York is apprehensive, if he adopts this course, he may find nothing to condemn; and, as condemnation is the order of the day, it is better to condemn without a trial, than not to condemn at all. Since the honorable gentleman has avowed his determination to oppose the Administration at all hazards, and, to do it effectually, is willing to encourage every species of party, I will resort again, but for a moment, to the Federalist, and ask the gentleman if he comes within Mr. Madison's definition of faction.

"By a faction, I understand a number of citizens, whether amounting to a majority or minority of the whole, who are united and actuated by some common impulse of passion, or of interest, adverse to the rights of other citizens, or to the permanent interest of the community."

The gentleman from New York cannot submit to an election by this House, the presiding officer of which is transferred from the Speaker's chair to the place of Secretary of State. Would the gentleman have objected to this transfer, if another candidate had been chosen President; and is he prepared to say, that the friends of one, at least, were not willing that the same transfer should have been made, in the event of the choice of that one? If another candidate had been chosen, the Speaker's chair might have been vacated, and no suspicions would have fallen on him who had so well filled it. Sir, I am prepared to say, that no Administration would have been entitled to the confidence of the nation, and none would have received the confidence of the people, which have overlooked the tried services and just claims of the Secretary of State—the able and zealous advocate of liberty, and whose exertions to perpetuate the blessings of our happy Government and the free institutions of our country, have been unequalled; whose views have not been limited by geographical lines or degrees of latitude, but who has been anxious to extend our blessings to the remotest corners of the earth.

The caucus system, or king caucus, has been introduced; and frequently referred to in the course of the debate; and, while some have contended that the removal of the election from this House is necessary, to prevent the operation of the central power, others have contended that it is necessary to restore regular nominations. I have but a few words to say on this subject; those conventions which followed public opinion, and not those which precede, and endeavor to give a direction to it, will be respected. When the country is divided into parties, they are necessary to concentrate their powers, and to enable the friends of candidates to act with more efficiency. I have, for about twenty years, attended all the caucuses or conventions that have been holden in the State from which I come, except the adjournment of "one un-pledged caucus," and that I did not attend: for, but few could tell where it was holden, and but a few could be admitted; and I have almost invariably found that all which were in obedience to public opinion, were respected, and as often as men attempted to dictate to others the course they should adopt, so often were conventions or caucuses disregarded. Had I been a member of Congress when Jefferson was nominated, when Madison was nominated, when Monroe was nominated, as candidates for the Presidency, I would have attended the meetings that nominated them; public opinion had, before their nominations by those meetings, fixed upon them; had I been here when the sixty-six assembled in this Hall, I would not have attended the meeting—public opinion was not settled at that time, in favor of either of the numerous candidates, and the object of the meeting was to give a direction to public opinion, which was not to be influenced by the meeting. Of eleven States represented at that meeting, but two voted for the candidate there nominated.

Amidst all the anticipated evils and direful calamities conjured up by disordered minds, the resolutions of an honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. M'NEER,) resolutions which embody more good sense than all the others which have been offered, afford some solace to the mind; "the people are virtuous and intelligent, and their Representatives are worthy of confidence." And if there be any want of virtue or intelligence, the best and surest mode to supply it, and maintain purity of election, is the establishment of free schools; for this purpose, giving the new States all they reasonably require, let a part of the nation's domain be parcelled out for the support and maintenance of public schools in the old States.

I have endeavored, Mr. Chairman, to convince the committee of the impropriety of the proposed alterations, and of the importance of that feature in the federative system, to the small States, which it is proposed to take from them. The constitution may be considered as a compact; at the time it was formed, some deference was thought to be due to the situation and services of the parties to it. It becomes not me to say much of the services of my native State, during our revolutionary struggle, her sufferings, or privations; but I am warranted in saying, that during that struggle, Rhode Island furnished more men, and lavished more treasure, for the common cause, in proportion to her numbers and her wealth, than any State in the Union. She fought the enemy wherever he was to be found; the war was carried to her very firesides. The island on which I reside, once the Eden of America, was, for a long period, the seat of war; our green fields were laid waste, our orchards cut down, houses burnt, and temples, dedicated to the worship of Almighty God, were converted into barracks and hospitals for a British soldiery. The effects of the Revolutionary War are yet visible in the heart of Rhode Island. To fight her battles at home, and to furnish her quota to fight the battles of the nation, she raised regiments upon her own credit and responsibility; regiments composed of men who have not yet tasted the bounty of the nation, many of whom are now feeding upon individual charity, and all of whom are left in old age, to

"Weep o'er their wounds, o'er tales of sorrow done, Shoulder their crutch, and show how fields were won."

Sir, during the late struggle, Rhode Island was not behind her sister States in her contributions of blood and treasure. Some of our incorporated institutions subscribed their capitals to the Government loans; our private armed vessels made the enemy, even at Lloyd's, sensible of the existence of war. At the memorable battle of Bridgewater, when the gallant and intrepid Towson was pouring from the mouths of his field-pieces sheets of fire, and carrying destruction into the ranks of the enemy, he was covered, in part, by a Rhode Island officer, commanding Rhode Island men—by an officer who went into battle at the head of a company, with a full complement of men, whose company, when the battle was over, mustered seventeen men, who were not killed or wounded. A son of Rhode Island, at the head of a gallant crew, from the same State, fought the battle of the Lake—no, sir, in this I am mistaken, he had not the gallant crew with which he started from Newport—at Sackett's Harbor these men were taken from him, and he had thrown on his hands the refuse, the abandoned of God's creation; with such stuff the lamented Perry, with a great proportion of Rhode Island officers, fought the battle of Erie, when, for the first time in the history of our country, fleet met fleet, and, for the first time, fleet captured fleet. If, in two struggles, we have presented this burning lamp, are gentlemen now ready to put out this light? I would, Mr. Chairman, were it necessary on this occasion, appeal to the feelings, and summon to my aid the sympathies of other States. Vigorous Vermont, though yet in your infancy, your power has been curtailed, and, six years ago, you were reminded of the importance and value of this part of the constitution, now attempted to be taken away. Connecticut, the voice of eloquence has already given assurances of your fidelity. Delaware, you will cling to this part of the constitution, as the sheet-anchor of your hope. Ohio, recollect the sons of Rhode Island and Connecticut first broke ground upon the banks of the Muskingum; your soil now embosoms the ashes of the most eloquent advocate that ever graced the courts of Rhode Island. Virginia, proud, and justly proud, the land of heroes, patriots, statesmen, and philosophers, are you prepared for this amendment? You have already had some warning of old age and decrepitude; the ceptre of your power may be transferred to other hands; the power of some vaunted State may hereafter write the his jacet of your glory. Mr. Chairman, I have done—if the resolutions do pass, I shall be consoled with the reflection of having made an effort, feeble as it has been, to prevent their passage—

Si Pergama dextra
Defendi possent, etiam hac defensa fuissent.

I submit the interest of the State I represent to the justice and magnanimity of the House.

Mr. Wood, of New York, then rose, and spoke as follows :

Mr. Chairman : It is a question relative to the organization of the General Government—the mode of appointing the chief Executive Magistrate—in the abstract, of very little consequence, but in its connection, of vast importance. It involves the principles of liberty, and enters into the foundation on which it rests. It is an instrument provided by the constitution for the preservation of freedom, and this alone renders it of much importance.

The subject has been involved in some obscurity, by not distinguishing clearly between the objects of the State and General Governments, and the relations which the people bear to each.

Let us trace the history of our Government from its origin. When the colonies dissolved their connection with Great Britain, the sovereign power devolved upon the people of this country. The people of each State formed or adopted a constitution, with more or less power. Some States invested their Governments with entire sovereignty, others with limited powers. During the war of the Revolution, the States took a part of the powers, of a general nature, from their State constitutions, and, with them, formed a confederate Government for the thirteen States, to enable Congress to carry on the war, and to form treaties with other nations; the States retained the power over commerce and taxation; Congress supplied the public treasury by quotas on the States.

This mode of supplying the treasury proved inefficient, and led to the formation of the present constitution on the basis of the confederation. The only essential powers that were added, were those over commerce and taxation; the government of territories; the disposition of the public land; and a National Judiciary; and the Government was made to have a national operation.

Why did the people of the several States divide the powers of sovereignty between the two Governments? The history of the times shows that it was done from a conviction that a single National Government was unsafe, and would prove hostile to liberty; that a single Government, for a country of such extent and diversity of interest, must be invested with so much energy as would lead to despotism.

The people of the several States divided those powers which they thought fit to delegate, between the two Governments, in such manner as to adapt them to the respective ends for which they were designed.

The State Governments were intended to protect the rights of their members, within their respective limits, from injuries, without force. The General Government was intended to protect the rights of the citizens of all the States from internal and external force, and upon the ocean. The people of each State, in relation to the State Government, are to be considered in a separate federal or political capacity, as citizens of that particular State of which they are members; and, in relation to the General Government, they are to be considered in an aggregate or national capacity, as citizens of the United States. The rights and interests of the people, in one capacity, are not opposed to their rights and interests in their other capacity, but are in perfect harmony. What is necessary for the security of their liberties, in one capacity, is necessary in the other. The safety of the people, in both capacities, depends on the preservation of each Government within its proper limits. The only opposition in the case, is, between those who wish to deprive the States of a portion of their power, and those who wish to prevent it; between those who wish to disturb the present adjustment of powers between the two Governments, and those who are opposed to it; between those who wish to transfer a part of the power of the States to the General Government, and those who wish to retain it.

The framers of the General Government seem to have anticipated that the possession of the sword and the purse, with the patronage it must command, would give that Government a preponderating influence, which might become dangerous to the States, and they endeavored to provide means to counteract this tendency to enlargement, which they foresaw, by giving the States the appointment of a portion of the officers who were to administer it; by limiting its powers to a few enumerated objects; and by a prudent distribution of its powers.

The election of the chief Executive Magistrate of the General Government, is, by the constitution, to be made by electors to be appointed by the several States, in such manner as the Legislatures thereof shall direct, and, in case the electors shall fail to make a choice, the delegations of the respective States, in the House of Representatives, are to select the President from the three candidates having the highest number of electoral votes, in their Federal or political capacities, each State having one vote.

A State, in all cases where the term is used in the constitution, in relation to choice or action, is to be considered as a moral person, and evidently means the people, in their corporate or political character. The Legislature is the organ by which the people express their will, in the first instance, and by which they direct the mode or manner in which their will shall be otherwise expressed.

The true meaning of this article of the constitution is, that the people of each State shall appoint electors, in such manner as they, in their corporate or political capacity, shall see fit. This power to regulate the mode of appointing electors in each State, is, therefore, a State right, and is to be exercised according to the unqualified discretion of the people of the State. This is the constitutional regulation, and does away the objection relative to the want of uniformity: uniformity implies regulation, and is incompatible with discretion; to regulate it would be to destroy it.

The people of each State are at liberty to exercise this right in the manner in which they shall judge it will be most beneficial to their interests. They may make the appointment by delegates chosen for the sole and express purpose, or they may appoint the electors themselves in the first instance, either by a general ticket, or by larger or smaller districts.

The object of the power was to secure the integrity and independence of the several States, by reserving to them the control over the election of the chief Executive Magistrate of the General Government, who would be, in some measure, responsible to them, and who would be bound, by this tie, to resist any course of policy that would lead to an abridgment of the power and influence of the States, or who, as a faithful sentinel, would apprise them of the approach of danger from that quarter. This power is a most efficient weapon of self-defence; it will enable the States, in any crisis that may threaten their independence, to arrest the motions of the Government, and avert the danger. It is a federal power of resistance, analogous to that power which is inherent in the people of every Government to arrest its career when it becomes destructive of the ends of the social contract.

In case a Cæsar should ever obtain the Executive chair, and should attempt to remove the obstructions which the State Governments would interpose to his ambition, the States, by the bare refusal to act, may, within four years, arrest his course, and reduce him to a private station.

Although it is a powerful, yet it is a peaceable weapon of self-defence; it is a civil remedy provided by the constitution, as a substitute for civil war and bloodshed, and a preservative against the miseries it inflicts; it is a wise provision, which will enable the States to reclaim the Government from its errors, without annihilating or changing it; to bring it back to first principles, and to reanimate it with the spirit of liberty; it was a precious invention of the Convention who framed the constitution, and is peculiar to the Federal Government. It is, also, a harmless power; it can only be used by the States in concert, and is a measure to which they will never resort, except in extreme cases, when their independence is at stake. All important, however, as this power is, it can only be exercised by the people of the several States, in their political capacities. To take the control of the election from the States is to annihilate it. It is a Federal, and not a national power, and cannot be exercised in a national capacity. Take it from the States, and they will still be political societies, but, like Samson shorn of his locks, their strength will be gone. Would it not be a species of self-immolation for the States to surrender a power so interwoven with their political existence?

The resolutions before the committee, both involve the same principle. They propose to take from the States all manner of control over the election of President—incipient or final—to destroy its Federal character, and to make it national.

They assume to confer a benefit, by making the election uniform by districts in every State, and, under this disguise, propose to strip the people of the several States of their constitutional power over the election, and aim a deadly blow at one of the strongholds of their liberties.

The adoption of the resolutions would make the election of the President purely national; would deprive the people of the several States, in their political capacities, of their constituent power, and render him irresponsible to them.

The preservation of the public liberty requires that the boundaries of the two Governments should be observed. The objects of the General Government, and the nature of its powers, are calculated to give it a preponderating influence over those of the States. It is our shield in war; its offices have more attractions for talent and ambition than those of the States, and its public expenditures embrace a wider range, and are more diffusive in their benefits.

Roads, bridges, and canals, are the subjects of internal improvement. Their use is to facilitate intercourse and transportation, from one place to another.

If any subjects whatever require municipal regulation more than others, these are those subjects. Roads and bridges were a part of the trinoda necessitas to which every citizen was bound to contribute by the ancient law. They are altogether of a local nature; they require local taxation, local superintendence, and local protection. Internal improvement was not among the purposes for which the General Government was instituted, nor is it the object of any one of its enumerated powers. If the General Government has any power over the subject, what are its limits? How is it to be carried into effect, without interfering with the Legislative and Judicial authority of the States?

It appears to me that the general subject clearly belongs to the States, and that the cases in which it may possibly become necesnary to the execution of the enumerated powers of the General Government, are exceptions to the rule, and a confirmation of it.

The extension of the powers of the General Government, to any subject evidently within the cognizance of the States, removes one barrier against the inroads of that Government upon the sovereignty and independence of the States.

An ambition for national aggrandizement is not easily confined to prescribed limits, nor is it apt to be checked by constitutional scruples. How has it happened that a constitution framed for the territory ceded to the United States, by the treaty of 1783, has been extended to the American Archipelago, on the one hand, and to the Pacific Ocean on the other? Might it not, on the same principles, be extended to embrace the Island of Owyhee, on the one side, and St. Domingo on the other?

Sir, the intention of the framers of the constitution is further evinced by the distribution of its power among the different branches of the Executive and Legislative departments.

The President is elected for four years; is commander-in-chief of the army and navy; has the exclusive power of nominating public officers—but the concurrence of the Senate is necessary to their appointment; he has the power of negotiating treaties—but the consent of two-thirds of the Senators present is necessary to their ratification; and he has a qualified negative in legislation.

The House of Representatives is elected for two years; has the exclusive right of originating impeachments; has the exclusive power of originating revenue laws, subject to the power of the Senate to amend them as in other cases, and a co-equal power with the Senate in ordinary legislation; and has the power of electing the President in case no choice is made by the Electors, when the members vote by States, each State having one vote.

The Senate is elected for six years; has the exclusive power of trying impeachments, except in case of the impeachment of the President, when the Chief Justice is associated with them; has co-equal power with the House of Representatives in legislation, except in the origination of revenue bills; has a concurrent power with the President in the appointment of public officers; and the consent of two-thirds of the members present is necessary to the validity of a treaty.

The permanency of the Senate, and the various powers, Executive, Legislative, and Judicial, vested in that body, renders it the pre-eminent power of the constitution. The union of the Senate with the Executive, in the treaty-making power, is calculated to give that body an important influence, if not the principal control, over our foreign relations. It is the property of every permanent body to carry its powers to their utmost extent.

affirms, that history furnishes no instance of a relinquishment of power by an organized body of men, unless it was imposed on them by a foreign hand. A disposition to monopolize a control of this power would embarrass our negotiations; would destroy the responsibility of the Executive; would deprive the country of the benefits of his wisdom and experience, and would strip the department of its most important feature.

The principal security we have for the faithful exercise of the vast powers vested in the Senate, is the personal character of its members: the body may be considered as permanent; the members share the patronage of Government, as well as contribute to confer it; they are not liable to impeachment, and their responsibility is weakened by the changeable character of the State Legislatures. They are the sole guardians of their own purity; and the only reliance of the nation against the corruption of the body, is upon the moral sense, and the sense of honor, of the individual members, and upon the disposition which their self-respect will dictate to preserve the body from contamination, by the power of expulsion.

Constituted as the Senate now is, it is to be wished that no man should be advanced to the honor of a seat in that august assembly who is not as pure as was Aristides, as wise as Solon, and as patriotic as Regulus.

Exceptionable as the constitution of the Senate is in theory, a different organization might be liable to greater practical evils. If the sole power over our foreign relations was vested in the Executive, the shortness of his term of office, and the frequent changes of the incumbents, might lead to a changeable policy, or to a more exceptionable course of temporizing expedients.

Why was the Senate made the depository of so large a portion of the powers delegated to the General Government? Why was it put in the power of that body to control the operations of both the Executive and Legislative departments of the Government? It was, doubtless, because the members of the Senate represented the States; were chosen by them, and were responsible to them, and would be bound by this tie to defend the sovereignty and independence of the States against any plan of policy that would impair them, or, in case they should fail in their efforts to do this, would be bound to apprise the States they represented, of the danger with which they were threatened.

I shall now notice a few of the reasons assigned for taking the ultimate or contingent election from the House of Representatives, which have not been as fully answered as others.

It is said that the election by the House of Representatives, violates the maxim which inhibits the division of power between the Executive and Legislative departments.

The election involves no exercise of Executive or Legislative power: it is a constituent act, by the delegations of the several States, in their Federal capacities, constituting a President. It is an act in which no other department has any participation; when the choice is made, the power ceases. The objection, therefore, does not apply to a case like this.

It is also alleged that those who vote for the successful candidate will become the partisans of his administration. In answer to this it may be observed, that the majority are under no stronger moral or political obligations to support the administration of an Executive, elected according to the forms of the constitution, than the minority. Every citizen is bound, by his allegiance, to support the constitutional measures of the Government, while they continue in force.

Sir, intimations have been suggested in this debate, favoring an opposition of the minority to constitutional authority, which I consider hostile to the very being of the Republican system.

The constant calumny of the motives of public men, not only lessens the veneration for them in the minds of the people, but, by the principle of association, lessens their general estimate of character, lessens their own self-respect, and thus removes one of the strongest guards of virtue, and lowers the standard of the public morals.

It is this trait in the moral constitution of man that gives to education its power in forming the moral character of youth; and an intelligent writer contends that, by a wise improvement of this faculty, it is in the power of the public rulers of a State to improve the moral character of the nation; that the public policy may be so modified, in relation to our moral feelings, as to render a people humane or cruel, brave or timid, high-minded or mean-spirited, virtuous or vicious.

It is further alleged, that the election in the House of Representatives exposes the members to be diverted from their duty by Executive patronage.

The refutation of the leading feature of this objection, by the gentlemen who have preceded me, exempts me from the necessity of noticing it.

I should have no objection to transfer this power to any other body, provided the federative principle was preserved, if I could discover that there was any such, who would be under stronger obligations to consult the public interests, or better qualified to promote them.

It is proposed to send the election back to the electoral colleges, or some other board of electors. I cannot perceive any advantage to be gained by this arrangement.

Every election, after the first, must be by States, each State giving one vote, to preserve the original compact of the constitution with the small States, and to preserve the great conservative principle of State sovereignty and independence; and there is no body of this nation more responsible, or better informed, than the House of Representatives.

Mr. Chairman, something has been said, in the course of this debate, respecting the danger to which our liberty is exposed, and respecting the means of preserving it. It has been the purpose of my argument to show, that the adoption of the resolutions before the committee would endanger our liberty, and that the preservation of the power, secured to the States in their political capacities by the constitution, over the election of the President and Senate, and the restriction of the operations of the General Government to its constitutional limits, are essential means of preserving it.

I will, in conclusion, make a few more particular observations respecting the principles that constitute the foundation of free States, with as much brevity and simplicity as possible, with some historical illustrations.

Civil liberty depends on the organization of society, the moral character of the people, and a free constitution. An equality of rank and property among the people, intelligence and virtue to qualify them for submission to the will of the majority, and a constitution embracing the principles of liberty, are essential to a well-ordered Republic; and it will be weakened or destroyed by such causes as are calculated to modify or change any of these elementary principles.

A free constitution ought to secure the principle of representation, periodical election, personal security, trial by jury, and a free press.

The Greeks enjoyed an equality of rank and property, and, in the early period of their history, were virtuous and intelligent; but they were ignorant of the advantages of a Representative Government, and their constitutions were extremely defective in their organization.

The contests between those among whom the different powers of government were allotted, generated factions. These made the people venal and licentious, and rendered them incapable of self-government, and the admission of Philip of Macedon to a seat in the Amphictyonic Council, put a period to their independence.

The Romans were divided into ranks. The people, in the early stages of the Republic, were virtuous, but the Government was badly organized. Although the people had a share in the choice of their magistrates and public officers, and in making their laws, yet they never understood the true principles of representation, nor did they apply them to the case of legislation.

After the expulsion of the kings, the principal power was lodged in the Senate, which was composed of the patricians, and became an iron-handed aristocracy.

The rigorous measures of that body forced the people to retire from the city to the sacred mount, and the establishment of the tribunitial authority was the condition of their return. The Tribunes had a negative upon the acts of the Senate; the boundary between the powers of the two bodies was indefinite, and the contests between them for power generated factions and corrupted the people. War was the principal occupation of the citizens; agriculture, commerce, and the arts, were the employment of slaves. While not engaged in war, they were idle, and became venal. The armies, by being suffered to plunder the provinces, became licentious, and the republic became the spoil of ambition, a victim of faction, and a licentious soldiery. Cæsar did not aspire for the empire until the people of Rome had become incapable of self-government, and were prepared for a master.

Amendment of the Constitution.

By the feudal system, modern Europe was divided into ranks of princes and hereditary nobles, who engrossed the lands; and the common people, who were their tenants, and, until the establishment of standing armies by Charles the Seventh, in 1448, formed the soldiery of the different States or kingdoms. The people had no share in Government. The whole powers of Government were vested in the princes and nobility.

This organization of society and Government still exists in most countries in Europe, and precludes the existence of free Government. A free constitution is incompatible with a feudal organization of society. Power will follow property where it is engrossed by a few hands, and who are fortified in its enjoyment by restraints against alienation. It is a law of our being, that men should be governed by those upon whom they are dependent for subsistence.

The forms of a free Government are of little use without the capacity to enjoy it. The establishment of such a Government on a feudal basis would be, in a great measure, useless to the people; the elections would be controlled by the king and the nobles, and every measure would be dictated by them. Such a Government would probably be an evil, by making the people the instruments of strengthening the chains that bind them to their condition.

These are the reasons why the attempts to establish free Governments in France, and elsewhere, on a feudal organization of society, have failed, and, while it continues, must fail.

Before free Governments can succeed in those countries, society must be reorganized; rank must be abolished, or some means adopted to countervail its influence; the restraints against the alienation of real property must be removed, and the people admitted to an equality of political rights, and instructed in the elements of freedom, to render them capable of self-government.

Liberty was established in England, by the Saxons, before the feudal system was introduced by William the Norman. The spirit of liberty and feudalism have been in perpetual conflict from that period to the present time, and every revolution in that country has terminated in favor of public liberty. It was the spirit of Saxon liberty which produced the representation of the people in Parliament, and procured the great charter, trial by jury, the habeas corpus act, a free press, and all the limitations on the royal prerogative. The same spirit has made great inroads on the feudal system of landed property; has contrived means to unfetter inheritances, and remove the restraints against alienation.

These innovations in the laws of real property in England, with the immense accumulation of personal property, created by the exertions of an industrious people vigorously employed in agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, countervail, in a great degree, the influence of the feudal organization of society; and the power of the representatives of the people, over the public supplies, forms a balance to the hereditary principles of the constitution, and renders them, compared with other countries where the feudal system prevails, a free people.

An equality of rank and property, the virtue and intelligence of the people, and the freedom of their constitutions, make the United States the freest nation on earth.

The people of the several States framed the confederation to manage the affairs of peace and war, and to regulate their intercourse with other nations. In framing the present constitution of the General Government, to the powers of peace and war they added the power over commerce and taxation, and gave it a national operation.

They rely upon the State Governments for the protection of their rights against injuries without force, and upon the General Government for protection from external and internal violence.

The security of our liberties depends on the concurrent operation of the two Governments in their respective limits. The tendency of things is to give a preponderance to the General Government. The invasion of the powers of the States by the General Government, and the corruption of manners, are the principal sources of danger to public liberty. An ambitious spirit for national aggrandizement and national glory, leads to the first evil, and faction to the second.

The proper exercise of the power which the States now have by the constitution, over the election of the President and Senate, will enable them to check the inroads of the General Government on their sovereignty and independence. Public virtue and an enlightened public opinion only can check the progress of faction.

The object of the resolutions before the committee is to take from the States one of the principal means provided by the constitution for their security against the encroachments of the General Government upon the rights reserved to the States. Before the advocates of the resolutions can with any propriety ask for the surrender of the power which the States now have over the election of President, they are bound to show that the reservation of this power is not necessary for the security of the States in any crisis that can happen in a conflict for power between the two Governments. That a surrender of the power will not augment the comparative influence of the General Government—or that the State Governments are not necessary, and that a Government purely national would be a better safeguard to our liberties.

Sir, I have given my sentiments freely on the several topics I have mentioned. I have no interest but the welfare of my constituents, and preservation of the public liberty.

There is some reason to believe that the result of the late election has some influence on this discussion. It is always unwise to make great changes to suit a particular crisis.

It was of little consequence to the public liberty which of the candidates succeeded—they were all honorable men—but it is of vital importance to the public liberty that the States should retain all the essential powers which the constitution has provided for their security.

On motion of Mr. ISAACS, the committee then rose, and having obtained leave to sit again,

The House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, March 15.

After the reading of the journal, Mr. OWEN rose, and announced to the House the death of the Honorable CHRISTOPHER RANKIN, the Representative from the State of Mississippi, in the following terms:

Mr. Speaker, the painful duty of announcing to the House the death of the distinguished Representative of the State of Mississippi, has devolved on me. I do not, I cannot attempt a panegyric on the memory of the deceased. His death is a national calamity. He was, sir, a statesman, a patriot, and an honest man: his loss to his State is irreparable; his place here cannot easily be filled. Virtuous, philanthropic, and charitable, all who knew him were his friends—enemies he had none.

Whereupon, on motion of Mr. OWEN, the House came to the following resolutions:

Resolved, unanimously, That the members of this House will testify their respect for the memory of CHRISTOPHER RANKIN, by wearing crape on the left arm for thirty days.

Resolved unanimously, That the members of this House will attend the funeral of the late CHRISTOPHER RANKIN, to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

Resolved, That a Committee of Arrangement be appointed, and the Senate be notified thereof.

And then the House adjourned

THURSDAY, March 16.

This day was devoted, by both Houses of Congress, to funeral solemnities, consequent on the death of Mr. RANKIN.

TUESDAY, March 21.

Amendment of the Constitution.

On motion of Mr. McDUFFIE, the House again went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the resolutions heretofore submitted by him, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. ISAACS addressed the committee as follows:

Mr. Chairman: If the subject now referred to the committee were like the ordinary objects of legislation upon which we are called to act, it would long since have been exhausted; but the history of man, the nature of man, the structure of our Government, and our experience under it, furnish the sources from which this investigation must be drawn; and those sources are inexhaustible.

Before I proceed to consider the propositions comprehended in these resolutions, permit me to notice some objections which have been thrown in the way of our progress. It is objected that this is not a proper time to act upon the amendments proposing a change in the constitution, relative to the election of the President and Vice President, because we have just gotten out of that contest: two years ago we were told that that was not a proper time to act on these same amendments, because we were then upon the eve of that election; and two years hence the same objection will be repeated. May I ask, then, when will be the proper time? The answer will be, that, to such as made the objection, that time will never come—the four years between the last and the next Presidential election is just as long as it ever will be between those periodical occurrences.

It is also said, that the number of resolutions, and the various plans which have been proposed, is another objection to our proceeding in this undertaking. That circumstance may, and I fear will, occasion some difficulty, and probably the greatest which may be found, in settling down upon any given proposition; but it certainly does not prove that the attempt ought not seriously to be made; on the contrary, it is but another proof that the state of things requires it; that the country expects it; that the people are ripe for it; that the necessity of the case is apparent, from actual experiment; and hence it is, that propositions from all parts of the Union have poured in upon us, the whole of them pointing to such a change in the mode of electing these officers, as shall prevent the choice from being referred to Congress. This, I believe, is a strong feature in all the resolutions which have been submitted, except that grave resolve of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. MINKER,) which, in effect, asks that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union shall determine that the constitution is the constitution. The gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. EVERETT,) indeed, concludes that all these propositions are only so many violations of the constitution, which we are all sworn to support. And the gentleman from Maine, (Mr. HERRICK,) who seems to have looked further into this matter, and discovered that the constitution has provided for its own amendment, and pointed out the mode, is willing that it should be so amended as to prevent amendment oftener than once in ten years.

Amendment of the Constitution.

Previous to the meeting of this Congress, a recommendation for the amendment of this instrument was expected from another quarter, which, if it had been made, would doubtless have been high authority with many who now oppose these resolutions. The President, in his letter of acceptance of the office which he now holds, expressed himself "deeply sensible to the circumstances under which it had been given." Adverting to the fact "that all his predecessors had been honored with majorities of the electoral voices, in their primary colleges," he deploras the "misfortune" in which the division of sentiment had placed him, and particularly the irreconcilable fact, of one of his competitors having been "recommended by a larger minority of the primary electoral suffrages than himself." To "give an immediate opportunity to the people to form and express, with a nearer approach to unanimity, the object of their choice," it was confidently expected that the President, in his opening message to Congress, would have recommended such amendments of the constitution that thereby the reference, so desirable, might, in future, be made, and such as would prevent either himself or his successors, from ever finding themselves under the painful necessity of accepting that "eminent charge," without the majority which he so sensibly felt his want of. But this recommendation was not made.

Upon that resolution which proposes so to amend the constitution as to prevent the election from devolving upon Congress, there is no middle ground; we must here take sides. We are not here adjusting the manner in which the people shall exercise this invaluable right, but we are deciding whether they shall enjoy it at all. Whether they shall keep it, or whether it shall be taken from them.

Tell's arrow must be true to its aim, or his child will bleed. This youthful but herculean republic must strangle the monster Patronage, or it will strangle him.

Mr. Chairman: In support of the second resolution, proposing a "uniform mode of electing by districts," I shall not spend the time of the committee in showing, that it is preferable to the practice in some States, of choosing electors by the Legislature. That practice has found so few friends here, that it can have no claims to competition.

The gentlemen who have supported, with so much zeal and ability, the propriety and essential right of a State to vote altogether according to the general ticket plan, have, with much force, and probably some effect, contended that, according to the spirit and whole frame of the constitution, the right of the States to choose electors is based on the federative, and not on the popular principle. My answer is, that the constitution has assimilated this power of choosing electors to the power of choosing Representatives to Congress; it has adopted the same rule with regard to the numbers of each; it has based the right of choosing Representatives most clearly on the popular principle; and it has made the other, in all its material and striking affinities, exactly like it.

In the House of Representatives, the people are represented according to their numbers; and not the States regardless of their numbers. The constitution directs that "the number of Representatives shall not exceed one for every thirty thousand, but each State shall have one Representative;" and the power was granted to Congress to increase, at stated periods, the number that should be entitled to this one Representative. Then, at whatever number the ratio shall be fixed, that number, as one integral, and for this purpose independent, part of the whole population, has its own and sole Representative in this House; it has the right to choose who he shall be, and the power to hold him to a strict accountability to them, for the duties which its choice imposes on him. And in this choice, and this responsibility, consists the great security which the people have upon their Representatives.

As to electors, the constitution directs that "each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which such State may be entitled in Congress." Now, the argument that this power of appointing electors belongs to the States, purely in their sovereign and independent character, proves too much. A State is a State, the Union over. Delaware, with its one Representative and three electors, as a State possesses all the attributes of sovereignty which belong to the State of New York, which, by the constitution, is entitled to thirty-six. The latter, then, cannot have this advantage over the former on the ground that they are both States: for, in that respect they are equal, and each would be entitled exactly to the same number. But it is upon the principle, that, in conferring the power in question, the constitution has gone beyond the corporate character of the State, and has adapted the number both of Representatives and electors, to the actual enumeration of inhabitants in each State.

So far, then, as the analogy holds good between members of the House of Representatives and electors, the argument that the right of choosing the latter is purely and entirely federative, must fall to the ground. I admit that the two electors, corresponding with the two Senators from each State, has more the semblance of the federative character, but this would only prove, that, as to electors, the representative principle was adopted in both its popular and federative features.

In this respect, however, we are not determining what the constitution is, but what it should be; and the question is, whether the power of choosing electors, is either in whole or in part necessarily federative? I have already attempted to show that, in principle, it is, and should be, a popular right; that the number of people competent to have a voice in the election should, to that extent, be a unit, and, consequently, each State should be divided into as many districts as the number of electors to which they are entitled.

Let us next inquire what advantage the mode of electing by general ticket can be to any of the States. I know that some of the large States resort to it for the purpose of uniting their whole strength, and bringing their undivided vote in favor of a candidate, who may have a bare majority of the State; but the united vote in one State is just the same, in proportion to its population, as it is in another. No, sir, I am mistaken; the smaller the State the greater is that relative strength. Take, for example, a State entitled to thirty-six votes, and another entitled to three; the former has only an elector for every forty thousand, with the small fraction of two-seventeenths over; the latter has its elector for its forty thousand inhabitants, and two electors more; and, in this manner, all the States between these two extremes, put forth their relative strength—the smaller the State the greater is the strength, in proportion to its numbers, on account of the two electors corresponding with the two Senators.

Another argument opposed to the general ticket plan, is, that, when adopted by one, it acts as a kind of moral coercion upon all to adopt it. No matter how strongly the direct system might be preferred by the States—when the general ticket practice is pursued by others, the districted States must either yield their own most favorite mode, or permit the others to gain an advantage over them in the election; neither of which ought they to be subjected to.

This argument leads us to the proposition for prescribing a uniform mode of electing. But before I dismiss this part of the subject, I must take one moment to brush away the dust which all the gentlemen opposed to these resolutions attempt to throw in our eyes. We are, by all of them, reminded of the partial representation of the slave population in those States where it exists. And the gentleman from Rhode Island (Mr. PRABCE) has given us a calculation, from which he assumes the fact, that this constitutional representation amounts to twenty-five members on this floor. Be it so. By that same constitution, so much venerated and so little loved by some gentlemen, an ample equivalent is given. If that population produces twenty-five Representatives, it also produces an excess of about twelve and a half per cent. of direct tax, which is taken off the States where slavery does not exist, and laid on those where it does: and this, in times of general pressure, when the resources of money and credit are nearly spent, and revenue must be raised, is an item in the account of profit and loss, which gladdens the eyes of the gainers, perhaps more than the sight of its equivalent in representation here may do.

The reasons in favor of uniformity in the mode of electing are so plain and obvious, that I need not spend time in bringing them forth to view. By that process the power of appointing will be everywhere equalized: the responsibility resulting from it everywhere the same.

The next proposition which I choose to consider, as involved in one of these resolutions, is that of dispensing with electors altogether, and permitting the people to vote directly for the President and Vice President.

It must be obvious, that, if they are even faithful, they are, at best, unnecessary and useless. If unfaithful, they are worse than useless. I hold it to be right, not only to place the election as near to the people as possible, but to prevent the least removal of it from them. It is their own business, and why should they not be allowed to do it? Do gentlemen think that they have not the necessary information to enable them to act for themselves? If they do they are greatly mistaken. Why are all these thousands and tens of thousands of documents printed and scattered through the land? Of what avail are the six hundred newspapers, which circulate over the whole Union, the books, the benefits of intercourse, the learning, the science, and above all, the sound native stock of common sense and common honesty, to be found at every fireside? If they need more of the means of information, make them the actual doers of this great work of making Presidents, and, my word for it, they will soon qualify themselves for the work. Let a man know what he has to do, if you want him to learn how to do it. But how is it that more information is required to enable the voters properly to act, in voting for the President themselves, directly, than in voting for electors to vote for them. The direct vote has all the advantages of simplicity: the voting for electors all the disadvantages of complexity. In exercising the right of suffrage, the mode which is the shortest, most simple, easiest to be understood, and withal the most certain, has every thing to recommend it. Besides, nothing can be better calculated to awaken that degree of interest which is necessary to induce the people to attend to the election, than to put it in their power to vote directly for the men of their choice, to fill these great offices.

It is time, Mr. Chairman, that I should approach the all-important provision contained in these resolutions, that is, "that the constitution ought to be amended in such manner as to prevent the election of President and Vice President from devolving on Congress." This power was made contingent, and from the known views of the framers of the constitution, and the whole volume of evidence which contemporaneous exposition furnishes, it was thought to be remote, and barely within the reach of possibility; but past experience, and the actual acquaintance with the true state of things, as they are, and as they are likely to be, must produce in the mind of every impartial observer, the settled, steadfast conviction, that this power, at first intended to be contingent and remote, will become frequent, common, predominant. In practice, the power of Congress will take the place of the right of the people. The people, who, of right, should enjoy and effectually exercise this power, will retain the name and form, without the substance and the benefits of it. Precedents will draw after them practice; one election by Congress will lead to another; and, as the recurrence becomes more frequent and fashionable, all its tendencies will gain strength; and, to the same extent, the right will pass away from the people, or dwindle into nothing.

But, has Congress abused this power? I would affirm that it had; but, as it is my purpose to speak of characters, rather than individuals, I am content that the free, unbiassed, unbought judgments of the American people, should give the response to this question. Will Congress certainly abuse this power? The unanswered arguments which have been urged, founded in the depravity of our nature, our weakness, our ambition, our situations here, our relations to the Executive; the operations of his extensive influence and patronage, if truth can prevail, must have shown that, in the hands of Congress, the abuse is next to inevitable.

The gentleman from New York (Mr. STORRS) undertook to show, that men in power never did, nor never could, destroy any Government, but that Governments were only in danger by men out of power; and, finding that he could not be sustained, either by reason or matter of fact, became poetical, at the expense of these poor powerless people—he drew largely upon Milton. From his example, I will take the liberty of quoting, from the “Rights of Man,” (a work of not very high authority, as I understand, at White Hall,) the description of the National Assembly of France, as worthy of imitation by this assembly, whether in or out of power. It was the assembly which was convened while the King was yet on the throne, and which undertook, not to revolutionize the Government, but to define the rights of the subject, and limit the prerogative of the Crown; and of which the great and good Lafayette was the “Magnus Apollo.” It is thus given:

“Speech is, in the first place, one of the essential rights of man, always retained; and, with respect to the National Assembly, the use of it is their duty, and the nation is their authority. Feeling the dignity of their character, they support it. Their parliamentary language, whether for or against the measure, is free, bold, and manly, and extends to all the circumstances of the case.”

“If any matter or subject, respecting the Executive Department, or the person who presides in it, (the King,) comes before them, it is debated on with the spirit of men, and the language of gentlemen, and their answer or address is returned in the same style. They stand not aloof, with the gaping vacuity of vulgar ignorance, nor bend with the cringe of sycophantic insignificance. The graceful pride of truth knows no extremes, and preserves, in every latitude of life, the right angled character of man.”

I think the character here drawn, worthy, at least, of my imitation.

A few words now about a Congress President. Who makes him? “We, the people of the United States?” No, sir, we the servants of the people—a grade of workmen below the journeymen, fixes him up; the master’s hand is not in the work. Who is he responsible to? Those who made him. The creature, as well in a state of political existence, as in the natural, must be dependent upon his creator—“in their hands are the issues of his political life.” All our theories, and all our practices, upon the principles of good government, prove that the Legislative and the Executive Departments should be placed and preserved as distinct from, and as independent of, each other, as the regularity of action can permit. Instead of this, the defect in the constitution against which I am contending, does, in practice, give to each the power of producing and re-producing one another.

The gentleman from New York (Mr. STORRS) inquires whether, when a President appoints his political friends, he pays, or when he appoints his political adversaries, he buys? I answer, he may do both, and yet neither pay nor buy. He asks, triumphantly, was Bayard bought?—was Poinsett bought? I answer, no, neither were bought. And further, Fox was not paid—Carnot was not bought; but Woolsey was paid, and Talleyrand was bought, (whenever the highest bidder presented himself.)

I refer to these, out of the thousand examples which history furnishes, to show, that, although friends and enemies may be appointed to office and power, without being paid or bought, yet, under different circumstances, men have been both paid and bought—“May we profit by their examples!”

Gentlemen attempt to divert our attention from the defects in the constitution, by expressing a reverence for its framers approaching to idolatry. Sir, to those who shared in the struggle for independence, and laid the deep foundations of our Government, I claim an equal participation in rendering the full tribute of regard which is due to mortal men. They gave us the charter of our liberty; they could not, Heaven did not, give us a charter of exemption from the weakness and the wickedness of human nature. No, sir, in the days of our fathers, the golden age of pristine purity—when, according to one gentleman on this floor, “the political little finger” of our statesmen could almost work miracles; and, according to another, the palest star in that firmament, outshone the whole galaxy of these degenerate times—even then our country produced an Arnold! And who was Arnold? Some obscure, degraded, scape-gallows felon? No, sir, no: he was found in front of the foremost rank of patriots, with a wreath of glory on his brow, which the rough hand of time could not tear away—this man became a traitor!

In the first great contest for the Presidential chair, the second man in the nation aspired to be the first—he was disappointed, and became a traitor! In the soul-trying times of the last war, we witnessed a troubling of the waters—a whole convention was spawned, which, in the opinion of the Republicans of that day, were little better than traitors! It is to extraordinary times, and trying occasions, that we must look for extraordinary development of character; then it is that sterling worth, rare endowment, or unknown merit, is brought to light, or, being known, receives its confirmation; and then it is, that those who gained credit for what they never had, find themselves weighed and wanting.

But is it enough for us that we have had great and good ancestors? Not unless we are worthy of them, and worthy, too, of our own posterity: for in a little while, we, also, shall be ancestors. Then we shall be looked to for examples: and what bright examples—what improvements shall we furnish, fit for the imitation and praise of future times? Shall all the lights of science, of practical liberty, and experience, be lost on us? Is the debt which we owe to remain unbonded, unsecured?—for, we must not forget that we owe the same debt to our country, and those that shall come after us, that they did who have gone before—yes, a much larger debt: “for, where much is given, much will be required.”

Some future Oato may mourn over the long-lost liberties of his country; he may, indeed, despair of inspiring his degraded, enslaved countrymen, with the hardy virtues of freemen, by the blood-stirring notes of martial music, or by unfurling the star-spangled banner of their former fame; but his unconquered spirit will break forth in language like this—

“Is there not some chosen curse,
Some hidden thunder in the stores of Heaven,
Red with uncommon wrath,
To blast the man that owes his greatness
To his country's ruin?”

Mr. LECOMPTRE said, in advocating the resolutions of his friend from South Carolina, he was met, at the very threshold, by gentlemen of very eminent abilities, who undertook to show, in forcible and impressive language, the danger inseparable from every attempt to touch the constitution. He did full justice, both to their talents and to their motives; he admired their candor, and did not doubt the sincerity of their veneration for the constitution. But, however great that veneration might be, and however well deserved, gentlemen ought to remember, that instrument has now been submitted to the test of forty years' experience, and, with whatever wisdom it might have been framed, (and none appreciated more fully than he, the talent or the patriotism of its framers,) it has been proved defective in one very important point. Would gentlemen deny that the people of the United States are possessed of sufficient virtue and sufficient intelligence to make a change in their constitution, when they find that any part of it is productive of evil? The wisdom of our fathers, their integrity, and their modesty, were too great to suffer them to cherish the intention that no change should ever be made in the instrument they produced. It seemed, indeed, to be the opinion of one gentleman, (Mr. EVERETT,) that we are not permitted even to attempt a change.

Turn, for a moment, to the arguments of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. EVERETT.) That gentleman, if I understood him, maintains, that every attempt to amend the constitution, is a breach of our duty, and a violation of the oath we have taken to support the constitution; and that we have no right even to consider such a proposition. The constitution itself secures to us this right. What is its language, sir? [Here Mr. L. quoted the constitution, to show the power.] With language like this staring him in the face, will any gentleman say, we may not even consider a proposition to amend this instrument? Sir, we have no right to any privilege in the Government, if we have no right to alter the Government. It is the people's, and they may change it at will. The gentleman says he would sooner lay down his hand, and have it cut off, than hold it up in favor of any alteration of the constitution. But, I say, I would sooner lay down my hand, and have it cut off, than not hold it up in favor of alteration, whenever I am convinced that alteration is needed. The gentleman, too, tells us, that the President of the United States has no power, or none, at least, that is worth talking about. No power, sir! What says this instrument? [Here Mr. L. quoted the second article of the constitution.] Is this no power, sir—this no patronage? Sir, the President nominates almost every officer in the service of Government—and when did you ever hear of a nomination of his not being confirmed by the Senate? It is a rare occurrence. All his nominations are confirmed; and is this no power? Sir, it is the strongest of power.

The constitution, as it stands, makes no certain provision for the election of a President. It says, indeed, that if an election fails to be made by the Electoral College, that the House of Representatives may then elect from the three highest candidates. But it is not compulsory upon them to do so; and, if they should think proper not to make a President, there will be none. So, in like manner, the Senate has power to make a Vice President, but it is not compulsory upon them to do so; and, if the Senate should also decline, there will be no Vice President; and thus the Executive

Amendment of the Constitution.

[H. OF R.]

Department of the Government will be vacant; nor can it, in a constitutional manner, be filled. This certainly is a fact which ought at least to be taken into consideration.

I am well aware, sir, that it is a matter of very great delicacy, to advert, upon this floor, to the circumstances which preceded, and were immediately connected with the late Presidential election; yet I consider it proper and necessary to refer to some of them. It was very commonly observed, in our public prints, in the West, that the last two or three Presidents had been taken from the Cabinet. They had each been Secretary of State. This was considered likely to grow into a dangerous precedent. The people were alive to this subject—they felt this danger—they were desirous to avert it—and every exertion was made to bring an individual into the Presidential office immediately from the bosom of the people.

The great check on the abuse of power by the Executive, is his responsibility to those who elected him. He is elected by the House of Representatives; where then will his responsibility be directed? To the House of Representatives. And to whom is the responsibility of the House directed? To their constituents. But if, in the election of a President, they have betrayed their constituents, where is the remedy? There is none, sir. The people may complain, but their right of choice is gone. They may turn out their faithless servants, but a servant is left, whom they cannot turn out till his term expires. Judging from my own feelings, I should conclude that every free American, whose ambition prompts him to desire an office of trust and honor, would be too proud to consent to hold it without the will of the majority. Certain it is, that I would never take an office, however great or valuable, unless I believed it to be sanctioned by a fair majority of my fellow-citizens.

Great fear was expressed at the last election, lest a "military chieftain" should be made President; and it was assigned as a reason why the will of the people should be disregarded, that this "chieftain," if elected, might, by some means, (it never could be distinctly shown how,) bring the nation into war. Why should such fears be entertained? What reason can there be to indulge such apprehensions? Of one thing, Mr. Chairman, I feel very confident: if we had had "the military chieftain" for our President in 1814, this Capitol would not have been laid in ashes. After such a fact as this, sir, I hope the possession of some military skill—the sin of having fought for the country—will not be urged as an objection to an officer whom your constitution makes the commander-in-chief.

On motion of Mr. MITCHELL, of South Carolina, the committee then rose, and

The House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, March 22.

Amendment of the Constitution.

The House, on motion of Mr. McDUFFIE, again went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, in the chair, on the proposed amendment to the constitution.

Mr. MITCHELL, of South Carolina, would endeavor to show, first, that the plan of electing a President, proposed by his colleague, (Mr. McDUFFIE,) was not only more liable to abuse than the present system, but essentially impracticable. If his colleague objected to Congressional Caucuses, composed of distinguished persons, responsible to the people, and high in their confidence—whose operations are conducted with all the publicity and solemnity of Legislative proceeding—he will, if his resolution be adopted, expose the people to the machinations of desperate intriguers, without character, without cheek; whose insidious plots will be hatched and executed with the silence and concealment of treason. If he objects to the present system, because, by an arithmetical supposition, it may be made to appear that a minority may elect a President, against the will of the majority, (for no such case was alleged to have existed,) from the very nature and effect of his plan, smaller minorities will elect to that office persons unknown to the great body of the electors; without talent to suggest, without address to effect, or public confidence to sustain their measures. If, by the present plan, the constituted authorities are liable to be corrupted, by the proposed, the poison will be more widely diffused—it will be carried to the altar and the fireside—it will work into the blood and the heart of the country.

Mr. M. said, his second ground for opposing the amendment was, because the present organization of the electoral system was essentially calculated to concentrate public opinion on those who deserve public confidence—to elect men most distinguished for integrity and abilities. But, if it could be proven that it was not productive of this happy result; if it even failed every alternate time; still it was so essential to the sovereignty of the States, and their sovereignty so essential to the liberties of the people, that he would feel disposed to retain it.

Mr. M. said, it had been artfully contended, that, by the adoption of these amendments, the people would have more power in the election of President. The fact is not so. By the constitution, as it now stands, the people have a sovereign control over the election of their electors. They can elect them by general ticket, by districts, or by the Legislature. On the contrary, the plan of his colleague proposed to take from the people of the States this sovereign power—this unrestrained freedom in the mode of choosing their Chief Magistrate; and to say to them, you shall elect your electors by districts.

Mr. M. said, notwithstanding these convictions, he would not have trespassed on the committee if the amendment had not been proposed by one of his colleagues, and he had no reason to believe that it was in express contradiction to the will of the people of South Carolina. The resolution to adopt the District System had been, for ten years, to his knowledge, before that people. It had been proposed by three different States, North Carolina, New Hampshire, and New Jersey, to three successive Legislatures, of which he was a member; and it had been either evaded, or positively rejected. Even at the last session, the amendments under discussion, he understood, had been recommended by the Governor, in his message, and, when called up, had been indefinitely postponed. This was the more remarkable, as the result of the last Presidential election had operated with unexpected severity on the feelings of the people.

Mr. M. said he would now recur to his position—that the plan of his colleague to elect a President was impracticable; that, by it, no election could be effected. What does he propose to do? In the first place, he strips the House of Representatives, and the State Legislatures, of all agency in the election. He says to them, “you are not trustworthy; you are corruptible; you may be tampered with.” Caucuses, of all sorts, are proscribed. He then divides the United States into two hundred and sixty-one districts, like the squares of a check-board; each district is to elect an elector, and these electors are to meet, on the same day, in the capitals of their States, to vote for a President: the electors of Maine at Portland; of Georgia, at Milledgeville; of Missouri, at St. Louis; and of New York, at Albany. How can an election be effected in this way? How can a majority be united in favor of any one candidate, by electors at such vast distances, without the possibility of concert or without the operation of an intervening body, by which their views might be previously collected, digested, and ascertained? What is an election? It is the common will, arising out of the common understanding of the electors. How is this effected? By communication of ideas, by interchange of views, by compromise of interests, by concession of feelings. You must bring the electors, somehow or other, in contact. By way of illustration, suppose each of us, on our arrival at Washington, at the commencement of the session, had been confined to his chamber, without the possibility of communication, and directed, with a list of the members in our hands, and a full knowledge of their characters, to vote for a Speaker—how long would it be before a majority of us would unite in favor of one individual? Not until doomsday. But let us assemble here as usual, and how quickly is the election effected. At the first ballot there would be three or four candidates; the highest on the list might have a very small minority of the whole; at every successive balloting, he, or some other, would receive an accession of strength, from the falling in of those who were at first averse to him. Notwithstanding this, his ultimate success would be acquiesced in by all, and the business of the people would move on with its usual celerity and advantage. Now, this is the effect of deliberation, of various and painful calculations of hope and disappointment, of concession and equivalents, among the electors. A Presidential election cannot otherwise be conducted.

Mr. M. said, that it may be objected, that our electoral colleges have always voted in this manner in their respective capitals, and that they have found no difficulty in electing a President. True; but this has been owing to the intervention of the House of Representatives. The people of the States have been brought into contact by the deliberations at Washington. The merits of conspicuous men were there discussed; their claims to public confidence compared; the political principles, interests, and prejudices, of the different sections ascertained and reconciled, and the candidates selected, and recommended to the qualified voters of the States. Congress did that which it was the constitutional duty of the electoral colleges to have done, but which they were unable to do from their distance from each other. This election has been hitherto effected by Congress and the people of the States. The electoral colleges have done nothing more than write the votes of the people, and transmit them to Washington. The Congressional caucus did not arise from the spirit of intrigue, but from necessity. Had the constitution assembled the electors of the States, and formed them into one body, the election would have been effected by them, and a Congressional caucus would never have existed. But it is equally clear, that, without this assemblage of the electoral colleges, or the intervention of some general representative body, to educe, direct, and concentrate public opinion, that the people, scattered over this immense country, ignorant of each other's views and interests, and having, each, views and interests of their own, liable to the impositions of a venal press, and to the arts of ambitious demagogues, will never harmonize so as to effect an election. The direct effect of the amendments will be to engender, in every part of the Union, knots of intriguers, who will divide and distract the people, and embitter their feelings, and who, being irresponsible, will not care by what means they effect their ends.

The design of the constitution evidently was, that the President should be chosen by the people of the States, in their collective capacities, as distinct independent communities; that the principle of representation was to be observed in the conduct of this election—the people to vote for electors chosen from themselves, in proportion to their numbers, who were to choose a President; and on failure of the electors to elect, the States to decide in their sovereign equal character. Here is no splitting of communities—no warring of minorities against majorities—no corrupt and unnatural alliances between the districts of one

[H. OF R.]

State and those of another, to defeat the will of their respective societies. The choice of electors is, like a law of the State, the will of the majority, which the minority adopt, and make their own. If the electors of the States had formed one body, not only would no Congressional caucus have ever existed, but it would not, once in a century, have ever been referred to the States in the House of Representatives. The real political question is, cannot the people elect their President by representatives? If they can make laws here and at home—if they can do, what is still more important, change their constitution of Government, by representatives, why can they not choose their President by representatives? for what are electors but representatives, chosen, like them, by the people, from among themselves! Of necessity this must be done: the omnipotent laws of space and mind require it. If you make it popular, or by districts, you will never effect an election, or it will be inevitably effected by self-created representatives, caucuses, politicians, or what you please to call them.

Mr. M. said, the inevitable result of the proposed change is not only to multiply candidates, but to bring forward candidates of a different class or order. Instead of having the great men of the Confederacy, you would have the great men of the State. The temptation would be irresistible to ambitious, intriguing men, who had not the public confidence, and who were inexperienced in State affairs. A popular man having the influence of a State, and knowing that a few additional votes from each of the adjoining States would give him a plurality among his competitors, and thus enable him to appear before the people of the United States as a candidate for the Presidency, would immediately set to work. He would resort to the vilest arts of intrigue to accomplish his purpose. To the leading men he would hold out the allurements of office; with another class, he would employ the grossest means of venality and corruption. He would address himself directly to the passions. State pride, sectional interest, would operate in his favor. He would have infinitely the advantage of a man at a distance, whose great services and tried virtue would not be known to the great mass, or if known at all, would only be felt by their reason. I venture to say that ten or twelve candidates, with their attendants and dependents, their herds of petty officers scattered through the towns, the cities, and the country, &c., &c., would throw the whole Union into a state of most vicious fermentation. Bribery, perjury, tumultuous disturbances, drunken and gluttonous excesses such as we have seen take place in our Congressional elections, in the large cities, would profane the exercise of a right—the proudest right of a freeman—which should only be exercised with the purest and best feelings. Take an example. A small minority of twenty-five or thirty electoral votes, gives Mr. A., of Illinois, and Mr.

B., of South Carolina, pluralities, and according to the system of the gentleman, the Senate will have to present them to the people of the States, who are to choose one of them as President, by a vote in mass. What would the good citizens of Boston say? Why, I never heard of either of these candidates in my life—am I compelled to vote for a man of whom I know nothing? He would inquire of his member of Congress, who would be unable to inform him. He would then resort to the editor of his newspaper. Mr. Editor would know all about Mr. A., of Illinois. He had seen a biographical sketch of him in the New York Evening Post, taken from the Pittsburgh Recorder, extracted from the Star of Cincinnati, direct from the Herald of Illinois, where the candidate lived, which proved that Mr. A. was one of the wisest and best of men. And, for fifty dollars, these independent and patriotic editors would impose on the people of the United States Grattan's character of the elder Pitt, as a suitable picture of the virtues and talents of Mr. A., of Illinois, who might be at heart a shallow, intriguing fellow, who, by the basest arts of corruption, had cajoled the electors of his own and the neighboring States to give him their votes as President. Could you prevail on the people of the United States to vote for him? Would you be able to rally a majority in his favor? Would the people of the States rush to the polls and struggle to lift A. of Illinois, or B. of South Carolina, to the proud pre-eminence? But admit Mr. A. should be elected. What a spectacle! The Chief Magistrate of a Confederacy of twenty-four sovereign States leaves his retirement on the Wabash for the capital of the United States. Where are the breathless crowds—the triumphal arches—the military displays—the files of village youths and maids strewing his path with flowers, and freighting the air with gladsome psalms! Where the bursting acclamations, which speak a nation's joy at the promotion of a man to the chief magistracy who had become sacred in their eyes by a life of spotless integrity, of inflexible firmness, a virtuous, useful laborer in their service? His arrival at Washington is announced. Does it inspire universal confidence? Does it calm anxiety? Does it harmonize the distractions of party? He has now to choose his Cabinet. Is he capable of selecting those whose firmness, sagacity, and resource, would assist him in his difficulties? What would be his embarrassments! Ignorant of our foreign affairs—of the finances—of the organization of the army and navy—he would, at every step, have to consult treaties, statutes, reports, files of manuscript letters, clerks, sub-clerks, and the very menials of the Departments.

But, said Mr. M., why are not candidates of this sort now brought forward—electors meet in the several States, and are liable to be operated on? He would answer, on account of the agency which the State Legislatures and House of Representatives have in the election. It is because the framers of the constitution avoided the principle, which the gentleman proposes to introduce, of vesting the election solely in the qualified voters—because, to complete the act of election, all branches of the Government must co-operate—each acts and is acted on—each controls and is controlled. The State Legislatures have their check, in directing the mode of appointing electors—the House of Representatives its check, in the ultimate decision; both are responsible to the qualified voters for the faithful exercise of their powers. The candidate must present himself to each in turn. Address on his part, and facility on theirs, may gain over a sufficient number of the qualified voters. State pride and sectional interest may overcome the election of contiguous Legislatures; but, when he has gone so far, his work is not yet done. He then has to pass the inspection of the House of Representatives of the United States—a tribunal proud, jealous, and intellectual, which, if subdued at all, must be subdued by main strength. His pretensions are there examined—analyzed with the heartlessness of anatomical dissection—compared, not with the merit of those who move in his limited sphere at home, but with that of men from every part of the Union, fit for the most complicated affairs, and struggling in a career of arduous competition. It is this organization which compels the citizen to ascend by the ordinary steps; to go through the preparatory initiations.

But what has been the operation of this system? Our Government has existed for thirty-eight years. We have had ten Presidential elections—two of them decided by the House of Representatives, and six different Presidents. The gentleman admits that five of these have been the choice of the people, and the very best men of the Confederacy; and a very large portion of the Union will say that the sixth is not unworthy of his exalted station. Is not this conceding every thing? Can a stronger argument be advanced? Does he appeal to experience? Is it not in our favor? What does he oppose to it? Theory! speculation! supposititious cases! hypothetical reasoning! The elections have been exposed to all the abuses which he dreads: combinations of the large States—usurpations of the Legislatures—suppression of minorities by majorities—defeats of majorities by minorities—caucuses—political managers—patronage of the President—corruptibility of the Representatives. And yet, in five instances out of six, he tells us, the people have chosen, and chosen the best men of the Confederacy. What is this but saying that the organization of the electoral system is such as to concentrate the will of the people on those who deserve their confidence? And has our ship, during this period of thirty-six years, coursed over a summer sea? What vicissitudes! War! Peace! the transition from political weakness to political strength! Faction dividing the Union, and exciting the fiercest and most implacable passions! The downfall of one party and the rise of another. The expansion of the Confederacy from the Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico—from the Alleghany to the Western boundary of Missouri!

Mr. M. said, that his colleague was led into error from the political view which he took of the people of this country. He appeared to consider us as having originally been one nation—that we were afterwards divided into States—that the State Governments grew out of, and are subordinate to, the Confederate Government, and that every approach towards nationality is an approaching of the people of the States to their natural and perfect condition. He denied this to be the case. This Government at Washington is nothing more than an excrescence of the sovereign power of the people of the States—a mere Confederacy—created as such, and intended to be created as such; and where it differs in its action from Governments of that kind, it is only that it may be more efficient as a Confederacy—a thing of necessity—of bargain and sale between the people of the States, in which each tried to obtain the best terms they could; and which were examined and re-examined, modified and re-modified, turned and twisted, and finally expressed, with the cautious, critical, distrusting precision of an English conveyancer.

Must not this be his principle, when he advocates a theory which takes from the people of the States, as such, the power and agency which they have in the Executive branch of this Government; which goes to destroy the responsibility of that great officer to the people of the States, by making his election depend, not on them, but on the people of the nation; which goes to turn his eye from the few to the many—from the weak to the strong? The people of South Carolina have a positive political power in the election of President, which creates his responsibility to them—of power based on fixed principles—of power as certain as arithmetical relations can make it—of power as distinct and as distinguishable as the Savannah River, which divides them from Georgia; and I hope in God that I may never live to see the day when they consent to give it up.

This power should be exercised by the States. The constitution has said so. "Each State shall appoint electors in such manner as the Legislature may direct." How can a State appoint? Only in two ways—it has but two organs of will and action, the Legislature and the people. A State is a body politic, (see Vattel,) which can act only by its Government or citizens. It is like an aggregate corporation—a bank, which must act by its stockholders, or its Board of President and Directors. The right to such a President is a great sovereign right, which should be exerted according to the will of the majority, in whom the exercise of the sovereignty is. Hence the absurdity of the District System, which divides and apportioning it, and makes the spring of its exercise personal feeling. The majority of the people governs the whole State, makes laws for it, directs its internal and external policy, and, of course, ought to say who shall be that magistrate whose power most affects these interesting relations.

According to the theory of our constitution, as explained by the Federalist, the States, and the people of the States, are represented in the Executive Government by this organization of the electoral system; as the States and the people of the States are represented in the Legislature by the Senate and House of Representatives. I agree entirely with the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. EVERETT,) that we have no right to amend, by destroying a great radical power of the States. The position startled me at first, as it startled all of us; but I see by the prints that it is gaining ground. It is a wise and profound principle. It is worth all the splendid and most enviable reputation of the gentleman. And who would desire to take from the people of the States this sovereign right; who would desire to see the power of Governments diminished, so necessary to the existence of this Government, and to the protection of our liberties? Suppose the worst—the most humiliating of all disasters, which might have taken effect during the late war; that an enemy's fleet should sail up the river Potomac, and surprise and take all the functionaries of this Government, Executive, Legislative, and Judicial. Suppose they should station a military force here in our Capitol, and rear a foreign standard on its dome. This would effect no revolution. The States possess a redeeming energy, by which the National Government would be revived, in all its vigor and integrity. Each Governor would assemble his Legislature, and provide for the national calamity. Things would go on as usual. Forces would be raised, taxes imposed, justice administered, property and liberty protected, and, by an understanding among the States, an election for the functionaries of this Government would be had. No anarchy, no change in the distribution of sovereign power. In like manner, conquest would be impossible. The desolation and capture of one State would only present to the victorious foe a phalanx of sovereigns supporting each other, and ready and eager for resistance. But the existence and power of these Governments are equally necessary to the protection of our liberties. What restrains this Legislature within its orbit? What prevents the enactment and enforcement of laws violating our liberties? The Federal Court! The Supreme Court! That creature of the Executive—that dependent on the Legislature—that co-ordinate of both, having all their sympathies, their hopes, their anxieties! They restrain the encroachments of the other branches. Those seven or eight feeble old men restrain this Government, commanding the resources of this immense Confederacy, and able, at any moment, to deprive them of power by impeachment, or, by doubling their duty, to force them out of office! No, sir; it is State power which restrains us—it is Virginia, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, &c., which restrains us. It is this power which repealed the alien and sedition laws; which annihilated the system of bankruptcy; the former invading the liberty of the freeman, the latter poisoning his morality. I am prepared to say more, sir, but I am exhausted, and will trouble you no more.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Tennessee, said, that he considered the question as one of the greatest consequence to the people of the United States. Persons of all parties and political persuasions were looking up with great anxiety to the decision of this House, and, though much time had been spent in the discussion of this measure, it was nothing more than what was expected by the people. Those who entertained a favorable hope that an amendment of some kind would be proposed to them, as well as those who are opposed to any alteration whatever, have, and do expect this subject to undergo the most thorough investigation and unwearied attention. Mr. M. said he did not deem it so much a matter of importance how gentlemen differed on the great question now under discussion, as that the true grounds on which they differ should be made known and candidly examined. It is peculiarly incumbent on us to bring to this examination those expanded and liberal views that mark the mind of the true statesman.

I do not rise, sir, said Mr. M., under the influence of any idle presumption, that I shall transcend those who have preceded me, or with a desire to show with what facility I can triumph over an adversary. If I shall be able to show clearly that the argument of the gentleman from New York, who first addressed the committee, (Mr. STORRS,) is not invulnerable, I think I shall have done a great deal. That argument, sir, may be viewed as the basis upon which all the subsequent arguments of those who are opposed to the resolutions of the gentleman from South Carolina, were founded. And, in answering that argument, an answer would be given to all the material features of the other arguments on the same side. But, said Mr. M., before I enter upon an examination of the argument of the gentleman from New York, I must be permitted to bestow a short notice upon the argument of the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. MITCHELL,) who has just taken his seat. He would not attempt to follow that gentleman in his meandering course; that would, indeed, be a wild-geese chase; nor would he, in the course of his remarks, attempt to follow the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. EVERETT.) Mr. M. said, while the gentleman was speaking I was amused, I was delighted; his speech had the same effect upon me, that a well-strung musical instrument would have in the hands of a masterly performer. My feelings joined in the unison of sound; but when the fingers were removed from the vibratory string, the music died upon my ear; no impression was left upon my undisturbed mind; no idea advanced made its impress; it was "like the music of Carrol along the hills of Slime; it was pleasant, but mournful to the soul." While it continued, it reached the ear with melody, but when the sound was gone, the substance was lost.

The gentleman, in effect, emphatically tells us that we must not attempt to improve by experience in the march of time. If this be true, all your institutions for education; all your common schools, where the first rudiments of an education are given; all your academies, where the foundation of science is laid; your numerous colleges and universities, where the mind is enriched with science and literature, and taught to expand itself by the dictates of wisdom—these are all of no use or value, and in vain we attempt to climb to the cupola of science and virtue, if the human mind is not to be improved by the march of time. We are told by the gentleman from Massachusetts that our ancestors possessed intelligence in a greater extent, and much more eminent degree, than ourselves. If so, away with all your seminaries; they have proved unprofitable. Appropriate no more school funds, locate no more school lands; they will bring you no return. Cease all your attempts to light up the lamp of knowledge; its dim light will but obscure and mislead. The argument was still more extraordinary, as coming from one who had studied antiquity in books, and subsequently had enjoyed the advantage of testing the accuracy of the knowledge he had thus acquired, by ocular demonstration.

Mr. M. said he would beg leave to notice an observation made by another gentleman from New York, (Mr. WOOD,) who had last spoken. That if he had rightly understood his language, he had said that there was a theoretical error in our Government, and experience may prove it to be so in practice. That the Senate had too much control over the Executive, which might occasion collision between them; that the Executive possesses only the power of nominating foreign Ministers, and the Senate the power to reject; that the Senate ought not to possess any greater power over ambassadors, than to recall them, two-thirds of the Senate concurring; this would be in accordance with Vattel, with which the gentleman did not concur in its whole extent.

If the gentleman held that doctrine, it is not only federal, but ultra federal, and such as had not been heard in this country since the dark days of '98. Sir, let this doctrine be tolerated, and it will not be necessary that the constitution should give the President the power; it will only be necessary that he should will it; a mere sic volo will only be necessary for the exercise of it.

[Here Mr. WOOD rose to explain; and said that he did not himself hold that doctrine; that he was only giving it as the sentiments of Vattel.]

Mr. Chairman, said Mr. M., the Executive has already as much power given to him as any friend of his country would wish him to possess. Has he not the power of nominating every officer of the Government? and is not this, in effect, the power of appointing? All that the Senate can do is to reject the nomination; but the whole act is that of the President; and, unless the Senate has strong reasons which forbid their consent, the appointment is made, and it is made by the President alone.

Sir, I will agree that the framers of the constitution were wise: but I cannot agree with the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. ARCHER,) that they were possessed of inspiration. They were men, sir, who could listen with patience to the thoughts of each other. They could give and take, to arrive at an agreement. If they could not get all that they wished adopted, they were willing to take a part, and to agree to a compromise of powers; and they were what we ought to be, too mild and too intelligent each pertinaciously to adhere to his own opinion; and they could yield the minor for the major proposition; they were great, because they were good; they were calm, dispassionate, reflecting—not pursuing the course of your county court lawyers, only anxious to show with what facility they could put down an adversary in argument. They spoke from the heart, and their language reached the heart; their speeches were not mechanically prepared in the closet, and brought out, and vended in market. But, great and good as these men were, they were but mere men; they partook of the common frailty of our race, and were highly sensible of it; they did not set themselves up as models of infallible wisdom; they were conscious of the imperfection of their own production, and recorded that consciousness in the fifth section of that instrument, by ingrafting a clause for its own amendment; they knew, that, as time rolled on, the circumstances and the capacity of the country would be changed—and they have changed. They never dreamed of compiling a constitution to suit all times and all circumstances; and the fallibility of that great assembly is clearly evinced by the numerous amendments which have already been introduced and adopted as part of that constitution. Twelve or thirteen amendments were made almost as soon as that instrument was completed, and which are not less to be admired than any other clause of that excellent instrument. Yet the gentleman asks how we can lay our sacrilegious hands upon an instrument so perfect? The constitution itself furnishes him an answer; and the very words of the amendatory clause give a positive refutation to all that part of his speech. The gentleman tells us, that none must attempt this task but those who are already sages. And, sir, how are we to become sages? Is it on this floor? No, sir; it is by studying in our closets, and in our offices at home; it is by turning over the volumes of antiquity, and by sailing back the stream of time to the days of Solon and Lycurgus; by living contemporaneously with the worthies of antiquity; imitating their morals, and adopting their philosophy; improving

Amendment of the Constitution.

by their virtues and profiting from their errors.

When, sir, you are in pursuit of the federative principle, you must look to the Senate branch of the National Legislature. Sir, it is there that the States, as separate and independent sovereignties, act upon the federative principle. I will not, sir, take your State to illustrate my views upon this subject; I will not hackney poor little Delaware to death, as most have done who have preceded me; I will take Rhode Island, conspicuous for its talents, for my example, to show the operation of this federative principle. It is, sir, in the Senate branch of the National Legislature, where that State stands upon a footing of equality with the great States of New York, Pennsylvania, and Virginia. It is there that the States are represented in fact, and in deed—the Senators of each State being the Representatives of the State, in its aggregate and Sovereign capacity—being elected, and brought into political existence, by the only and proper organ of the State, the Legislature thereof. This assembly of the States of equal representation, was wisely formed to prevent the encroachment of the large States upon the interests of the small States, and for the protection of the equal rights of both. But it is obvious that the popular feature was intended to be preserved in the organization of this House. The number of Representatives from each State depended upon the ratio of population: one only being allowed to every 30,000 inhabitants: so here the popular principle is lodged, as the federal is in the Senate.

The gentleman from New York says, the little States will never agree to any such amendment; that it would be taking from them their sovereign equality, without giving an equivalent; and, in the next breath, he says, that the district system would fritter away the large States, and take from them the power of preserving their weight and importance in the Union, and thereby deprive them from presenting an undivided phalanx, in a Presidential election. The resolutions, sir, on your table are, in general terms, pointing out the broad features of an amendment, containing only the principle, without being entangled in the minutiae. But the arguments are used as if they were to assume no other shape, which is quite deceptive. How, I would ask, can the small States lose any thing by the proposed amendments? What do the small States now possess that they would lose by the proposed change? Nothing, sir, but what was thought by the convention that framed this constitution, a mere possibility—that is, of being placed upon a footing of equality with the large States, in the election of the last resort in this House: for, in the first instance, they can only be felt according to the gravity of their population, and therefore possess no more power at present than is proposed by the amendment.

But it is said that the district system will tend to a consolidation of the States. A declaration of this kind, to me, is puerile and idle in the extreme. Will not the State Legislatures exist, as they have heretofore done, and as they now do? Will they not possess the same legislative powers in the enactment of laws? Will not each State have its own Executive and its own Judiciary? Will they not possess the same plenary powers in their municipal regulations? Is any right they ought to possess taken from the States? Do they lose, as gentlemen suppose, all power, when their Legislatures are permitted no longer to direct themselves to appoint electors? I answer, no. It would seem that gentlemen imagined that all the intrinsic power of State rights were involved in the mere act of appointing electors. There is nothing, in these arguments, sir; they are mere vanity and vexation of spirit: the more they are probed, the more will their fallacy be exposed. The States will be what they now are—their fundamental law the same; they will possess the same sovereignty, and the people more freedom: their Legislatures will still be their proper sovereign organs, possessing all their legitimate functions. But, I will admit, sir, that they will no longer possess the power to wield a mass of party machinery, to prostrate the wishes of the people, for the purpose of promoting or defeating a particular Presidential candidate.

I will now, Mr. Chairman, turn my attention to another argument of the gentleman from New York, (Mr. STORMA.) That gentleman said that if the mover of the amendment was sincere in his wishes for an equal district system, he must give up his argument, or go one step farther, and put the free voters in all the States on a footing of equality, and abolish the provision in the constitution, which puts the three-fifths of the black population into the Southern scale. Sir, is it not strange, passing strange, indeed, that no topic of debate can arise in this House, let it come from where it may, or relate to what it will, but our negroes must be hauled into the question, and made a black hook for gentlemen to hang upon? Why, sir, I would ask, is this argument used—is it by way of reflection? We of the Southern States are not to blame in this matter; the evil was in the country before we were born; it was co-extensive with the Colonial system that peopled this country; the evil was entailed upon us by our fathers—by the cruel and relentless acts of the mother country. We are not, we cannot be, responsible for its existence. But I will tell you, sir, who is responsible for its continuance from the date of the convention, to the year 1808. The framers of this transcendent, this immaculate constitution, which gentlemen have found so faultless in all its parts, are the persons who are to be blamed; yes, sir, greatly blamed, because they might have brought the importation of these unhappy beings to an end at the time the constitution was adopted; but instead thereof, they inserted a provision which authorized its continuance to the year 1808.

A gentleman from Rhode Island (Mr. PRABOE) has gone into a calculation, to show that those poor slaves have twenty-five Representatives upon this floor. I will not say that I am opposed to all arithmetical politicians; but I will say, that I vibrate to the fact that they are represented here, and I rejoice that they are; their unhappy situation entitles them to our personal sympathies and our legislative protection; and if that gentleman does not feel this sentiment toward them as his fellow-beings of the same great family, he has denied the faith and is worse than an infidel.

I have already attempted to show that a caucus is the creature of a faction, and that it cannot exist among the people generally. Sir, I live in a State where the district system prevails. I know nothing of those local caucuses of which the gentleman has spoken. I know nothing of those dark and mysterious midnight conclaves that dread the light of Heaven. I have never been in one of them in my life, nor do I think they are needed, nor can they naturally follow the adoption of a district system.

The gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. MITCHELL) says, that a caucus at this place is indispensably necessary for collecting and uniting the public will; and he makes this House a vast luminary, and we, as its diverging rays, are to dispense its sublime light to the periphery of this extended Government. I have said already, sir, that the great body of the people cannot be corrupted. They therefore need not gather themselves together into secret meetings, to form secret plans and secret designs. They have no designs but those of self-preservation, and the general good of all. They possess the proper intelligence, and are endowed with a proper temper, to choose a President for themselves. A President thus elected will be armed with the great sword of their will.

I am of lawful age, sir, and for my life I never have been enabled to see the mighty difference between a caucus at this place, and elsewhere. I am myself opposed to a caucus here, to one at Albany, or anywhere else. But certain I am, that the caucus here cannot be darker, more deadly, or demon-like, than some of those which must necessarily attend upon a general ticket system. Think for a moment, sir, of a caucus of some twenty or thirty in the State of New York, dictating to her two millions of population, (I believe I exaggerate, it is not quite so many—about 1,600,000,) and, sir, if a caucus full grown is so odious and so detestable, a caucus in infancy can be no better. A little rogue is as bad as a great rogue, whether he steals a penknife, or a Presidential chair: ergo, let us have caucuses nowhere. Put them down, sir; let us have an end of these midnight cabals, this plotting and contriving, this patent machinery to bring a man into power, and to destroy the people's will. I know, Mr. Chairman, that the caucus here was established in the first instance by some of the most able, and most honorable Republicans of the country, and for the most wise and virtuous purpose, and those caucuses were attended by some of as intelligent and patriotic men as ever adorned this Hall. But still, sir, that does not prove the caucus system to be right. Nor is it here, sir, where all the wise and virtuous assemble. But the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. MITCHELL) justifies it upon a strange ground, indeed; as the only proper means of communicating to the people the character and qualifications of the person for whom they should vote; and this declaration is predicated on the idea that no man is fit to be the Chief Magistrate of this Government until he shall have served an apprenticeship more laborious than that of the gentleman from New York, within these spacious walls, and to have passed through the regular grades of the departments, until he shall have climbed to the cupola of power. I have already attempted to show that this is neither the centre nor the source of intelligence; and that there are men more intelligent, and far more virtuous, within the unambitious and private walks of domestic tranquillity—thousands of whom are much better acquainted with the biographic history of the great men of the Government than the best informed among us; therefore we possess not the power of communicating to them those rays of light.

Sir, you may talk to me as long as you will about the incorruptibility of this House, and I shall not believe a word of it. Sir, I have no objection to the President's having the appointing power—I think he ought to possess it. I would not curtail his patronage at all: I wish to give it another and a proper direction. Let it be as extensive as you please, only keep its allurements without these walls, and from our sister the Senate. Will giving to the President's patronage this direction, place him in the situation described by the gentleman from New York, that the "very pettiest German Prince might look down upon him with contempt?" No, sir, he would possess all the power he ought to possess. Then, sir, our seats will be worth the having: then, sir, the people will believe that some spark of patriotism occasions us to occupy them. But, sir, when our only object in coming here, is in pursuit of some dazzling office, our seats, if not quite worthless, lose at least half their value. Sir, we cannot occupy a more pre-eminent station than a seat in the House of the people. I consider myself as now occupying the most important office within the gift of the people. The gentlemen whose names I have so often enumerated, seem to think it against morality and religion, and that it would have a tendency to reduce us to a savage state, to suppose for a moment that we could be purchased or bribed, by any means whatever. And the gentleman from New York, with great triumph, asks: Was Bayard bought? Was Poinsett bought? I answer, no, sir! But the people said, that, when they took their appointments, they had deserted their place and their duty. The gentleman asked, with great em-phasia, was Bayard bought? Was Poinsett bought? He paused, with a kind of self-complacency. Why did he not add another name? Why did he not go through the catalogue of exalted appointments? Why did he not ask, with equal triumph, was Clay bought? Did he mean to leave on the minds of the members of this House, by his deadly silence, the idea that Clay was bought? One would be naturally led to think so, by his stopping short where he did. Sir, he who is brave till the enemy appears—until he is brought in view of point-blank danger, and then cowers and flies, has a bravery that is not worth a bawbee.

Mr. Chairman, I now, in conclusion, say, that the people ought to vote for President without the interposition of electors; that all the States of the Union should be laid off into districts; that the districts of a State should contain an equal ratio of population, as near as may be; and that the majority of each district should count as one vote; and, in the event that no one should get a majority of the whole number of the votes given in these electoral colleges, send back the two highest on the list of candidates to the people, and let them vote directly for the man of their choice. But I will candidly say, that, so that the election is taken from this House, I shall not have any very great feeling as to the preference to be given to the district over the general ticket system: or in what way you shall determine the election in the last resort, so that it is taken from this House and given to the people. I call upon you to relieve this House from all temptation, to place each and every member in a situation that they can look with an impartial eye at all administrations, and all their Executive acts. Take the election from this House, and all this will be effected. Sir, give me a riddance of this evil, and I will give you all your powers.

The committee then rose, on the motion of Mr. BARBOUR, of Va., and the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, March 23.

Western Armory.

Mr. JAMES JOHNSON, of Kentucky, offered the following:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to report a bill, authorizing the Secretary of War to appoint three Commissioners to survey and examine the Horse Shoe Bend, upon Licking River, in the county of Pendleton, in the State of Kentucky; and if, upon such survey and examination, the same shall be found suitable, to authorize the President of the United States to cause to be erected, at the Horse Shoe Bend aforesaid, a National armory, similar to those already erected at Springfield and Harper's Ferry.

In support of this resolution, Mr. JOHNSON went into a course of argument, which continued until the hour allotted to the consideration of reports and resolutions had expired; when gentleman to defer the remainder of his remarks till to-morrow.

The Speaker interposed, and requested the

Amendment of the Constitution.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the amendment to the constitution, proposed by Mr. McDUFFIE; when, Mr. BARBOUR, who had the floor, being absent,

Mr. WRENS addressed the committee.

Much time has been spent, sir, and a great many words used by different gentlemen who have gone before me, to show the true meaning of the word State, as used in the constitution, in relation to this subject; I intend not to follow over the same track, but will satisfy myself with observing, that I care not whether it means the geographical limits or boundary lines of each sovereignty, or whether it means the Legislatures of each—it reverts back to the same thing. If gentlemen please to have it so, let us say it means the first, the boundaries of territory; why, sir, all that would have been nothing but wild waste land, but for those who inhabit within those geographical limits: therefore, in this sense, it means the people. If you please to say it is the Legislatures here meant, be it so. It means the people; because, the Legislatures are the people in their Representative delegated character.

Let us look at the result of the general ticket system—and, I must be excused for going a little more into detail than might be exactly necessary here, although I have known men, sir, possessing as much good sense as most of us, perhaps more, that did not understand the effect of this system. We will take New York, sir, if you please, where there are thirty-six districts, consequently thirty-six electors to be elected. How is this to be done? Why, in each district the voters are to vote for the whole thirty-six electors, thirty-five of whom, perhaps, not a man of them ever saw or knew. How are they to be got to vote for them? By only one possible mode—that is, a central power, or body of men, who, as the gentlemen have agreed, must exist and be looked to as the dictators, to fix on the thirty-six candidates. Well, sir, we find them elected, and they do every thing but what was desirable, and they return home; and as the people in each district see the one of the thirty-six who was taken from that district, and begin to condemn him for what was done, he replies, Why, don't blame me: it was not my fault: the other thirty-five that you voted for, and elected, could not be induced to do as I wished, and what could I do? Thus, each one excuses himself at home, and continues to rest secure on the power of those dictators, whose will has been his law, against his oath, and against his country's freedom.

Sir, before I sit down, let me call the attention of Mr. Adams's warmest friends, if they would really be found, by their actions, willing to render him a service, and all who may hereafter be placed in a situation similar to the one he was in—which, to believe him sincere, (and who will doubt that?) must have been almost intolerable to such a man. On the 9th of February, 1825, Congress appointed a committee of three gentlemen, to wait on Mr. Adams, and acquaint him that he was elected, by Congress, the President of the United States; and, on the next day, the 10th of February, as the Journal of that session shows, Mr. Adams returned an answer, an extract of which I will read. "Gentlemen: In receiving this testimonial from the Representatives of the people and States of this Union, I am deeply sensible to the circumstances under which it has been given. All my predecessors in the high station to which the favor of the House now calls me, have been honored with majorities of electoral voices in their primary colleges. It has been my fortune to be by the division of sentiment prevailing among our countrymen on this occasion, in competition, friendly and honorable, with three of my fellow-citizens, all justly enjoying, in eminent degrees, the public favor, and of whose worth, talents, and services, no one entertains a higher and more respectful sense than myself. The names of two of them were, in the fulfilment of the provisions of the constitution, presented to the election of the House, in concurrence with my own—names closely associated with the glory of the nation, and one of them further recommended by a larger majority of the primary electoral suffrages than mine. In this state of things, could my refusal to accept the trust thus delegated to me give an immediate opportunity to the people to form and to express, with a nearer approach to unanimity, the object of their preference, I should not hesitate to decline the acceptance of this eminent charge, and to submit the decision of this momentous question again to their determination. But the constitution itself has not so disposed of the contingency which would arise in event of my refusal. I shall therefore repair to the post assigned me," &c. Who, after this, among the President's friends, can oppose the resolutions? They, in fact, ought to have been the very men to have offered them. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Virginia, who had obtained the floor yesterday, (for to-day,) having now made his appearance in the House, I will, after returning my thanks to this honorable committee, for their polite attention to the few desultory remarks which I have offered, in my own, farmer-like, crude style, give the floor to that honorable member.

Mr. WREMS was followed by Mr. BARBOUR, of Virginia, on the same side, who spoke till half past 2 o'clock, when, complaining of exhaustion, he consented to yield the floor, with the understanding that he would complete his speech on another day. Several gentlemen then rose to speak, but on motion, the committee rose, and had leave to sit again.

FRIDAY, March 24.

Armory on the Western Waters.

The resolution offered yesterday by Mr. JAMES JOHNSON, of Kentucky, relative to a survey for a national armory, was taken up; when

Mr. JOHNSON resumed, and concluded, the remarks in which he was proceeding yesterday when the orders of the day were called.

SATURDAY, March 25.

Panama Mission.

Mr. McLANE, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill "making appropriations for carrying into effect the appointment of a mission at the Congress of Panama;" which was twice read and committed to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. OBOWNSHIELD, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, made a report on the message of the President of the United States, of the 15th inst., in relation to the invitations given to the United States, from the Republics of Colombia, Central America, and Mexico, to be represented at the Congress about to be held at Panama.

The report concludes with a recommendation to adopt the following resolution:

"Resolved, That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient to appropriate the funds necessary to enable the President of the United States to send Ministers to the Congress of Panama."

The report was committed to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

United States and South America.

Mr. WICKLIFFE moved the following:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be instructed to inquire, and report to this House, upon what authority, if any, the Minister of the United States to the Mexican Republic, in his official character, declared to the Plenipotentiary of that Government that "the United States have pledged themselves not to permit any other power than Spain to interfere either with their (the South American Republics) independence, or form of government; and that, in the event of such an attempt being made by the powers of Europe, we (the United States) would be compelled to take the most efficient and active part, and to bear the brunt of the contest."

Mr. WICKLIFFE said that he should at present do no more than explain the object of the resolution he had submitted: he would do it without reference to any question before the House touching the condition of the South American Republics; he would do it at any other time as readily as at the present; but he thought the Representatives of the people were now called upon to say whether any such authority had been given to our Ministers abroad, and if it had not, whether it ought to be given. The members of the House must have observed, from the documents laid on their tables, that our Minister near the Government of Mexico had said, in his diplomatic intercourse with that Government, that the Government of the United States was pledged to make common cause with that Republic if any other power than Spain should attempt to interfere in the question of its independence. Mr. W. considered this declaration as involving a question of weighty import to the people of the United States; and Mr. W. said that he, as one of that people, wished that question not to be decided upon before the crisis to which it alluded should actually arrive. In the mean time he did not wish that the declaration of an official organ of this Government should induce others to believe that such pledges had been given, unless that was actually the fact. That such an opinion had gone abroad, and that it was held by some of the South American Governments, the documents conclusively proved. During the last year a call was made by the Mexican Government upon that of the United States, to be prepared to redeem its pledge, a French fleet having then recently entered the West India seas. It is said, by others, that the declaration of our Minister is an assurance of the cabinet here. If such is the fact, it is high time it should be known and understood in this country. The only authority for this suggestion with which he was acquainted, Mr. W. observed, was a passage in a message of the late President of the United States to Congress; but he did not conceive that that communication would warrant our Minister to say that any pledge had been given by the United States. He recollected that, at the same session, a resolution was introduced by a distinguished member of this House, (now no longer a member,) which seemed to respond to the sentiments of the Executive; but he believed the resolution was never called up or acted upon by the Congress of the United States. If there existed any other evidence of such a pledge as that referred to by our Minister to Mexico, Mr. W. said he was unapprised of it, and he should like that the State Department should let the House know what was the true state of the case.

Mr. FORSYTH observed, that it would be needless for the gentleman to direct his resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as they were unable to give to that gentleman, or to the House, any information on this subject, of which they were not already possessed. It was obvious, from the documents, that the gentleman alluded to has, in the execution of his powers as a Minister, and in obedience to the instructions given to him by his Government, held official language in the declarations he made. The authority by which he made them is, therefore, that of the President of the United States. Mr. F. could not positively say that our Minister to Mexico had received instructions to use these particular terms, but the Minister must, in doing so, certainly have obeyed the spirit of his instructions. It appears that a statement of the language he had used was afterwards submitted to the Secretary of State, and approved by him under the direction of the President. The inquiry would be made by the Committee on Foreign Relations, if they were so ordered: but it could lead only to one result—that the Minister used the language by authority of the President. Mr. F. presumed that the desire of the gentleman from Kentucky was, that an inquiry should be made into the propriety of such language, and of the instructions on which it was founded: if that was his wish, he ought to make the language of his resolution more specific. It would then certainly present a very important question.

Mr. WEBSTER thought the motion of the gentleman was of an extraordinary character, and one which deserved more consideration than is usually bestowed upon a mere call for information. Among the documents submitted by the President to the House, was a letter from the Minister of the United States near the Government of Mexico, in which he details a conversation which had taken place between himself and the official agents of that Government, in which he was arguing in favor of an allowance by Mexico to the United States, of an equality in commercial privileges with the States of South America, and in which the agents of Mexico were resisting such allowance, and insisting that the United States should be, in these respects, postponed to some of the States of the South American continent. In this conversation, it appears that our Minister referred to an opinion commonly entertained in the United States, as to the interference of foreign powers in the concerns of Mexico, and the other new republics; evidently referring to a celebrated declaration by the late President of the United States, on that subject. He used the term “pledged,” but it was plain that its reference was merely to this declaration. If the object of the resolution is to find fault with the conduct of this Minister, he could not, without more information, concur in it; and it seemed scarcely fair to infer, that he was instructed to make any improper declaration, unless there was some proof that he actually was so instructed.

But, if its object was to ascertain whether such instructions had been given, the call should be made on the Executive. Mr. W. entirely agreed with the gentleman from Georgia, that no information, in answer to this inquiry, was to be sought from the Committee on Foreign Relations. He had no objection that a call should be made for the instructions; but until farther inquiry, he thought any inference, unfavorable to the character and conduct of our Minister, ought not to be indulged. He, therefore, was induced to move to lay the resolution on the table; but, having made the motion, he withdrew it at the request of it did not already possess—all the facts were before this House.

Mr. FORSYTH, who explained himself as having said, only, that the Committee on Foreign Relations could give the House no information

Mr. WICKLIFFE observed, that the gentleman from Massachusetts was greatly mistaken, if he supposed that he had any intention to find fault with the conduct of the distinguished individual referred to. His inexperience in legislation might have prevented him from suggesting the best mode of obtaining the information; but, he had concluded that the Committee on Foreign Relations, being, from the nature of its duties, in intimate correspondence with the Department of State, might readily obtain a knowledge of the facts, without putting either the House or the Department to the trouble of a call upon the Department for copies of instructions, &c. If such a call should be made, perhaps it might not suit the views of the Government to give, in extenso, the instructions given to our Ministers; or if they should be given, it might be under an injunction of secrecy—a mode which he wished ever to avoid.

His main object was to direct the attention of Congress and of the people of the United States to the question, whether any such pledge had been authorized by our Government. He was desirous that the country should be left free to act, when the crisis referred to should actually arrive. It seemed to him that the language of our Minister was official; and he had observed, that it did not seem to be contradicted or questioned, by the Secretary of State. He was, therefore, forcibly led to the inference, that the language of our Minister was approved. If the resolution was to be laid on the table, Mr. W. presumed he should be permitted to call it up, and modify it, at a future moment.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he was glad the gentleman from Kentucky had brought this subject before the House. Upon reading the documents which accompanied the President's Message, on the subject of the mission to Panama, said Mr. B., I confess I felt alarmed at the declaration of our Minister to Mexico. I am well acquainted both with the intelligence and the prudence of that gentleman, and, therefore, it is my belief this declaration was not made without authority. This belief is strengthened by a knowledge of the fact, so far as we can judge from the documents, that the Secretary of State has never disavowed, or even disapproved, the conduct of that Minister. Under these circumstances the avowal of the pledge to the Mexican Government, which Mr. Poinsett has made, is well calculated to alarm the fears and the jealousy of the people of the United States.

Under what circumstances was this pledge avowed, and what was the relative situation of the two countries? Our Minister was negotiating a commercial treaty with Mexico, and she had refused, in the most positive terms, to grant to the United States a privilege which she had extended to the South American Republics. Upon this occasion, he claimed for us, as a matter of right, all the privileges which had been granted to them; and declared, as the foundation of this demand, that we stood pledged to protect them against any attack which might be made upon their independence by any European nation except Spain; and in that event, we should be bound to bear the brunt of the contest.

Now, sir, if Mexico should be induced, by this positive declaration, to grant us commercial privileges, which she would not otherwise have granted, I ask if we are not bound, in honor and in good faith, to carry it into effect? The expressions used by our Minister, were not mere idle diplomatic phrases. They were used for the purpose of obtaining commercial advantages; and were the basis upon which those advantages were to rest. They were held out as the consideration—as the inducement, to that Government; and it is fairly to be inferred, from the documents, that they received the approbation of the Secretary of State. It is time, then, the American people should inquire, and should distinctly know, whether this declaration was authorized by the Executive branch of the Government.

Mr. B. said it was not his intention, at this time, to bring into discussion, even indirectly, the Mission to Panama. Upon that important subject he would then express no opinion. He wished to know precisely, whether Mr. Poinsett had exceeded his instructions or not. He believed this knowledge was all important. If the Executive had determined to abandon the course of policy which had been heretofore pursued, and to enter into entangling alliances with any nation, the people should be informed of this determination. If such were not the intention, is it honorable; is it consistent with our national character; is it not a violation of the public faith, to hold out a pledge, for the purpose of deceiving Mexico, and then, after we shall have obtained the privileges which we desired, to mock at their calamity in the day of danger? Our intercourse with all nations should rest upon principles of justice. What would the Government of Mexico think of us, what would they have a right to think, if our Minister should hold one language to-day, and, after we had obtained from them what we wanted, we should disclaim his authority to-morrow? In every point of view, Mr. B. thought the subject was well worthy of inquiry.

Mr. COOK said that, on consulting the documents, he perceived that the gentleman had fallen into a surprising mistake, in the inference that the language of our Minister had been reported to the Department, and approved. If gentlemen would compare the dates of the Minister's letter, and that of the Secretary of State, they would find that the Secretary's letter is in reply to a previous communication of the Minister, and that that which contains this language, was not received when the Secretary wrote his last despatch. As to the pledge referred to, it could mean nothing more than the declaration of President Monroe. Whatever pledge had been given by the United States to Mexico, must, of course, have been already known to Mexico, or to its Government; such a pledge was not then brought to its knowledge: for the Minister speaks of it as one already given. The plain meaning was, a reference to the declaration of the late President—a declaration, hailed throughout this country, with, perhaps, an imprudent enthusiasm. Mr. C. had no objection to the inquiry proposed, but had risen, merely, to rescue the conduct of the Secretary of State from a misapprehension.

Mr. HUSTON rose to address the House; but, the hour allotted to resolutions having expired, the Speaker arrested the discussion.

Massachusetts Militia Claims.

Mr. HUSTON moved to postpone all the orders of the day, which precede the bill making provision for allowing compensation to the State of Massachusetts, for militia services, rendered during the late war.

The motion prevailed, and the House accordingly went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. BUCHANAN in the chair, on that subject.

Mr. HAMILTON opened the debate, in a speech which occupied about three-quarters of an hour.

He first stated distinctly the principles on which the militia claims of Massachusetts were to be adjusted, in conformity to the report of the Committee on Military Affairs, which he had been instructed to make; which report provides:

First. That the claims of Massachusetts, for all Militia services, rendered during the late war, should be audited and paid, were afforded in compliance with requisitions of an officer of the Government of the United States.

Secondly. That all services rendered by the Militia of the State, at the request and suggestion of an officer of the General Government, if necessary to the defence of said State.

Thirdly. For all services rendered by the Militia of the State, without such request or suggestion, but to repel actual invasion, or, under a well-founded apprehension of invasion, provided the number of the troops called out or employed, were in due proportion to the exigency, and were not specifically withheld from an officer of the Government authorized to apply for the command of the same.

Mr. HAMILTON then applied to these principles the rights of a common defence, which Massachusetts had, under the guarantee of the Constitution of the United States, and went to show that the unjustifiable principles of construction which the State of Massachusetts had set up, in the opinion of her own authorities, did not affect the question, as presented by the report of the Committee on Military Affairs. He laid down the principle, that the mere avowal of an abstract opinion, by the authorities of a State, ought not to deprive its people of remuneration for services rendered, where in point of fact, this opinion could be proved to have had no effect upon the character, usefulness, or patriotism of the services so rendered.

Mr. H. then gave a brief historical account of the services of the militia of Massachusetts, and applied the facts, growing out of these services, to the principles of adjustment which the committee had reported.

He then appealed to the justice and good feelings of the House, to fix on some principles of accommodation and adjustment, by which this question, which was the fruitful source of so much excitement and agitation in Massachusetts, might be settled forever: that this was one of the most holy and acceptable offices which the General Government could render to a member of this Confederacy: and dwelt with great earnestness on the common charity which the States ought to display to each other, on those occasions of irritation and conflict, growing out of those jealousies of State power, that would occasionally arise, which were only perpetuated by unnecessary hostilities, reproach, and rebuke: and concluded by saying, that the Committee on Military Affairs considered the power of the General Government sufficiently vindicated and upheld, in the bill for the settlement of the claims in question, then under consideration, by restricting the settlement to the class of cases enumerated, and by withholding payment in all other cases, where, in point of fact, the unconstitutional opinions of the State authorities of Massachusetts, as to the power of the General Government over the militia of the States, had, specifically, operation and effect.

Mr. DAVIS then addressed the committee:

The subject brought under consideration by my friend from South Carolina, (Mr. HAMILTON,) is one in which the State of Massachusetts is deeply interested; and if I were not to attempt to bring it to a just issue, I should feel my constituents would deem it a censurable omission of duty.

In order that the question which arises out of this claim may be fully comprehended, I shall briefly notice the history of the transactions connected with it. Eleven years have now passed away since the events of which I am about to speak occurred; and if passion or prejudice has ever mingled with the feelings of any one, in forming opinions in relation to them, time sufficient has now gone by to restore a cool deliberate judgment, and to enable us to look upon them with the same candor as upon more remote events of history.

In April, 1812, Congress passed a law requiring the Executives of the several States to detail, organize, and hold in readiness, to be called into the service of the United States, at a moment's warning, 100,000 militia. The quota assigned to Massachusetts was about 10,000, and the Executive was required to organize the men, when detached, according to law, and to appoint a full complement of officers to the command. This order or law was executed by detaching and organizing the troops into three divisions and six brigades. Another measure adopted, as preparatory, was a division of the United States into military districts, with an officer of high rank, in the commission of the United States, to command each district. I say to command the district, because it appears by the documents on your table, that it was not the intention of the Government to place under the command of the officer of district number one, within the territory of which was Massachusetts, any considerable number of regular troops. This officer was invested with a kind of pro-consular power, having entrusted to him not only the care and supervision of military affairs in the district, but an authority to call into the service of the United States the troops detached under the law of April, 1812.

It was made known to the Executive, on the 12th June, 1812, by the Secretary of War, that General Dearborn, the commanding officer of the district, was invested with this authority, and the Executive was required to order the detached quota of men into the public service upon the call of General Dearborn. On the 18th of June, war was declared against Great Britain, and, on the 22d of that month, General D. asked for forty-one companies of this detached militia to enter the public service. The Governor declined executing the order, and from this arose a difference of opinion between the Executive of the State and of the United States, and to this difference of opinion is to be referred almost all the difficulties and almost all the controversy between the two Governments relative to the allowance of these claims. It becomes, therefore, necessary to examine with some care the course of proceeding on the one side and the other, and the reasons by which the parties at issue were governed. I shall do little more than state the points which have been made, without attempting to enter much into a discussion of them. To a compliance with this call, two objections have been urged, one to the form of the call, the other to the occasion of it. I will briefly examine them separately.

The call was for forty-one companies of a body of men already detached and fully organized, by a special act of Congress, and by order of the War Department, into companies, battalions, regiments, brigades, and divisions; and the full complement of officers appointed thereto, by the constitutional authorities of the State. The troops thus organized constituted three divisions.

The requisition was for forty-one companies, and the highest officer to be taken into the service of the United States, was a Lieutenant-Colonel, although forty-one companies constituted about one-third of the corps, or a Major-General's command. If, therefore, this order had been executed, a Major-General's command would have entered the public service, with a Lieutenant-Colonel at its head, and all the superior officers of a division, detached and appointed to the command by an act of Congress, would have been deprived of their men, and their men of them; or, if they had been drawn from all the three divisions, the effect would have been the same: for it would have reduced each division and brigade below the command of its officer. The question which here arises, is, whether the United States can draw the militia of a State into the public service, without its officers? The constitution, after declaring that Congress has power to provide, in certain cases, for calling forth the militia, and to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining them, declares, expressly, that the appointment of the officers is reserved to the States. In affirmance of this principle, the law of Congress, under which this detachment was made, directs that the officers shall be appointed by the constitutional authority of the respective States. These officers were therefore rightfully appointed, as they were appointed according to the constitution, and the concurrent provisions of the law under both Governments. By what authority could they be separated from their troops? The right of militia to be commanded by their own officers has never, to my knowledge, been denied, nor has it ever been contended, unless this requisition is proof of it, that officers of the militia could be removed from their command, to give place to officers of the United States. The mutual rights of officers and men belonging to militia to be united in public service, seems too obvious to require the aid of argument. How, then, could these troops, amounting in number, and by organization, to a Major-General's command, be drawn into the public service, without their officers, especially when those officers had been assigned to their respective commands by the authority of the United States? The only answer I have heard given, is, that they were to be distributed upon the sea coast, to perform garrison duty in the forts—and were to pass under officers of the United States in command of those forts, who would have been outranked, if the complement of officers for a division had been taken into the service.

Is this a sufficient reason for dismissing from their command officers appointed under the constitution, and detached and assigned by a special law of Congress to the command? Will this justify a separation of officers and men, and is it no violation of an acknowledged constitutional right? If regimental, brigade, and division officers were not necessary for the service, and were not intended to be taken into it, why were they detached? If the men were to be called out by companies, and their organization into larger bodies could be disregarded, why was the Executive required, both by law, and the order of the Secretary of War, to organize them into battalions, regiments, brigades, and divisions? Why, if it was competent for an officer of the United States to make a call for a large body of troops, by companies, were not the 10,000 men detached and organized without a higher than a company officer?

Massachusetts Militia Claims.

[H. OF R.]

The next objection to the requisition for forty-one companies, is, that no constitutional emergency existed at the time of the call, which justified it. This ground of objection was taken by the Executive of the State, and has been a principal source of controversy and conflict of opinion in relation to this claim. I will also state the reasons, as I have understood them, upon which this opinion rested. The constitution declares that "The Congress shall have power to provide for calling forth the militia, to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions." It is manifest, from this language, that the power confided to the United States over the militia, is limited to the three exigencies mentioned in the constitution: and that one or the other of them must happen before the right of calling the militia into service exists; and so Congress seem to have considered it. In 1795, in the exercise of this power, Congress passed a law providing for calling forth the militia to execute the laws, when disobeyed, to suppress insurrections, and to repel invasions. Provision was also made for calling them forth in cases of imminent danger of invasion. A greater power than this has not been claimed by Congress in any law that has ever been passed upon this subject. Receiving, then, the law of '95 as the true exposition of constitutional power, I shall ask the attention of the committee to the state of facts as they existed at the time General Dearborn made his requisition, and they will show the reasons by which the Executive was influenced in his decision. The troops were not demanded to execute the laws: for they were not disobeyed. They were not demanded to suppress insurrections: for none existed. But they were avowedly demanded to meet the exigencies of the war, and the question arose whether there was any invasion or imminent danger of invasion. There was no invasion: for no enemy was within our territory. But imminent danger of invasion might exist; and the inquiry arose, both as to what imminent danger of invasion was, and as to its existence at that period, which was four days subsequent to the declaration of war. It was urged that imminent danger could not be that which is remote and unknown, but that which exposes us to obvious hazard—that which is apparent and threatening, or, as the word imminent implies, hanging over us?

If a declaration of war alone should justify calling out the militia into public service, then would it be in the power of the United States to convert the militia at once into a standing army, and to hold every man liable to do duty in the service during the continuance of a war, if it were, like the late wars in Europe, protracted for twenty-five years. A power like this, exerting itself upon the population of this country, would too much resemble the objectionable and arbitrary conscriptive system of France.

This brings me to inquire what the Executive of the State did, in view of this state of things. He declined executing the order of General Dearborn, because he considered he had no power to do otherwise. He considered his power as limited, by the constitution, to the existence of some of the exigencies mentioned in that instrument; and in the absence of all evidence of the existence of any of them, he considered that he could not execute the order, because, in this country, no authority but the laws is known or acknowledged. Hence, it was thought that the Executive could not execute the order of General Dearborn, as it did not rest upon constitutional power, and therefore, carried with it no obligation of obedience.

Having now explained the reasons by which the Executive was influenced, as I have understood them, perhaps incorrectly, but not intentionally so, I shall leave them to the consideration of the committee, and inquire how far the United States were necessarily affected by his decision.

By the law of '95, which contains the general provisions for calling the militia into the service of the United States, the President is authorized, for that purpose, to issue his order to an officer or officers of the militia. By the act of April, 1812, under which the ten thousand men were detached, the provisions for calling this detachment into actual service, are the same as I understand them. The President had, therefore, power to issue his order to any officer or officers of the militia thus detached; but, as the Governor was not a detached officer, it may well be doubted whether he could issue an order to him, even in his military capacity, for these troops; but admitting, for the purpose of argument, that he had this right, he also had the right of issuing it to any or all the officers detached, so that the Governor's neglect to obey, did not, or could not, affect the power of the United States over the troops, if a constitutional exigency for calling them into service existed. If, therefore, the officer of the United States making this order, felt a confidence that a period had arrived, which gave to him constitutional power to call for troops, he need not have stopped, upon the Governor's refusal, but might have drawn them into service against his judgment; for the right to the troops, and the power of ordering them into service, does not appear to depend on the will of the Governor.

Before leaving this part of the subject, I will mention one more fact, which seems to have some connection with it. While the Governor declined executing the order for the forty-one companies, he, about the same time, detached a Major's command of three companies, and, at the request of General Dearborn, had them mustered into the service of the United States, for the defence of the frontier that borders upon New Brunswick; not because there was invasion, or danger of invasion, for the Governor of Nova Scotia had issued his proclamation forbidding all incursions upon our territory; but evil-disposed persons had collected there, and, taking advantage of the belligerent state of the two countries, manifested a disposition to plunder the inhabitants, and he thought it but just that they should have a more efficient protection than the civil authorities could yield.

In this condition affairs remained for nearly two years, when a peace was ratified between the belligerent nations of Europe, which left the army and navy of our enemy idle, and at liberty to be employed against this country. As might have been expected, he projected a system of operations for the campaign of 1814, more vigorous and extensive than those of the preceding years.

Early in the campaign of 1814, this enemy commenced his operations by blockading our ports, and intercepting our commerce. He soon began to destroy shipping, wherever it fell into his hands, either by capture, or by cutting it out of undefended ports. In June he landed at Saco, in Maine, and destroyed some private property. As his strength was from time to time increased, he grew more daring, and, in the latter part of July and August, kept the whole coast in a state of great alarm and trepidation, by constant attempts to land and commit depredations, wherever the coast was undefended. To meet these operations, and to quiet apprehension wherever there was cause for alarm, guards were placed along the coast, to watch the motions of the enemy. Militia were turned out to defend the passes to the Navy Yard at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, and also to the Navy Yard at Charlestown. Orders were also issued to the commanders of militia, if any part of the country was invaded, or threatened with invasion, not to wait for orders from any one, but to turn out, and meet and repel the foe. In July, General Dearborn asked for 1,100 men, to strengthen the fortifications, and they were, by order of the Governor, mustered into the service of the United States. On the last of August or first of September, the enemy took possession of the Peninsula of Castine, in Penobscot Bay. This, together with his success in other parts of the country, excited great apprehensions for the safety of the shipping and the towns. The inhabitants were pressing in their calls for further protection; and on the 2d of September large bodies of troops, under the discretionary orders of the Governor, previously given to military commanders, were marched to the defence of Portland, Kennebeck, Wiscasset, and other places in Maine. On the 6th of that month, the Governor renewed his order to the whole militia of the Commonwealth, requiring them to hold themselves in readiness to march at a moment's warning, to defend the State. He also, by the same order, assembled nearly 4,000 militia for the defence of Boston. On the 17th of this month he placed 1,200 militia under General Dearborn, to strengthen the forts in the harbor of Boston. This state of alarm, of anxiety, and danger, continued as long as the weather permitted the enemy to remain with safety on the coast. He pressed the war with all the vigor in his power, cutting out, burning, and destroying shipping and other property; cannonading towns, threatening the destruction of the salt works; attempting daily to invade and dishonor the territory. The claim, sir, under consideration, asks reimbursement for money advanced by the State to pay either for spontaneous services, rendered without special orders from any one, to protect the soil, property, and persons of the inhabitants, from invaders; or for services of like character, performed under the authority of the State. Services such as have been allowed to other States.

This brings me to inquire why this claim has not been adjusted?

It is not because it was not presented, and pressed with all becoming zeal, upon the consideration of this Government, soon after the war. It is not because the services have not been rendered and paid for by the State. It is not because those services were not beneficial, and essential to the safety of the country: for, of all these points there is most unquestionable proof. But because there was a constitutional difficulty. It was alleged by the Department, that, in the early part of the war, the Executive of the State had assumed grounds, in relation to the constitutional authority of the United States over the militia, so repugnant to the true interpretation of that instrument, and so hostile to the interests of the nation, that the claim could not be allowed.

To this it was answered, that the opinions of an officer of the State could not be made to bear upon the claim, so as to affect the right to reimbursement: that the State is not responsible for the opinions of its officers, whether right or wrong, so as to be liable to fine or punishment; and that the only inquiry was, whether the services were rendered in defence of the country, and, if so, and found to be necessary, they come within the rules adopted in allowances to other States.

To this it was rejoined, that the constitutional difficulty tainted and rendered void the whole claim, so that the State of Massachusetts could not be let in upon a footing with other States. In this manner the claim rested; the agents of the State constantly soliciting the attention of the officers of the Government to it, and the officers of the Government as constantly declining to do any thing about it, until 1823, when the President was prevailed upon to direct that a portion of it should be examined. It was, therefore, committed to an Auditor, who reported upon it, and upon the evidence by which it was sustained.

The President, after giving, as he says, great consideration to this report, and seeing the unequivocal proofs by which the claim was supported, declared, in a message to Congress, his entire conviction that the services were spontaneous, patriotic, and necessary to the defence of the country, and ought to be allowed. This sentiment he has repeated, most distinctly and most earnestly, three times, in as many messages to this House. It has been reiterated by as many committees of this House; but still the subject has never been acted upon by Congress; and this accounts for the delay.

Massachusetts Militia Claims.

Before I proceed to consider more particularly the weight of this constitutional difficulty, I will recur again to the transactions of 1814; and, in connection with them, ask the attention of the committee to one or two facts to which I have not adverted; not that I consider them as affecting this claim, but that I wish to pass over nothing which, by any one, can be deemed important. In June, of that year, troops were ordered out to defend the Navy Yards at Charlestown and Portsmouth; in July, eleven hundred men were mustered into the service of the United States, to strengthen the forts: in the same month, orders were issued to the officers of militia, to meet threatened, and to repel actual invasion, without waiting for orders from any one. On the 6th of September, orders were issued to call into the service about four thousand men, for the defence of Boston, and the whole militia were commanded to hold themselves in readiness to enter the service at a moment's warning. On the 17th of September, twelve hundred men were mustered into the service of the United States, to strengthen the forts in the harbor of Boston. These measures were adopted by the Executive of the State, for the general defence. On the 5th September, General Dearborn made a requisition upon the Governor for four thousand six hundred troops, to be distributed along the maritime frontier, for sea-coast defence. The documents do not inform us whether any reply was made to this demand of General Dearborn; several objections appear to lie against it, and although I cannot bring my mind to the persuasion that the opinions and the proceedings of the Governor, whether well or ill-founded, can affect this claim, as I shall by and by attempt to show, yet I will state such objections as seem to me to be in any way important. To show their bearing, I must again recur to the constitution and the laws, for the purpose of ascertaining whether the President of the United States had, at this time, any authority to detach and hold in readiness to enter the public service, a body of militia. The law of 1812, under which the ten thousand men were organized, had expired by its own limitation, being confined in its operations to two years. The 10,000 men were, therefore, disbanded, and no longer as a detachment, liable to be called into service. The power of Congress, in relation to the militia, has usually been considered as divided into two branches: the one has been exercised in preparatory measures, such as detaching and organizing a body to be held in readiness to enter the service when an exigency shall occur. This is a power which may be, and is, exercised, when no right exists to call the troops into actual service, and has always been considered by Congress as distinct from the power of actually calling into the service. It is a preparatory measure, as it merely places troops in readiness to enter the public service. But this preparatory measure cannot be resorted to except by an act of legislation. Such an organized body (for it is a new organization of the militia) cannot be created without an act of Congress: for no power can be exercised over the militia by an officer of the United States, except under a law of Congress. At the time, there was no law authorizing this preparatory organization. The general law of '95 is silent upon this subject; and that it was never designed to give authority for such a measure, we have the repeated testimony of Congress itself in three special acts, passed for this purpose, since the law of '95 has been in force; one in 1806, one in 1808, and one at the commencement of the war in 1812. In other instances, where the measure has been attempted, it was always done under a special act of legislation, and in no other way. Yet, notwithstanding this want of legal provision, General Armstrong, then Secretary of War, on the 4th of July, 1814, addressed a note to the Executive of Massachusetts, inviting him to unite with certain Executives of other States, in organizing a corps of 93,500 men, to be held in readiness to enter the public service when an exigency should occur, and refers to the general law of '95, for his authority: and yet it is apparent, from the tenor of the note itself, that the writer doubted his own authority, as he does not, in the usual manner, command or require, but invite. If I am right in the position I have taken, General Armstrong had no authority to propose this measure, nor the Governor any authority to execute it: for it does not, in any thing, pursue the provisions of the act of '95, nor can it be considered, as has been observed by the Supreme Court of the United States, either as an order or a requisition. I do not mean to deny the authority of the United States to call the militia into the public service, under the act of '95: for if that act had been pursued, it might have been done by detaching orders from the President; but this was not attempted nor designed to be done by the Secretary of War. His object was to form a corps, by a new organization, unknown to any law then in existence, to be held in readiness, to be detached by parcels into the public service, if an exigency should occur; and this could not be done.

Having shown, as I think, that the invitation of Gen. Armstrong rested upon no authority except his own wishes, and that the Governor could not issue any order upon it, that the troops would have been bound to obey, I will now inquire what authority General Dearborn had to make a demand for 4,500 men. On this point I have no evidence except what is contained in the printed documents. It appears, however, to be of a limited character. We find its character and extent pretty accurately defined in a letter from Mr. Monroe, Secretary of War, to Mr. Giles, chairman of a committee of the Senate, in 1815. In speaking of these commanders of districts, he says, "these commanders were specially charged with the defence of their respective districts. It was enjoined on them to watch the movements of the enemy, to communicate to the Government, and to execute its orders in summoning to the field, on menace of invasion, such portions of the quotas of the militia of each State, within their respective districts, as had been provided for by act of Congress, and detailed by this Department, as were thought necessary." Now, sir, there was no quota of militia provided for by any act of Congress, at the time General Armstrong gave his invitation to the Governor—nor had there been any detailing orders issued from the Department of War, to organize any quota of militia. No such body of militia could exist: for there was no act of Congress which authorized it. It is plain, Mr. Monroe here speaks of a quota organized to be held in readiness to enter the public service when an occasion should occur for their services. It is also plain that Gen. Dearborn had power to call for such detached militia, and none other; and as no such detachment had, or could, have been made under any authority of Congress, it is also plain that General Dearborn could make no demand upon the Governor. His requisition was, therefore, without authority, and imposed no obligation of obedience. If I am right in this view of the subject, there could be no wrong in disregarding the call of Gen. Dearborn. This was not, however, the reason offered by the Executive for his neglect to comply with Gen. D.'s request. In a letter addressed to the Secretary of War, on the 7th of September, 1814, he states, that, pursuant to a request of Gen. Dearborn, he had, in July preceding, detached 1,100 militia, and placed them under his command, but such inconveniences arose from the measure, that it could not be then repeated.

These objections and inconveniences arose from the following causes: In the first place, with 1,100 men, making a battalion of artillery and a regiment of infantry, a Major of artillery and a Lieutenant-Colonel of infantry only were received into the service, although there were at least three battalions. In the second place, these troops were, by the laws of Massachusetts, organized into companies of 64 men each, with three officers to a company. When taken into the service of the United States, they were organized into companies of 100 men each, thus dismissing a portion of the platoon officers, and deranging the whole system. In the third place, they were placed in forts, and, in all instances, as a committee of this House state, under officers of the United States, of equal grade with the officers of the militia. In some of these forts, say the committee, there were very few men, and, in some, none at all. The complaints did not arise from being placed under the command of officers of the United States, of equal rank, where such officers had an actual bona fide command of regular troops; for this was a precedence they were willing to yield; but they complained of being placed under officers who had either only an apology for a command, or no command at all. The militia, sir, have pride, and honor, and ambition; for they are composed of the best blood of this country. When measures are adopted which humble that pride, which disregard that honor, which crush that ambition, and declare to them that they are unfit for the service to which they have been called, they have just cause of complaint, and will complain—discontent and dissatisfaction will prevail.

But it is said that the course pursued by the Executive impaired the physical force of the United States. By this it is, I suppose, meant to allege that the Executive possessed and exercised an authority by which he threw himself between the two governments, and prevented the United States from employing the militia in their service. This argument supposes the Governor to possess a power which does not appear to be entrusted to him. It supposes that he can, at his pleasure, withhold the militia from the United States, and that they have no remedy, but are dependent on his will. The laws of the United States will show that the fact is far otherwise; that the Executives of States have but a miserable remnant of authority over the militia, too feeble to excite jealousy; and that this power does not stand in the way of the United States; for, whenever the President chooses to take the militia into public service, he can do it in defiance of the authority of the Executive of a State. The law of '95 contains all the important provisions upon this subject. It enacts that the militia may be called into the service of the United States in cases of invasion, and of imminent danger of invasion; and, for this purpose, the President may issue his orders—to whom? Not to the Executive of the State—not to the Governor—but to any officer or officers of the militia. It neither names nor refers to the Chief Magistrates of States; nor does it authorize any call upon them as the organs of State sovereignty; but gives the right of issuing orders to, and exercising power over, officers of the militia only.

I will now consider, more distinctly, the effect of the opinions and the acts of the Governor. It is said, in these documents, that the claim could not be allowed, because of certain anti-constitutional opinions advanced by the Governor. It was contended by the State, that a large portion of the claim had no connection with the Governor's neglect to comply with the order of June 22, 1812, and of September 5, 1814: for it is for services rendered on sudden and pressing emergencies, without any special order from either Government, and came clearly within a class of claims such as had been allowed to other States; but it was objected that the opinions of the Executive tainted this part of the claim also, and it has not been allowed.

Massachusetts Militia Claims.

[H. OF R.]

Where is the authority by which a State is made responsible for the opinions of its officers—and especially of its military officers? Is it in the constitution? Is it in the laws? No, sir, it has not even the authority of precedent. The State has a claim for money, such as is allowed to other States, but the money is withheld—and why? Not because it is not due, but as a punishment for the heretical opinions of an officer of militia. Can this be done, sir? Can you punish a State for the heresy of its militia officers? If so, where is the tribunal that can pronounce the verdict of guilty? Where the tribunal that can measure out the punishment? Where the authority to inflict it?

Now, sir, what does this examination show? It shows that the United States declared war against Great Britain; that this powerful enemy assailed, with his land and naval forces, the State of Massachusetts; that he destroyed her commerce, plundered the property of her citizens, and invaded her territory; that the State was left almost wholly undefended and unprotected by the United States; that, under these circumstances, the militia of the State turned out, either spontaneously, or by order of State authority, and repelled the foe, and saved the State from dishonor; that most of these services have, in repeated messages of the President to this House, been declared to be patriotic, and indispensably necessary to the defence of the country, and have also had the same testimony in their favor from every committee of this House to whom they have been referred; that other States have been allowed for like services, while the whole of this claim has been refused.

And now, sir, who is it that demands reimbursement? It is not a party to this controversy, which took place eleven years ago; it is not a disobedient militia officer who makes the demand. No, sir, it is the people of Massachusetts, who had nothing, and could have had nothing to do with the contest between the United States and the Governor, as a militia officer. It is the people of that ancient State, which occupies one of the brightest pages in the history of this nation; it is the people, who have poured out their blood, and their treasure, in defence of the United States; and shall they be made the victim of a selfish policy? Shall they be told, that they stand responsible for the opinions and neglect of militia officers, with whose conduct the State had no connection? Is this the manner in which the constitution is to receive construction? Is a member of this Confederacy to be fined for constitutional heresy? It is now the fashion to maintain State rights, State independence, and State prerogatives. I rejoice that the day has come which returns this doctrine upon us: for, to my mind, no axiom, no political truth is more obvious, than that the permanence and stability of our institutions depend upon a free exercise of all the rights reserved to the States.

Mr. HousTON next took the floor, in opposition to the bill. He said his intention in rising, on the present occasion, was to take a summary view of the ground on which the claim of Massachusetts rests.

I am, said Mr. H., decidedly opposed to an allowance of any portion of the claim now under discussion. I will endeavor to answer the arguments of the gentleman who has just taken his seat, (Mr. DAVIS.) I assure the committee, that the objections which I entertain on this occasion, are based upon principle, and not from any feeling of hostility towards the community who have advanced this claim. The gentleman from Massachusetts has told us, that this claim rests upon just and equitable grounds; and that whatever may have been the doctrines entertained by the Governor of Massachusetts, it is unfair to mulct a community for the acts done only in defence of State rights. Now, I insist, if the demand is just, it should be paid. All I ask, before this House proceeds to pay that claim, is that they will give it a full and fair examination. It has been recommended by the President of the United States, to give a decision upon the claim at some period. I hope that period has now arrived.

The claim is founded on services performed by the troops of Massachusetts during the last war. It cannot, surely, be urged, that these services were performed under the Constitution of the United States. What are the facts? In June, 1812, a circular was issued by the Secretary of War, addressed to the Governors of the several States, with a requisition for their respective quotas of militia, to be held in readiness when called for by the emergencies growing out of a state of war. The Governor of Massachusetts did not recognize the authority of the President of the United States, and waived a compliance with the order. His plea was, that the President of the United States had no authority to make such requisition, as no emergency then existed, which, by the constitution, gave him the power of calling out the militia of the several States. And the Governor further added, that, to this effect, he was advised, by the Judges of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, and by his Council. Some of the citizens of that State were willing to embark in the service of the United States, but were precluded from so doing by the want of arms. The Governor says he issued arms to some, but not to others. It was determined by the General Government to call out the militia under officers appointed to the different departments, for the purpose of contributing to the defence of their own coast. The regulations of the Government, at that time, fixing the rank of officers, was so arranged, that, whenever an officer of the militia should be called out, to act with an officer of the same grade of the United States, that the latter should take rank of the former. This rule obtained from the highest to the lowest grades of the army. But it never was pretended, that the militia officers of superior grade should be subject to the immediate orders of the United States officers of inferior rank. When, for instance, a Major-General of the militia was serving with a Major-General of the United States army, the Major-General of the regular army necessarily took rank of that of the militia. But, if a Colonel of the United States service, in command of his regiment, was co-operating with a Brigadier-General of militia, the General would, necessarily, take his rank and command. Therefore the measure was objected to, more on account of its substance than any notions of form or etiquette. I am authorized to say so, by the documents which have been exhibited in support of this claim. But, it is said, that two objections were urged to the requisition; that one hundred and forty-one companies, which were to be detached, were sufficient to constitute one or more divisions, and that no general officer from the State was to be called out and placed in command.

But, Mr. Chairman, where was the necessity for the detail of a Major-General? An officer of the General Government was already there, in command of the district, and it was not intended that these one hundred and forty-one companies should be consolidated. Had that been the case, the objection might have been urged, with plausibility at least. The detail of a general officer would then have been proper. But such was not the fact. These companies were to be detached to different places. Some were intended to man the forts, others to guard the coast at different points. What need was there then, of a general officer, when a commanding officer of the district was responsible for its defence? It was not designed, by the General Government, to station, at any one point, more than one regiment, constituting a command for a colonel, and not more. We are told, by the Governor, that the troops of Boston were already in a state of preparation for defence, and that, in six hours, they could be marched from the neighboring villages, and that further preparation was not considered necessary. Sir, if the objection rested on this little point of etiquette alone, it lasted too long, and was of too serious moment. It may be urged that the consideration for pride of rank should weigh much on this occasion. I am willing to concede the gentleman all that he can justly demand in behalf of military pride. But, sir, there was no ground furnished for the exercise of this pride, under the circumstances of the requisition made. Was it ever attempted, during the war, to separate the men from their immediate officers? To detach the captains from their companies? To place these companies, subject to the command of a captain, in the regular army? Such a measure was never attempted, or even thought of. There was no real or implied infringement on the rights of the militia.

The militia of Massachusetts were called out to defend their own frontier. No order has ever come under my view, directing them to be marched to the frontier of the United States, or to defend the territory of other States. If Massachusetts was really disposed to co-operate in the defence of the country, why did she not defend her own borders? But it seems, from the communication of the Governor of Massachusetts to the Secretary of War, that the Governor of Nova Scotia, actuated, no doubt, by the amiability of his character, had interdicted any invasion of the borders of New England. Was the proclamation of the Governor of Nova Scotia to be regarded, and an order from the Government of the United States to be disregarded? Had not war been declared against Great Britain, by the constitutional authorities of this country? Was not that declaration a solemn law? Was it not the supreme law of the land? Did it extend to all the States, or only to a few of them? Must a special law be passed, expressly declaring that Massachusetts shall defend its borders? Sir, that declaration of war struck a panic through England, and its dependencies. But Massachusetts was not to be affected by it. That declaration was to be met by the Governor of Massachusetts, declaring that the people were not willing to be drawn from their homes, and to rally on the border before an enemy approached. Could the order be really understood in this way by the Governor? No, sir. It was only an order that the militia should be detached, and held in requisition. But what is the meaning of the term "detached?" It is, that a regular detail should be made, constituting a certain body, to fill the quota proper to be furnished by each State, in order that the men may know who are, and who are not, designated to march, when orders to that effect are given. The detail itself is not an order to march, but only a notification to those who are to be in readiness.

Sir, on this subject of yielding the etiquette of military rank, I can refer to the most illustrious example: An individual, who has been charged with high-handed and overbearing measures—who has been erroneously charged with the violation of the constitution of his country—who yielded this point of military etiquette, whether expressed or implied, in the regulations of the army. When the militia of Tennessee, under the command of General Jackson, formed a junction with the troops of Georgia, under the command of General Pinckney, in the Creek nation, General Jackson was in command of a victorious army. His commission was of a date prior to that of General Pinckney, and of equal rank. They were major-generals—Jackson of the militia—Pinckney of the regular army. Did General Jackson squabble about military etiquette? No, sir. Though the laurels of victory luxuriated on his brow, and he was the chief of many battles, without a word he recognized the order of General Pinckney, and obeyed his command. He sheathed that sword, so often drawn in his country's cause, and never drawn in vain. He returned home, accompanied by his brave followers, and met the thanks of a grateful country. Was he degraded? He submitted to the laws of his country—he had no scruples of military etiquette. But, it is said, in the case of Massachusetts, that there was no law for this requisition—that the order was a request, and not a law. Sir, I ask again, Was not the declaration of war a law? Was the State of Massachusetts an exception to the operation of that law? Was it a partial law? Or was it intended to be general in its operation?

But we are told, that all the regular troops in Massachusetts were marched to the northern frontier. If so, were they not marched where they were most needed? The militia were sufficient for the purposes of State defence. That State was filled with a dense population, and the invasion of an enemy could, at any time, be resisted without difficulty, where inclination was not wanting. But, while so much complaint is made, that the regular troops were marched away, it is not amiss to ask, what steps were taken to increase the regular troops, by the recruiting service? Sir, what was the language held in relation to that service, in Massachusetts, at that time? Did the recruiting officers of the army meet with no obstructions? Was not the regular service entirely discouraged? Did not the civil authority expressly interfere to prevent its success? And did not another authority lend its aid to the discouragement?

The gentleman says, that the Governor did right to refuse obedience to the President's circular; that the General Government had no authority to issue such an order; that the law of 1795 gave authority to the President only to call upon the militia officers of the several States; that the law does not name the Governor, but only the militia officers. This is true. But I will show you that the law of '95 was faulty in this respect. It ought to have named the Governor. The expression of the law should have been more full. But, still I ask you, how you will separate the Governor from the militia officers of a State, when he is himself, ex officio, the commander-in-chief of the militia of that State? Is it not true, that the civil and military functions are both united in him? Then, I am unable to perceive the distinction between a militia officer and the commander-in-chief of the militia. And, I say, it would be irregular, in the General Government, to issue an order to any subordinate officer, without that order first passing through the commander-in-chief. All regular details of troops from a State, must be made through the Governor of that State, by the officers of the General Government, unless in extreme cases. If this rule be disregarded, there will be no medium at which to stop, between a Governor of a State and a corporal of a squad. The Governor has the roster of his general officers, and can, with regularity, and facility, reach the lowest detail of his command.

But, it has been emphatically asked, where is the power of the Governor to thrust himself between the physical power of the State and that of the General Government? Sir, I ask the same question. I want to find this power as much as the gentleman does. I believe there is but one precedent for it, and that is in the case of the Governor of Massachusetts. Did not the Governor of Massachusetts do every thing to resist the power of the General Government? Did not Governor Strong interpose himself between the General Government and the people of his own State? I say he did. And, whether this was physical or moral resistance, it had the effect to paralyze the arm of the General Government to a certain extent. Did he not call upon his judges to sustain him in his position of neutrality which he had taken? Sir, I do not implicate, in his conduct, the whole of that respectable State. I am well aware that there were some men who did much, and would gladly have done more. It is not my wish to degrade the people of that State. The ruling politicians of that day are responsible to the American people. My information respecting this case, I have obtained from documentary evidence. From the documents, I find, that the Governor issued his orders to the Legislature of that State, to take no part in this "unhallowed war." The Legislature responded to that sentiment, and directed the militia to remain at home. Sir, this was done in 1814.

If the Governor, in all this, had acted unknowingly, I could find an excuse for him. If his errors had been those of omission only, the guilt would have been less; and, if it were true, that the Governor alone had erred, I should then say that the State of Massachusetts ought not to be prejudiced. But if, on the contrary, it be a fact, that what he did was done with his eyes open, that his errors were those, not of omission only, but of commission also; and, in his studied course of resistance to the United States, he was sustained by a majority of the voice of the people of Massachusetts in that resistance—while a war was raging, and a savage enemy laying waste our country, burning and destroying our towns and villages, a Governor thus acting, found a regular accession of strength and support from the people over whom he presided;—then, I say, that people is responsible. The people of that State came again to the polls; they had opportunity then to place a veto on his conduct. Did they do so? Is there any thing like a shadow of disapprobation? No, sir. They approved his course, they sustained his principles. He was re-elected by increased majorities. They hailed his re-election with acclamations. Their Legislature rendered solemn thanks to Heaven for his re-election. And, now, sir, what is asked of this Congress? To pay for services rendered by troops whose services had not met the spirit of the constitution.

We find that assurances had been given to the Governor of that State, that, if the requisitions of the General Government were not complied with, that "the measures which may be adopted by a State Government, for the defence of a State, must be considered its own measures, and not those of the United States. The expenses attending them are chargeable to the State, and not to the United States. Your Excellency will perceive that a different construction would lead into the most important, and, as it is believed, into the most pernicious consequences." Yet we find his Excellency prepared to risk the consequences; and it is but fit that the State should now be answerable for them. Look at the subsequent conduct of this same Governor. On the ground of this federal assurance, troops were placed, by compromise, under the officers of the General Government. They refused obedience to their officers, and the compromise was dissolved. There were then but few regular troops in that State. The situation of the northern frontier required their presence, and that became their destination. In Massachusetts we find there was a great reverence entertained for the constitution of the country. The State authorities would not permit their troops to step beyond the lines of the State. Yet we are called upon to pay these troops for services rendered to the United States in the last war. And pray, sir, how long did they serve? Information on this point is very vague and indefinite. Some for "nearly three months"—some for two weeks, and others for two days. But, sir, we are assured, and with much gravity, too, that Governor Strong, in all this matter, had no "desire to embarrass the General Government." On this point I may safely leave all to judge for themselves. But, sir, what says Massachusetts herself on this point? Hear the address of Governor Eustis to the Legislature, in the May session of 1823. In addressing the Legislature, touching this claim, he says: "The long-continued opposition to the Federal Government, more especially the measures pursued in this State, during the eventful and critical period of the late war—the withholding from the Government the constitutional means of defence—the paralyzing influence exercised over the agents of that Government, which occasioned double sacrifice of life and treasure, while the citizens of other States were exercising their utmost energies against a common enemy; and, when a gallant army and navy were covering themselves with glory, and retrieving, and establishing, on an imperishable basis, the national character, on the ocean and on the land, must ever be regretted." And again, sir, when referring to the same subject in the continuation of the same address—"The rising generation who could have had no agency in this disloyal course, appear to have taken an honorable and earnest interest in its disavowal." To these sentiments we find both branches of the State Legislature of Massachusetts responding.

Mr. Chairman, if Massachusetts had, with a proper feeling of what was due to herself and the country, acted as the exigencies of the times demanded from her, as a leading State in this Confederacy, I would freely vote for remuneration. My language would be, pay this debt, if it swept the last dollar from our Treasury. If the claim is just, it ought, of right, to be, and must be paid. But the services for which we are asked to pay, were not rendered in accordance with the constitution, and those which were rendered were inefficient, and comparatively of no value.

Mr. Chairman, what is the motive for so great a change in sentiment as that expressed in the message of Governor Eustis? I will not say it is the love of gain and lucre. I had rather believe it is an honest revolution in public feeling, and that, should another crisis arrive, the people of Massachusetts would join the country and support the Government in asserting and defending the rights of both. But this is no argument that Congress must pay them for their good determinations in advance. The people of Massachusetts, like the people of any other State, can claim from this Government only what they have deserved.

But we are told that many of these militia were ardent patriots and good democrats. Sir, I stand here to do justice, and not to distribute alms. My resistance to this claim is a matter of principle, and, unless I can be convinced that the claim itself is just, I never can allow it to the claimants, whosoever they may be.

What was our situation, Mr. Chairman, when Massachusetts thought fit to resist the authority of the General Government? Our northern frontier was bleeding at every pore; our armies were reduced to skeletons; our Atlantic coast was bound in blockade by the enemy's ships; fleets hovered in sight of our seaports; our southern frontier was drenched in blood; a savage enemy had invaded our northwestern borders; the conflagration of our frontier hamlets proclaimed the approach of an Indian enemy; the murderous tomahawk was raised on high; the savage arm was upheld by British influence; the scalping-knife received a keener edge from the gilded hope of British gold; and indiscriminate slaughter of every age and sex closed the scene of our suffering frontiers: our finances were exhausted, our credit destroyed, and hope a stranger in the land; despair was marked in every face, and each patriot countenance, as it anxiously gazed on the passer-by, exclaimed, "What shall we do to be saved?" Convulsions shook the very foundation of our Government. Sir, at that time, did not Massachusetts appoint commissioners or agents to wait upon the President of the United States, to inform him that it was time he should surrender his power into other hands? It is not my design, Mr. Chairman, to cast reflections on the character of these misguided people, whose zeal and courage, misdirected by their Governor, were turned against their own Government, instead of the invaders of their country. Sir, I know the primitive character of Massachusetts. I have not forgotten Lexington. All must remember Bunker's Hill. Boston, too, was one of the cradles of our Revolution. I am not unmindful of the deeds of their fathers—immortal deeds, which shed a halo around their national character!

I will now refer you to the speech of Governor Strong, delivered to the Legislature of Massachusetts, on the 28th of May, 1813. In adverting to the state of our country, he says, in a part of his speech, speaking of his re-election to office, "their (the people's) approbation of my conduct the last year, is peculiarly grateful, as it leads me to hope that my services in the year to come will be considered with the same indulgence." Throughout the whole of that address we find but one sentiment expressed, and that sentiment in opposition to the war. The Legislature, in their response to the Governor's speech, indulged in animadversions of the most abusive character, towards the General Government. Was this what ought to have been expected from the people of that State? Was this resistance to the enemy worthy of the remuneration of Congress? No, sir; the common feelings which bind men to their countrymen, to their freedom, and to their independence, seem, in this instance, to have been quenched by the remorseless influence of party heat. The enemy, with their fleet, had entered the Chesapeake before this period—the people of Massachusetts expressed no concern for that event. Frenchtown had been laid in ashes—were the people of Massachusetts awakened to sympathy? Havre de Grace had presented scenes of the most appalling character—were the people of Massachusetts roused? Surely some hints of invasion had been given; moccasin tracks were in the path; the rifle and tomahawk of the Indian gleamed among the trees; the knife was stained with the blood of their own relatives: yet Massachusetts alone was that speck of earth, in the United States, where no indignant feeling glowed—no tear of sympathy was shed—no blush for the wounded honor of our country mantled on their statesmen's cheek.

Now, sir, I ask, can this committee, with all these facts staring them in the face, say, that Massachusetts is entitled to the allowance of this claim? To whom is it to be paid? Not even to the men who served "almost three months." No, sir. Those men have been paid long since. It is the State of Massachusetts that urges this claim, in its corporate capacity. The Governor and the Legislature were responsible to these troops. The individuals cannot suffer. The question now, therefore, is between the State authorities and the United States. If we give them any thing, it must be only for their fathers' sakes, and the immortality of their fathers speaks better things than the blood of Abel. Against whom was all the resistance of Massachusetts displayed? (and they resisted manfully) was it against a foreign enemy? or was it against the Government of the United States? Whose blood was it that they were most ready to shed? For the language held by Massachusetts at that day, in remonstrances of the people to the Legislature, (and by it deemed appealing and pathetic,) was, that they would "resist even unto blood." This language was not applied to the invaders of this country. I beg leave to assure the friends of this bill, that my objections to this claim are founded in principle.

I know that the rising generation in Massachusetts have become supporters of this Government, by the declarations of the Governor and both branches of the Legislature. But are we to pay the claim because they will be dutiful hereafter? Will it be said that the General Government ought to have taken steps to put an end to such a state of things? If steps, at the necessary crisis, had been taken—if officers had been sent to the Governor of Massachusetts—the state of feeling there was so violent, in resistance to the General Government, that your officers would have been crucified. Did not the authorities of that State tell the President of the United States, that he was no officer of the Government? that he was unfit for his station, and that he must surrender up his power? Under these circumstances, would it have been proper for the General Government to have invaded Massachusetts, by the march of an army, if we had had troops to spare on such an enterprise? Were not that people prepared to "resist unto blood?"

On the 9th of October, twelve delegates were appointed by the Legislature to attend the Convention which was to meet at Hartford. The convention met, deliberated, and reported their proceedings at Hartford, which were approved by the Legislature of Massachusetts, on the 25th of January, 1815, by resolution of that body. The Governor was authorized to appoint commissioners to repair to the city of Washington, for the purpose of carrying into effect the objects of this convention.

Their diabolical plans were not executed. Higher destinies awaited this country. Peace was restored; the Union was preserved. During this period, the 8th of January, so memorable in our history, had been inscribed in the calendar of our national days—that day which had so happily illustrated our national character. 'Tis the brightest and proudest day which this country has witnessed within nearly half a century. But, sir, I will not—nay, I cannot—utter the feelings which I cherish in the recollection of that day. It beggared the annals of the world, in the brilliancy of its achievements. It will be remembered by every American as glorious to this country, and incalculable in its results. Can this committee, with all these circumstances placed before them, say that this claim shall be paid?

But, we are told, that the good people ought not to be mulcted for the conduct of their officers. Their officers were of their own creation. They were re-elected by a majority of the State, with a knowledge that their politics were at war with the nation's safety. The individuals have been paid. The State, in its character, resisted the power of the General Government. Now, it is the business of that Government to withhold from Massachusetts a sum to which she has no right, no claim, in law or equity. In future we shall have no more talk about conscriptions. Let the Governor, the Legislature, and some of those eloquent leaders whose influence was so great at that day, compromise this matter with their own people. They will not again, at a period so momentous, impede the General Government in its march against foreign aggression. Let Massachusetts learn to feel and co-operate with her sister States. Let her, hereafter, make common cause in defence of our republican institutions, and no difficulties can arise in the payment of her troops. The war in which she refused to co-operate, was a war for maritime rights, and the interests of commerce. We are told that Massachusetts has six hundred miles of seaboard. She has her ships and her sailors, whilst other States of the Union have neither. The war grew out of the interests of the States bordering on the Atlantic. In the mountains we were safe, secure in our fastnesses: the enemy could not approach us. Did we wait until the enemy invaded our firesides? No! But when the New England States suffered by outrages, committed on her citizens and her commerce, national pride swelled in our bosoms. We had not our brothers and sons impressed by the enemy. The mountains of the West intrenched us. We, too, could have objected, on the ground of constitutional scruples, to a participation in that war. It was not done. The limits of the continent were not too broad for our militia. They would have marched to the Rocky Mountains—nay, even to the shores of the Pacific, if the national safety had required them to do so. When our armies were without supplies, in the land of an enemy, not one murmur escaped them against the General Government. On this floor, our Representatives, true to the national interest, throughout the struggle, declared the will of their constituents. But one feeling was cherished by them, and that was an anxious solicitude for the preservation of our liberty, cost what it would. When peace was restored, we claimed nothing of the General Government but what we were fairly entitled to, by the conditions of service.

If Massachusetts had pursued a similar course, not a voice would have been heard, to-day, in opposition to this claim. She chose a different course, and it is but justice that she should realize its consequences.

On motion of Mr. DWIGHT, the committee rose, and the House adjourned.

MONDAY, March 27.

United States and South America.

The resolution offered by Mr. WICKLIFFE, on Saturday last, relative to the pledge said to have been given by our Minister to Mexico, came up as the unfinished business.

Mr. VERPLANCK observed, that, in this resolution, the character of our Minister seemed to him to be confounded with another, and a much more important subject: to avoid this, he had prepared another resolution, which he wished now to offer as an amendment, to come in after the word "Resolved."

"That the Committee on Foreign Relations be instructed to inquire and report to this House, whether the United States has, in any manner, by any authority recognized by the constitution, made any pledge to the Governments of Mexico and South America, that the United States would not permit the interference of any foreign power with the independence or form of Government of those nations? in what manner? and to what extent?"

Mr. WICKLIFFE expressed his approbation of the amendment, which he accepted as a modification of his resolution. He disclaimed, however, all intention of making any attack upon our Minister to Mexico: he felt not the slightest hostility to that gentleman, for whom, on the contrary, he entertained great respect; his only wish had been to obtain an expression of the sense of this House, as to an important declaration of one who was the acknowledged and responsible organ of this Government.

Mr. MALLARY said, that he was glad the resolution had been offered—his only objection was to the form in which the subject was referred. When information was wished for, touching our foreign relations, it had been usual for this House to direct its call to the Executive, and not to one of its own committees. A highly respectable individual had gone abroad as our diplomatic agent to a neighboring Republic—he had, in his intercourse with that Government, made a declaration which appeared to have excited great interest. This was to have been expected—it was right it should—it was natural that the nation should wish to know how far they are understood by other Governments, as pledged to a particular line of policy. The present was a very proper inquiry, as going to correct false impressions, if any had been received, and presenting an occasion on which the House might, if it thought fit, make a stand as to the policy to be pursued by this Government. It was highly expedient that the facts of this case should be fully known.

The reference of our Minister seemed to him to be to no other pledge than that which may be understood as given in Mr. Monroe's message. Yet, when that message was closely examined, it would be found to contain no express pledge as to what this Government would do in the case supposed.

[Here Mr. M. quoted the part of the message referred to.]

Here, sir, is nothing so very alarming, unless it be considered as preparing the way for a future war—it gives no pledge to that effect—yet its language is such that an inference may, by possibility, be drawn from it, that this Government is committed to the South American States to an extent farther than it is committed to the rest of the world. But the language held by our Minister is not of this vague and indefinite description—it is explicit—it is decisive—and, if the Government have taken the ground he states, I think it deserves the most serious consideration, and that speedily.

I own, sir, that I can conceive a state of things to occur in relation to these Republics which might induce us to change the policy we have thus far pursued—but it is a state of things most unlikely to happen. If all the European Governments should combine and commence a crusade against Republican Governments as such, and should commence their operations by an invasion of the South American States in our immediate vicinity, a serious question might present itself, how far we ought, in self-defence, to take the ground intimated by President Monroe, and maintain it by force of arms. But no such state of things exists, or seems likely to exist; the inquiry, however, is proper, and ought to be made.

Mr. POWELL moved to amend the resolution, as now modified, by striking out all after the word "Resolved," and inserting the following:

"That the President of the United States be requested to inform this House whether the United States have, in any manner, made any pledge to the Governments of Mexico and South America, that the United States would not permit the interference of any foreign power with the independence or form of Government of those nations; and, if so, in what manner? and to what extent?"

Mr. P. said, that, as he understood the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. WICKLIFFE,) the object of that gentleman and his own were, in substance, the same—their propositions differed only in the mode by which that object was to be attained. His resolution, Mr. P. said, proposed to direct the inquiry to be made by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, mine directs the inquiry immediately to the Executive. I think the latter course is the most proper and becoming. That proposed by the gentleman is unusual. The Parliamentary practice, when even a committee of this House wants any information touching our foreign relations, is to ask it through the House, and of the President; and though I should be far from sacrificing principle to considerations of courtesy, yet, when the principle is the same, I prefer that course which is most courteous to a co-ordinate branch of the Government—and I think it is in the present case more courteous for this House to ask the information in question from the President of the United States, than from one of its own committees. It is certainly very important that this House should have the knowledge whether this country does or does not stand pledged in the manner stated. I should like to obtain the opinion of the President himself on this point: I should like to know whether the Executive believes that this Government is under any such pledge. If such is the opinion, and still more, if such is the wish, of the Administration, I am very far from believing it is sanctioned by the people of the United States; and it is highly proper, that, on so serious a matter, the people should be informed directly by the President himself.

Mr. WICKLIFFE observed, that, if the resolution proposed by the gentleman from Virginia, had called for a copy of the instructions given to our Minister, he should have had no objection to its adoption; but it called for information only as to what authority the Minister had to say that the Government is pledged. For himself, he was not much acquainted with diplomacy—and he was not certain whether a call like that proposed would induce the President to send the instructions. What, asked Mr. W., are we to have? Are we only to get an answer, saying that the expression of the Minister appears only to refer to the message of President Monroe? His own object was to bring out an expression by the officers of this Government of their understanding whether such a pledge was or ought to be given. He should have drawn his resolution so as to include a copy of the letter of instructions, but he knew that it was usual for the President to send such documents as are called for by the House, and it might be improper to send the entire letter, as part of it might relate to pending negotiations; a treaty with Mexico is still in fiery, and he did not wish a disclosure of any thing that might be injurious to the public interest. He had accomplished the end for which he had first introduced his resolution. He had presented to the House the objectionable part of what had been submitted in our negotiations, and in this matter had done his duty; the House would now dispose of the matter as they might deem most expedient; if they wish the opinion of the President in preference to the sight of documents filed with him, he was content, and should make no objection to that course.

Mr. POWELL answered, that, in offering his amendment, he had not for a moment contemplated the calling for copies of the Minister's instructions. He could not, by any means, sanction a call of that kind; and if it were proposed by others, he should vote against it. All he wished to ask was, whether the Minister had authority for the language he used; and, if he had, from whence it was derived? The response must be a plain one. If he had authority, the President will answer affirmatively, and will also, if he acts towards this House in good faith, disclose what is that authority, and where it is to be found. If instructions to this effect have been given by the Secretary of State, he will say so; if Mr. Poinsett only referred to the message of President Monroe, he will tell us that; and if the declaration was made without any authority at all, he can tell us that. In the latter case, the Government is bound, on every consideration, to let it be distinctly known that there exists no such pledge. Sir, I feel very confident that this is the case; and I hold, not only that there is no such pledge, but that there ought not to be; and, if there has such a pledge been given, I, for one, am prepared to resist it to the utmost extremity, in which the law and the constitution will support me. I hold such engagements by the Executive to be dangerous and unwarrantable.

Mr. HAMILTON, in rising to submit an amendment, observed, that, if the House made any inquiry, he thought they ought to make one immediately pertinent to the subject under discussion. Although he believed there was abundant evidence, from the documents which had accompanied the President's message, that our Minister was justified, either by the letter or spirit of his instructions, to hold the language which he had done on the occasion of this memorable pledge, yet, if we do inquire, let us go to the pith and marrow of the thing at once, and ask for a copy of Mr. Clay's answer to Mr. Poinsett's letter of the 28th September, where our Minister relates his conference with the Mexican Plenipotentiaries. He hoped that the gentleman from Virginia would accept his amendment as a substitute for his entire resolution, and if that gentleman desired to add any thing to it, he was willing it should be in the shape of an explicit call for more facts, more documents, and not for opinions and arguments.

Mr. H. said he confessed that he was, in the first place, opposed to any call on the subject, because he thought it an act of supererogation, as the very point of inquiry was sufficiently elucidated by the information we already possessed; but he confessed he entertained the most unreserved and decided objections to the shape in which the gentleman from Virginia had thrown his inquiry. It seemed to him merely to furnish the President with a friendly admonition, that some new flaw had been discovered in this splendid project of his Secretary of State, and we should then have another long homily, ad captandum, "to wash the Black-a-Moor white." Now, sir, let us confine our Chief Magistrate to facts, and endeavor to restrain the excursions of that genius which seems happiest in declamation; which supplies, with abundant facility, the argument (in spite of the fetters of the correspondence of his own Ministers) just at the point it is wanted, either for popular effect, or general proselytism. He confessed that he felt some apprehension, he could not say alarm, that, if the gentleman's resolution prevailed, he should have a most ingenious disclaimer from the President, in a highly beautiful and eloquent dissertation, got up for the taste of the lovers of fine writing and sentiment, without one jot of a plain matter-of-fact substance in the whole paper. And he, for one, was at least desirous that he should give us a certain letter, if there was a certain letter; or to assign an adequate reason for its non-existence, or non-production.

Mr. H. then moved to amend the amendment of Mr. POWELL, by striking out all after the word requested, and inserting the following:

"To transmit to this House a copy of the answer of the Secretary of State to Mr. Poinsett's letter to Mr. Clay, dated Mexico, 28th September, 1825."

Mr. POWELL replied, that if the gentleman from South Carolina believed that he would co-operate in the process of whitewashing the acts of the President of the United States, or of any other functionary of the Government, he was greatly mistaken. He did not come here blindly to pursue a course prescribed to him, nor dishonestly to conceal the defects of the officers of Government. The resolution he had offered, was dictated by no such motives—he had, in the discharge of his duty as a Representative, endeavored that it should be distinctly known to the nation, whether any pledge had been given to a foreign Government, which might involve this country in the quarrels of other nations. He considered this due to the Executive, and to the Minister too. Sir, I did say that I believed no such pledge to exist. I do believe so, and I hope, I earnestly hope, I shall be sustained by the facts when they are disclosed. I shall certainly regret it exceedingly, if I am not. I shall regret it, sir, because I always regret to see the officers of my Government act improperly; and I shall be unfeignedly sorry, if it should turn out that the President of the United States has ventured on such a high-handed measure as seems to be imputed to him.

Sir, I cannot accede to the proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina: it completely defeats the end I had in view. What I want to know is, whether Mr. Poinsett made this declaration by authority or not. This, sir, is a fact, not an argument—he was authorized, or he was not; and the fact must be stated. Then it may be followed by any explanations or palliations, which the Executive may judge proper. And, should the fact turn out that such a pledge has been authorized, however I may disapprove of the course, I hope this House will not be indisposed to listen to any explanations the President may offer.

The gentleman from South Carolina wants a copy of the reply of the Secretary of State. Sir, that reply may not answer our inquiry: it may not even advert to the pledge at all. I want to know from whence the Minister derived his authority. If any gentleman would prefer to have the call contain the usual restriction with reference to disclosures, in the President's opinion, injurious to the public welfare, I have no objection to its being added. But the point I aim at, is the authority for the pledge—and I cannot consent to strike out the proposed part of my resolution, or to adopt that of the gentleman from South Carolina, under any other conditions than the securing of this inquiry. The answer of Mr. Olney may, very possibly, contain matters which it would be very indiscreet to publish to the world. Sir, I care not one cent whether Mr. Olney reprobates the conduct of the Minister or not: his censures will not answer my inquiry. He may censure Mr. Poinsett ever so severely, and yet the pledge may, nevertheless, have been given, and it may have been warranted.

United States and South America.

Mr. DRAYTON regretted that so protracted a discussion should have taken place in reference to what he could not but consider as an apparent, and not a real difference. He conceived the difference was occasioned by a mere misapprehension. The object of the gentleman from Virginia meets the idea of his colleague from South Carolina, and the proposition of his colleague is not at variance with that of the gentleman from Virginia; one proposition was more general—the other more specific. He had, therefore, risen to propose to his colleague, to let both propositions stand. The Executive will then be called on first to answer the query of the gentleman from Virginia, and then to transmit the letter of Mr. Olney.

Mr. HAMILTON said he wished to make a single remark, in reply to the gentleman from Virginia. I do not desire, said Mr. H., by useless opposition to mere matters, apparently, of form, to protract the debate, or consume the time of the House. But I feel great reluctance in assenting to his proposition, that I should modify my amendment, and restrict the call, only, to certain parts of Mr. Olney's letter, in answer to Mr. Poinsett's, of the 28th September, 1825. It is true, in diplomacy, as in mathematics, that certain parts, only, are not equal to the whole: and I think, that the manner in which a co-ordinate branch of Congress has been treated, on this very subject, ought to admonish us of the imprudence of allowing, under an over-nice and cautious discretion, too wide a latitude to those who hold the shears, who are able, in the record, to cut in and cut out, just as suits their convenience or necessity. The very different exhibition which the documents, on the same subject, makes before each House, now, shows to what purposes of practical utility these angular cuts, in and out, may be applied. He could not, therefore, consent to this modification, unless advised by the indication of a general wish, on the part of the House, that it should be instituted.

Before he took his seat, Mr. H. said that he must be allowed to say one word to the gentleman from Virginia, who had declared that he did not believe Mr. Poinsett had had any authority from his own Government, to hold the language which he had held to the Mexican Plenipotentiaries, which is disclosed in the despatch to Mr. Clay, No. 23. A contrary belief, with him, he confessed, was strengthened, by a confidence which he had in the discretion and intelligence of Mr. Poinsett, whom, he believed, was incapable of holding such language except by the unreserved sanction of his Government. Did I say believed? said Mr. H. I might, more properly, use a stronger term: for here [holding up the documents] I have the proof: ay, not collateral or contingent, but direct and positive. In a more essential particular—as to the meaning of the Government—what does Mr. Olney say, in his letter to Mr. Poinsett, under date the 9th November, 1825, in which he goes the whole, in extenso, on the subject of the pledge?

"There is a striking inconsistency in the line of policy which the United Mexican States would seem disposed to pursue towards the United States. They would regard these States as an American nation or not, accordingly as it shall suit their own purposes. In respect to commerce, they would look upon us as a European nation, to be excluded from the enjoyment of privileges conceded to other American nations. But when an attack is imagined to be menaced by Europe, upon the independence of the United Mexican States, then an appeal is made to those fraternal sympathies which are justly supposed to belong to our condition as a member of the American Family. No longer than about three months ago, when an invasion by France, of the island of Cuba, was believed at Mexico, the United Mexican Government promptly called upon the Government of the United States, through you, to fulfil the memorable pledge of the President of the United States in his message to Congress, of December, 1823. What they would have done, had the contingency happened, may be inferred from a despatch to the American Minister at Paris, a copy of which is herewith sent, which you are authorized to read to the Plenipotentiaries of the United Mexican States."

The contingency of our interference, then, in the event of the island of Cuba being invaded by France, or, ergo, by any other European power, is one, and the most important, illustration which the Administration puts on Mr. Monroe's pledge of December, 1823. Now, I will ask any man who hears me, whether the invasion of Cuba by a European power, or its peaceful transfer, is not a much more probable event than any attempted colonization of the American continents, or any concerted effort of the combined powers of Europe against the independence of the South American Republics? Our Secretary of State, in authorizing Mr. Poinsett to read this despatch of Mr. Brown's to the Mexican Plenipotentiaries, has indeed authorized him to pledge Mr. Monroe's memorable declaration (not pledge) in the only contingency of probable danger that is ever likely to occur. The Secretary of State has indeed taken the bull by the horns, and it is useless for us to talk about what Mr. Poinsett may have said in a loose diplomatic talk, arguendo, when, by virtue of the previous instructions, he was subsequently authorized to pledge the country as bail for the whole sum of a larger and more probable danger. The House will appreciate the truth of this remark when they weigh the import of Mr. Clay's letter to Mr. Brown, in which he instructs him to say to the French Government, that "we could not consent to the occupation of Cuba by any other European power than Spain, under any contingency whatever." This consent must mean fight, or it is sheer bullying. This, then, is the commentary which the Administration have given to Mr. Monroe's mere expression of an opinion; they have made it applicable to an event altogether probable and full of danger. Whereas, Mr. Poinsett's had reference to an improbable contingency, although no doubt with instructions. For what man, who does not participate in the dreams of the hero of Cervantes, believes that the powers of Europe will undertake a crusade to re-colonize the South American Republics, or assail their independence? But, that Spain may transfer Cuba, and that it may be occupied by a European power, under circumstances which would render it folly, or something worse, for us to interfere, is, to say the least of it, not beyond the pale of a reasonable possibility. Mr. Poinsett has, therefore, given the pledge of his Government, under a contingency where we shall never be called upon to redeem it. Mr. Clay has authorized him to stake it, where the hazard is probable, perilous, and, perhaps, immediate.

I think, therefore, having discovered that the Administration has given the most comprehensive range to the declaration in question, which they have made a pledge, it supercedes the necessity of an inquiry on a subordinate point; though, I repeat, if we are to have an inquiry, let us have facts, not imposing and seductive statements, in which a pretty eloquence of a certain kind, is to stand in the place of every thing else.

Mr. TRIMBLE said that he had no other information on the subject before the House, than that which had been printed, and laid upon the tables of all the members; but, from an examination of these, he felt fully satisfied that no such pledge had been given, as gentlemen seemed to apprehend, nor had any authority been given to make such a pledge. He had risen to correct a mistake of the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. HAMILTON,) in the exposition he had given of Mr. Monroe's message. [Here Mr. T. quoted the letter of Mr. Clay to Mr. Poinsett, and of the former Secretary of State, to the American Minister at Paris.] All that is contained in this despatch amounts to this—that we will not consent that any other power than Spain shall take possession of the provinces immediately in our own vicinity. Now, I ask of gentlemen, if we ought to consent? Certainly not: and this is all the letter, as expounded by reference to former instructions, declares. How far we should be inclined to go, in extremities, we do not say; nor is it prudent that we should. At the time the late President Monroe sent his Message to Congress, in which the declaration is made, which has been so often referred to, a congress of allied sovereigns had been held at Troppau and Laybach, and another was proposed at Verona. The labor of these congresses had been, in part, made public; and a communication is said to have been, in consequence, made, in some way, by the British Government to that of the United States. A clause of the secret treaty of Verona contained the following declaration:

"Art. 1. The high contracting parties, well convinced that the system of Representative Government is as incompatible with the monarchical principle as the maxim of the sovereignty of the people is opposed to the principle of divine right, engage, in the most solemn manner, to employ all their means, and unite all their efforts, to put an end to the system of Representative Government, wherever it is known to exist, in the States of Europe, and to prevent it from being introduced into those States where it is not known."

To this Article, all the allied sovereigns were mutually pledged. The British Government, conceiving these principles to be aimed, in part, at the principles of their free constitution, became alarmed, and signified that they were ready to go hand in hand with this Government, so far as the United States would go, in protecting the Governments of South America.

Mr. T. said he did not know of any official authority for this statement, but this was the account published at the time, and generally credited. It was after this that the late President sent his message to this House. But though I do not know that this communication actually was made by the Government of Great Britain to our Government, I do know that the British acted precisely as they might have been expected to do, if such were the fact; and it was under such circumstances that the message was sent, and by which its meaning is to be illustrated. Sir, what did the people of the United States say, or what will they now say to these words of the allied sovereigns? And what would they say if an attempt should be made to enforce these doctrines, at the point of the bayonet? Sir, I am willing to leave the people of the United States to judge how far this messages pledges us to an alliance in aid of the South American States. It is said that we are pledged, and this pledge is said to refer to President Monroe's Message; and Mr. Clay, in explaining it, refers to the letter to the Minister at Paris, to show what the United States would do, in case of extremities. And what does that letter say? It only says that we will in no case consent to the seizure of the South American States, by any European power except Spain. It goes no further. As to the present call, I am disposed to make it as broad as gentlemen can wish, because I am satisfied no other pledge than what I have explained has ever been given.

Mr. LETCHER said he thought an amendment might be suggested which would meet the wishes of all. His colleague (Mr. WICKLIFFE) wished to ascertain whether the American Government is under pledge to aid Mexico, in case

United States and South America.

she shall be attacked, and to bear the brunt of such an enterprise? I wish the same. I wish it as one of the American people; because all the people have a deep interest in knowing the fact. The proper source from which this knowledge is to be obtained, is the President of the United States. But the gentleman from South Carolina is apprehensive that, if we apply to the President, his reply will be accompanied with sundry arguments and explanations—that there will be a great deal of whitewashing, and little satisfactory information.

Sir, the gentleman need not be alarmed. The President is to be called upon simply to say, whether the language of our Minister is from authority or no? The answer will, it must, state the fact. If this statement shall afterwards be followed by ever so much argument, or whitewashing, it is of little moment—the fact will speak for itself. But the gentleman proposes to call for a letter of the Secretary of State. Sir, I know nothing about the letter alluded to; but it is not improbable that that letter may contain something which is calculated to affect the pending negotiations with Mexico. I presume an amendment can be offered which will meet the wishes both of my colleague and of the gentleman from South Carolina. I offer the following as a substitute for the resolution as amended.

Mr. L. was here about to offer a substitute, when—

The SPEAKER said, the gentleman must be aware that no substitute could be in order, not being admitted by the rule of the House.

Mr. FORSYTH and Mr. WRIGHT now rose to address the House; but the SPEAKER announced that the hour allotted to resolutions had expired; and was proceeding to the Orders of the Day, when—

Mr. WICKLIFFE moved to postpone the Orders of the Day, for the purpose of proceeding with the present discussion.

The motion prevailed—Ayes 82, Noes 71; and the debate was accordingly resumed.

Mr. WRIGHT said, the aspect in which the proposition before the House presented itself to his mind, was somewhat different from any he had heard stated in the course of the discussion. Mr. Poinsett, in his letter of the 28th of September, 1825, detailing a conversation held by him, with the Ministers of the Mexican Government, in relation to the proposition in a pending negotiation, to place this country on a footing of equality with the other American Republics, states, that he observed, "that, against the power of Spain, they [the United Mexican States] had given sufficient proof that they required no assistance, and the United States had pledged themselves not to permit any other power to interfere either with their independence, or form of Government; and that, as in the event of such an attempt being made by the powers of Europe, we should be compelled to take the most active and efficient part, and to bear the brunt of the contest," it was not just that we should be placed on a more unfavorable footing than the other American Republics. This has been treated as though understood to be the offer of a pledge, by Mr. Poinsett, to the Mexican Minister. The language he uses, in my opinion, clearly imports no such thing. It speaks of something past—a pledge that had been made by the United States—not of one offered by him, or that had been offered by him, then, or at any other time: of one before made by the United States to the world, or to the powers of Europe. He evidently alludes to nothing that he had done, in obedience to instructions, or without instructions. The allusion, most palpably, is to the declaration made by the late President, in his message, at the opening of the last Congress, and must have been so understood. In that message, the then President declares to the European powers that it did not comport with our policy to interfere in any manner with their concerns, in their own quarter of the world, but that we could not view, without concern, any attempt to interfere with the Republics in this hemisphere, and that any attempt on their part, so to interfere, would be viewed by us "as dangerous to our peace and safety," as manifesting "an unfriendly disposition towards the United States." This declaration of the President is, unquestionably, what Mr. Poinsett alluded to, and his language evidences his interpretation of the passage. I will not discuss the proposition whether this declaration pledges the United States to any particular course, to repel measures dangerous to our peace. That question need not now be examined, but its solution is not doubtful.

But, sir, this view satisfies me that the proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. HAMILTON,) coupled with his suggestion to the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. POWELL,) does not indicate the true course for us to pursue. If the object be, as I understand it, to acquire information whether Mr. Poinsett's declaration was authorized by the Executive, it is obvious that a call only for the answer of the Secretary to Mr. Poinsett's letter, will not elicit it. The authority for the pledge, as well as the pledge itself, had existence prior to the date of the letter detailing the conversation about it. You might, from that answer, learn whether the Executive animadverted on the remarks of Mr. Poinsett; whether he censured him for an unauthorized act, or recognized his power, and commended its execution; or you might discover an omission to notice the subject at all. Grant, for one moment, that this is found to be the case; you might infer, from the omission, the existence of the authority, but we should have no distinct evidence of any authority being given. This proposition, then, will fail on its object, and cannot obtain for us any useful information.

I prefer the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia to that of the gentleman from Kentucky, as modified on the suggestion of the gentleman from New York. If you want information, you must seek it where it is to be had, in the Executive department of your Government. The committee have no more information than we have. In directing your inquiry to the committee, you can get nothing. Direct it to the President, and you may get useful information. I want all the facts connected with the subject, and am in favor of asking for the information where I know it can be had. When we get it, then it will be time enough to direct our committee. But I am satisfied that it will be found that the only authority the Minister at Mexico had, was the message of the late President of the United States.

Mr. WEBSTER said he was very unwilling to anticipate a discussion which seemed properly to belong to a future occasion. He wished to abstain, at present, from every thing not immediately pertinent to the pending question. Sufficient for the day was the evil thereof. An occasion was approaching when it would, probably, be more proper to debate many of the important topics which had now been adverted to.

He could have no objection to any proper inquiry, on this, or any occasion. He regretted the present motion only, as it might, perhaps, imply a censure on an officer of the Government abroad, when no censure might be deserved. He did not feel at all certain that great blame attached anywhere. Mr. Poinsett's expression might be somewhat too strong. Probably it was so: but still he thought it was quite evident that he referred to the message of December, 1823, and, therefore, his meaning was apparent enough. He (Mr. W.) felt a good deal unwilling to impute blame, in a case where nothing was apparently wrong, but the mode of expression; and where it did not appear that anybody had been misled. Still, there are several gentlemen who have expressed a confident opinion that Mr. Poinsett had some authority, more than we know, for his declarations. He must, they say, have instructions, the letter or spirit of which bears him out in giving a pledge to the Mexican Government. For his part, he (Mr. W.) should be very much disappointed if it did not turn out that Mr. Poinsett spoke on no other authority than Mr. Monroe's public message. He was confident it was so. The whole document convinced him of that. But as gentlemen thought otherwise—as they insisted that Mr. Poinsett must have had some direct and complete authority for what he had said, he was in favor of the inquiry, for the satisfaction of such gentlemen.

As to the declaration of the President, in 1823, the circumstances which led, probably, to that declaration, had been stated, in general, by an honorable member from Kentucky. The proceedings of the allied powers, at Troppau, Laybach, and Verona, were well remembered; and, in the course of the very year then expiring, the King of Spain had been established on his throne by the army of France. This army had marched into Spain, with the consent of the other powers of Europe, except England.

It had accomplished its objects. Ferdinand had been reinstated, by foreign force, in all his prerogatives. Under these circumstances, the question was, how is it likely the allied powers will act towards the former Spanish colonies in America. Having succeeded in establishing such a government as suited them in Spain, herself, would they not, or might they not, be willing to go farther, and to assist the Spanish monarch in reconquering his rebellious provinces? It was possible they might do this—perhaps it was not very improbable. At this juncture, the President's declaration was made. It was wrapped up, he would not say in mysticism, but certainly in phrases sufficiently cautious. The amount of it was, that this Government could not look with indifference on any combination among other powers, to assist Spain in her war against the South American States; that we could not but consider any such combination as dangerous or unfriendly to us: and that if it should be formed, it would be for the competent authorities of this Government to decide, when the case arose, what course our duty and our interest should require us to pursue.

This was the substance of the declaration. He believed he might be, perhaps, the only member who, at that time, suggested, that this declaration, with all restrictions, was necessary to preserve our neutrality. It must, of course, happen, in every Government, that the Executive should undertake to speak, towards foreign nations, of the wishes and objects of the Government. It cannot be otherwise. But this it does on its responsibility. General Washington proclaimed neutrality at the breaking out of the great European wars. But it was competent to the two Houses to present him a law, the next day, declaring war. The intercourse of nations could hardly go on, and one great end of an Executive would be defeated, if it could not venture, on proper occasions, to express the views and wishes of the Government. It is responsible for this as for its other acts.

Now he (Mr. W.) had no question but that Mr. Poinsett was referring, merely, to this declaration. He did not speak of any pledge as given by him, or through him. He gave no present pledge or assurance of any kind. He was, evidently, speaking of something precedent—something notorious; and that something was the declaration of 1823. Now, making allowance for incorrectness of expression, he saw nothing wrong. If he called any thing by a wrong name—if he called that a pledge which was no pledge—still it does not appear that he deceived them, or meant to deceive them with whom he dealt.

He was willing, also, to call for the answer to this letter, for, although he did not see how the letter could rest, for its authority, on a subsequent one, he had no objection to see the whole.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he would vote in favor of the amendment which had been proposed

United States and South America.

by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. VERPLANCK,) and against all the subsequent amendments which had been moved. He would proceed to give his reasons.

I presume, said Mr. B., the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. WEBSTER,) among others, alluded to me, when he stated that some gentleman had expressed an opinion that our Minister to Mexico had authority to make the declaration which he made to the Government of that country. I had other grounds for this belief besides mere opinion. It rests upon the uniform policy of the Executive branch of this Government, for several months past, as disclosed by the documents upon our table.

The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. WEBSTER) is not certain there is any blame anywhere. This opinion, in my judgment, cannot be supported. Had not Mexico refused to us the same treaty stipulation which she had granted to the Southern Republics? Had not the negotiation arrived at a crisis? Was it not about to be dissolved? In this critical moment, our Minister, for the first time, declared they should grant us the same advantages, because we stood in the same relative situation towards them with the other Republics of this hemisphere. We stood pledged to support both their independence and their form of Government, against any power except Spain, which should attempt to interfere with either. If Mr. Poinsett has obtained a treaty upon false and unfounded declarations of this nature, he is much, very much, to blame. But this is not all. He has proceeded much further. In the latter part of the same letter, he states as follows: "I then recapitulated the course of policy pursued towards the Spanish colonies, by our Government, which had so largely contributed to secure their independence, and enable them to take their station among the nations of the earth: and declared what further we were ready to do in order to defend their rights and liberties; but that this could only be expected from us, and could only be accomplished by a strict union of all the American Republics, on terms of perfect equality and reciprocity."

Sir, said Mr. B., I wish to see the answer of the Secretary of State to Mr. Poinsett's letter. In that letter he has certainly given a full and candid exposition of the state of the negotiation. It brought home distinctly to the knowledge of our Government, what kind of a treaty their Minister had demanded, and the stipulations he had made for the purpose of obtaining it. If the answer to this letter should approve his conduct, in general terms; nay, if it should be silent upon the subject, the inference is irresistible, that our Executive wished the Mexican Government to grant us a treaty, under the impressions which had been made by his declarations. If they had not resolved to pursue this course of policy, it was their duty, promptly and decidedly, to disavow the declaration of their Minister. A tacit consent is equally strong, and equally binding with an express assent. If our Government should obtain and accept a treaty upon the terms stated to the Mexican Government by Mr. Poinsett, it would be a violation of every principle of good faith among nations, afterwards to attempt to extricate ourselves from the pledge, by declaring that he had no instructions to make such a stipulation.

Independent of any express instructions, there is sufficient evidence in the documents before us, to create a belief, that our Minister was not mistaken in the general policy and views of the Executive. When our Government was invited to send Ministers to Panama, the terms of the invitation were explicit; they could not be mistaken. We were informed that the two principal subjects which would engage the attention of the Congress, so far as the United States were concerned, would be our "resistance or opposition to the interference of any neutral nation, in the question and war of independence, between the new powers of the continent and Spain," and our "opposition to colonization in America by the European Powers." Mr. Obregon tells us, "after these two principal subjects, the Representatives of the United States may be occupied upon others." Having presented this plain exposition of the views of his Government, he invited us to send Representatives to the Congress of Panama, "with express instructions in their credentials, upon the two principal questions." The letter of Mr. Salazar contains, substantially, the same declarations.

Does the answer of the Secretary of State contain a whisper of dissent from the terms of this invitation? Do we accept the invitation conditionally? Do we declare we could enter into no treaty of alliance, for the purpose of carrying into effect the objects which the Southern Republics had in view? No, sir. On the contrary, the invitation was accepted in the most general terms. There is one part of the letter of Mr. Salazar relating to this subject, which deserves particular attention: he states, that "this is a matter of immediate utility to the American States that are at war with Spain, and is in accordance with the repeated declarations and protests of the Cabinet at Washington." Was Mr. Salazar mistaken, and, if he were, why did not the Cabinet correct the mistake? Mr. B. observed, that he thought he had sufficiently shown it was not a mere opinion, without facts to support it, which had induced him to believe Mr. Poinsett was authorized to make the declarations which he had made to the Mexican Government.

I confess, said Mr. B., it appears to me, that the great danger of the mission to Panama is, that our Government will there pursue this course of policy. If I shall be convinced this will not be the case, I will give my consent to the mission. As to Cuba and Porto Rico, I echo the sentiments of the President with all my heart. I would not agree that any nation on earth should wrest those islands from the dominion of Spain. With the exception of England, there is no Government in existence that I would not rather see in possession of them than the Government of Mexico.

The United States have had sufficient experience of the inconvenience and the danger of entangling alliances. We once entered into such a treaty with France, and we were compelled to buy ourselves off at a great sacrifice. It is not my wish, said Mr. B., to be understood that this Government ought not, under any circumstances, to defend the independence of the Southern Republics. The principle for which I contend, is, that we should not be bound to do so by treaty, but be left free to act, with a proper regard to our own situation, when the crisis shall arrive.

This resolution should be referred to the Committee of Foreign Relations. That committee is, in its nature, confidential. Let them inquire, in the first place, and, if they want more information than they already possess, they can introduce a resolution for the purpose of obtaining it, by the authority of this House. I do not want merely the instructions which were given to Mr. Poinsett. I do not believe he received any express authority to form a treaty of alliance. It required no ghost to tell us that. I wish the committee carefully to examine all the documents which have been published, or which may be in their power, and report to this House, whether Mexico may not have been deceived, whether she had not sufficient authority to believe we were pledged to support her independence, and whether, under this false impression, she might not grant us a treaty, according to our wishes. It is better to send the subject, at once, to that committee. It will go to them without restriction. It cannot be sent to the President in that manner. We can only ask from him for such information as may be communicated without prejudice to the public interest. It is for these reasons that I give a decided preference to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. F. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, said, he intended to say but little on the subject, as so much had already been said: that it seemed to him that gentlemen were too late with objections to the declarations which had been made by Mr. Monroe. There was a time when they would have been appropriate—in 1823, about the time that Congress met, the armies of France had overthrown the Constitutional Government of Spain, and re-established Ferdinand in all his regal powers. That France, and the allied sovereigns, flushed with this success against Constitutional Government, it was believed that those powers contemplated making war on the Republics of South America and Mexico, and to re-colonize them—that, if they did make such war, it would be a war against republican principles—a war to exterminate constitutional governments: at this time it was, that Mr. Monroe, then President, declared to this House, in his message, that it was due to the candor of this Government, to declare to the allied powers of Europe, and to France, and to the world, that this Government will not view with indifference, any attempt, on their part, to make war against those republics, for the purpose of re-colonizing them; that such a war would be considered a war against principle—a war against free Governments—that it would tend to endanger our own institutions, and disturb our peace and repose; and that, therefore, we could not be idle spectators of the conflict. This declaration was made at a moment of supposed imminent danger; and then was the time for objections; then was the time for him, who disapproved the sentiment, to speak out: or, will gentlemen say it meant nothing? Did not every one in this House know, and understand, what it meant? Yes, sir, gentlemen knew what it meant: it meant, if the allied powers of Europe and France, should make war on the South American republics, to put down and exterminate those Governments—that, having so made war against free Governments, if successful there, that the next effort would be against this country; to extinguish here the last trace of republican institutions, and establish legitimate dynasty; it was a declaration that he would not wait until they had approached our firesides—that we would meet the danger at the threshold; it was a declaration founded upon a sense of our duties, for the preservation of our liberties—the declaration, or pledge, as some call it, was not made to the Southern Republics; it was not made to France, or to England, or to the allied powers; it was no pledge to any one; it was a declaration founded upon considerations of the defence of our own institutions; it was made with a view to our own safety, and not with a view to alliances with any other Government or country; and I, for one, am not prepared to take it back. It has had its effect; the allied powers abandoned their intention of making war on Mexico and Colombia; it has given peace and security to the liberties of the Southern Republics, and has added glory to our own country. And shall we now take it back? Take it back, now the danger is over, after all the ends intended are consummated, and peace and tranquillity rests over the land! I said before, if gentlemen were not willing to stand by the declaration thus made by Mr. Monroe, they ought to have objected to it at the time. What! said Mr. J., are gentlemen willing to take that declaration back now, after it has had its effect—after it has given peace to those republics, fame and security to our own Government, and tell Europe—tell the allied powers, that it meant nothing—that it was a mere jest—the declaration of a President, without a meaning, and they ought not to have regarded it? Who is here ready to say so?—to say he will not defend the rights and liberties of his country to the last? No, sir, there is no

United States and South America.

[H. OF R.]

gentleman, upon a recurrence of the same dangers to this country, but what would speak and act the same language. Even now, sir, would gentlemen view with indifference and unconcern, an attempt, by the allied powers, to colonize Mexico and Texas, to prostrate the efforts of that country for liberty and independence, and fix upon it a legitimate dynasty? Such a country, in extent, population, and fertility, coterminous to our frontiers, placed in possession of the allies, would afford to them, in their crusade against the liberties of man, a position and resources where they might concentrate a force to any amount, which they might, with great facility, wield against us, and enable them to wage a war of the most disastrous kind, which, without Mexico and Texas, they will never be able to do. Sir, the importance of such a step, on the part of the allied powers, and the serious and alarming consequences which might rise out of it to us, are too obvious to need elucidation; and, is there any one here who is prepared to say he will be indifferent to such an event? If there is, I am not the one.

I repeat, sir, that this was no pledge to any Government or to any nation. There was nothing mystical in the declaration, as some have pretended. It was an open declaration of the views of President Monroe of what was the true interest and policy, in the event then contemplated, for this country to pursue, to preserve its liberty, and to perpetuate its union. It was founded upon a consideration of our own rights and our own duties, in preserving our own institutions; and it was responded to by the people of this country—it met the approbation of all. Yes, sir, Mr. Monroe received more eclat for this act, than any other of his whole administration. And who can tell what would have happened, if this ground had not been assumed; would all have now been peace and prosperity?

But the gentleman from Pennsylvania says this has been the policy pursued by the Administration for the last three months (or few months), and that he would not sanction it. Why did the gentleman say such had been the policy pursued by the Administration for a few months past? Why did he not say for nearly three years past? Is it because, in the mean time, another President has been elected? Is it because another Administration, in part, has succeeded to the former, that the gentleman will not sanction what he expressly or tacitly approved under that former Administration? Is that the reason?

That gentleman, and also others, have said, that Mr. Poinsett has given a pledge to Mexico, in case of war on that country, that this nation will "bear the brunt of the contest." Mr. Poinsett has given no such pledge—he had no authority to make such a one. Mr. Poinsett, it is admitted, may not have been as cautious and clear in his expressions, as, perhaps, he ought to have been. He says, he told the Mexican Minister, "that, as in the event of such an attempt—(an attempt to re-colonize Mexico, and overturn her Government, by a war against republican principles, is to what Mr. P., in my opinion, alludes)—in such an attempt," says Mr. Poinsett, "we would be compelled to take the most active part, and to bear the brunt of the contest." Were we pledged to Mexico to do so? No, sir. Are we compelled, by any treaty, with any power, to do so? No, sir. Mr. Poinsett, clearly, has allusion to the declaration of Mr. Monroe, that our own self-preservation would impel us to this course, in such an event. That, perhaps, is what he meant. If he intended to go further than the true policy of this country, in such an event, would call for, he was wrong. But who can tell what such an event might induce us to do? He was wrong, perhaps, to use the expression, without defining its extent and meaning; unless, indeed, Mexico understood it to stop at the point I have mentioned. The gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. HAMILTON) has read a part of the letter of the Secretary of State to Mr. Poinsett, in which allusion is also made to the declaration in the President's Message of the 2d December, 1823; and I, with that gentleman, think that it is sufficient to show, without further evidence, that the allusions of Mr. Poinsett were to the policy laid down in that Message; and, I presume, that, if the present Administration have said or done any thing in relation to that subject, it will be found to be in strict conformity with the principles and policy of that declaration. Gentlemen, he believed, were mistaken, in supposing that Mr. Poinsett had given any such pledge. The fact of the Mexican Minister having refused to sign the treaty, because Mr. Poinsett would not make the pledge, ought to be conclusive, that he neither has made, nor intended to make, such a pledge—he had no power to make it.

Gentlemen talk about the President's making promises, &c., which may involve us in difficulties, as if he had either the power or the inclination to do so. Sir, what can the President do? Suppose the allied sovereigns should make war on republican principles, and commence their operations in Mexico, or in any other war that shall be or may be contemplated, tending to endanger our country, what does his duty require of him to do? It is his bounden duty to watch the movements of any and all countries that shall exhibit or indicate such an intention, and communicate to this House the facts; and it is our place and our duty to adopt such measures as shall effectually and efficiently defend our country. This is all he can do in such an event, and it is all that he will do—he will not transcend his rights, by taking upon himself more than belongs to him. It remains for us to approve or disapprove the measures he may recommend, or to adopt such others, in their stead, as our judgments shall approve.

I, for one, am not prepared to take back the declaration thus made by Mr. Monroe—a declaration, founded, I repeat, with a view to our own safety and the defence of our own country; with a view to the perpetuation of our own independence and our own happiness, against the combined aggressions of the allied sovereigns of Europe; and not made with a view of forming entangling alliances, on our part, with any nation. A happy and glorious result has been produced; the allied powers relinquished all further designs against America—North and South: the danger is gone by—I, for one, will not take it back, and tell the allied sovereigns and the world it meant nothing.

Mr. McDUFFIE said he should be sorry if the intention of the House should be defeated by a mere question about form. For himself, he considered it as of little consequence, whether the inquiry was made by the Committee of Foreign Relations or by the House. It was of much more importance that the inquiry, in whatever mode it might be presented, should cover the whole ground. He had no objections that it should be made specific, if that form was preferred by any gentleman, but, in that case, it should be accompanied by a general modification as to disclosures injurious to the public good. He, therefore, suggested to his colleague the expediency of modifying his amendment, by adding "such parts of the answer of the Secretary of State to Mr. Poinsett's letter to Mr. Clay, dated Mexico, 28th September, 1825, and numbered 22, as relate to a supposed pledge of the United States," and adding to it the words moved by the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. LETCHER,) so that the whole should read:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to transmit to this House a copy of such parts of the answer of the Secretary of State to Mr. Poinsett's letter to Mr. Clay, dated Mexico, 28th September, 1825, and numbered 22, as relate to a supposed pledge of the United States; and, also, to inform the House whether the United States have, in any manner, made any pledge to the Governments of Mexico and South America, that the United States would not permit the interference of any foreign power with the independence or form of Government of those nations; and, if so, when? in what manner? and to what extent?"

Mr. HAMILTON expressed his willingness to accept of this as a modification of his amendment.

Mr. McD. proceeded: One word, sir, to the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. F. JOHNSON.) That gentleman assumes that the Message of President Monroe does, in effect, operate as a pledge that the United States will, by force, if necessary, resist any attempt at interference with the independence of the South American States.

[Here Mr. JOHNSON expressed dissent.]

Sir, I will not now go into an examination of the Message of President Monroe, but I solemnly enter my protest against any such construction of that Message, as that the United States are bound to send to the South American States, and enter into treaties to aid them. If such is the construction put upon that Message by the present Administration of the Government, I disclaim and protest against it.

Mr. Woods, of Ohio, thought it would be more proper to call on the President of the United States for this information, than to obtain it through the Committee on Foreign Relations. The Executive is the proper branch of this Government to give information touching the foreign relations of the country.

Mr. F. JOHNSON observed, in reply to Mr. McDUFFIE, that he thought he had said that the Message of President Monroe did not pledge this Government to anybody; but that the declaration had been made under a sense of our own rights, and with the intent that others should remember them. I said that this declaration had had the most salutary effects. Sir, it had—the declaration has answered its object—it has had the effect that was intended. I consider it a credit to the country, and I am not prepared to take back any part of it.

Mr. POWELL said, if he understood the amendment, as now modified, it was, in substance, the same as that which he had himself offered, and he could assure the House that he had no such partiality for his own resolution as to perplex the House by insisting on their determining which they should adopt; believing the amendment to be, in fact, equal to his own, he should very heartily acquiesce, should it be sanctioned by the House. His object was not to criminate anybody. He had, however, an ulterior object in presenting his resolution to the House—an object directly the reverse of that desired by the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. JOHNSON.) He wishes the pledge of Mr. Monroe to be recognized and adhered to; I wish that, if any pledge is supposed to have been given by Mr. Monroe, this House shall prostrate such a pledge, and proclaim to the world that they do not hold it lawfully made, or binding on the country. If, in answer to our inquiry, the Executive shall say that the country is pledged, I shall then move that this House disavow such an understanding.

Yet, I do not say that the United States shall never resist, by force, an interference, however violent or dangerous, with the South American States; but I do not choose to pledge this Government to any alliance beforehand. When such a case shall arise as will justify it, let us interpose by the strong hand of power; but, in the meanwhile, let us remain free from all pledges of alliances.

Mr. VERPLANCK suggested, that the amendment of Mr. McDUFFIE should be modified, by substituting for the words "supposed pledge," the words "the pledge therein mentioned."

Mr. McDUFFIE accepted this modification, and, thus modified—

Mr. POWELL accepted the amendment of Mr. McDUFFIE, and adopted it as his own.

MARCH, 1826.]

United States and South America.

[H. OF R.]

[The question, therefore, from this point in the debate, was between Mr. POWELL's resolution and that of Mr. WICKLIFF.]

Mr. VERPLANCK, after thanking the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. BUCHANAN,) for his support of the amendment, as at first offered, by himself, and stating that Mr. B. had anticipated him in some of his views, which he therefore would not repeat, said, that the question now was, whether the inquiry shall go to a Committee of the House, or to the President of the United States. He thought the gentleman from Pennsylvania had very clearly shown that the first of these courses was, on many accounts, to be preferred. He should not repeat the arguments by which that gentleman had so ably supported his position. There was one other ground on which it might be maintained, and which he believed the gentleman had not adverted to. The gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. JOHNSON) has said that the danger is over; and he says truly—the foreign danger is over. But still there is another danger at home: the danger of precedents in interpreting the constitution.

The late President of the United States had made a public declaration in his Message to the House, which was right and just in itself, and was hailed by the whole American people with great enthusiasm; and it was supported, as far as necessary, by the authorities of the country. But, its terms were very vague and indefinite—perhaps purposely so, that it might not commit the country. But, though thus indefinite in itself, it went to the other side of the Atlantic, where it assumed a very different form. It was used by our Ministers abroad, and considered of so definite a character as to be bargained on in obtaining commercial privileges.

Now, sir, I open the constitution, and I ask, where is the power, on the part of the Executive Department of this Government, to give any such pledge? I find that Congress has the power to declare war, and the President to make treaties; but I find no power given to the President to commit the nation to any pre-determined line of policy.

But gentlemen say the honor of the country is committed—a bargain has been made on this pledge. Well, sir, suppose some unexpected state of things should arise in the internal concerns of these South American Republics; suppose, for example, that one of the provinces should resist the authority of the new Government, on a question, perhaps, concerning the introduction of religious liberty, (and that is a topic on which our Government seems peculiarly anxious,) and in this juncture of affairs, the Government of that Republic should call on this Government to redeem its pledge: could we turn round and tell them that no pledge had ever been given? Could we deny to them, after the pledge had been made the basis of a commercial bargain, that the President of the United States had no authority to give such a pledge? Sir, this appears to me to be one more step towards increasing the power of the President, and making this House and the Senate in effect nothing—a mere registering assembly to give a formal sanction to the decrees of the Executive.

Sir, I would say to these Governments at once, that no formal pledge had been given, or could be given, by the President; that, in the declaration referred to, the Government had done wisely, perhaps, but nothing more; beyond a declaration the Executive had no right to go. Sir, do not let us deceive foreign Governments, nor let them be deceived.

Sir, I am not one of those who have any great terror on the subject of usurpation—but step by step, we may go on until we alter the constitution. It is in this way that Governments become changed by the lapse of time, and assume at length an entirely new character. New power is gradually given as to foreign politics, and at last we become entangled in foreign alliances.

This, too, might be a very proper occasion for this House to express its views as to the posture of this country in relation to the nations of both continents. And while, on the one hand, we give notice that we shall repel all aggression on the liberties of this continent, we may, with great deliberation, take ground as to the extent to which we will not go. We may make this point a rallying point for the constitution. But where can we take this stand but on a report of a committee of this House? Gentlemen wish us to call on the President to give us full information on the subject of this supposed pledge—well, sir, supposing he does so—will this enable us to get any expression by the people of their sense of their own rights? No, sir. I hope, therefore, that the resolution will pass in its original form.

Mr. REED said he was in favor of the amendment. We wish to ask for information, and, sir, where is it? Sir, the President alone has got it; and why should we ask him through a committee? Is it in order that that committee may express its view of the conduct of this Government, with respect to pledges? Is that the object aimed at? Sir, this may be proper, or not—but let us get the information—let us get it in a direct form—not by any circuitous mode—not accompanied by glosses and commentaries which may render its meaning doubtful. It is very possible I may go with the gentleman from New York in his views of what we ought to declare on the subject of the South American States; but to assume, gratuitously, before any answer is given, that it will be of such and such a kind, and that then we must do so and so, is in my judgment wholly improper.

Mr. COOK thought that, whether this Government, as a Government, had acted right or not, in making a certain declaration at a former period, was what need not now be inquired into: seeing that the latest official act of the Government has declared expressly that our Commissioners have no power, by their instructions, to compromise the neutrality of this country, why should we seek any thing to the contrary of a previous date. And besides, does not the Secretary of State, in his answer to Salazar, disavow that this Government is to make any foreign alliances? Sir, I am opposed to send to a committee of this House for an elaborate report on the relations of this Government in all time to come. I am not prepared for a long string of resolutions which can excite debate and do no good. Resolutions of this kind, though entitled to respect, are but things of a moment, and have little effect on our successors. I want merely the information now asked for. I would, however, suggest a modification of the resolution by inserting the words "or otherwise," after those which speak of a pledge being given according to the constitution. According to the constitution, we know that the Executive could give no such pledge—he has not the power. But if we ask whether a pledge has been given, whether constitutionally "or otherwise," the fact, if it has happened, must come out. If any such pledge has been given by Mr. Monroe, it is certainly a departure from his own policy; and if by the present Executive, it is against the very last act of his in relation to these South American Republics.

Mr. FORSYTH thought that any such clause was unnecessary. There is but one mode by which the Government of the United States can be pledged to any act or course of policy, and that is according to the constitution. It is for this reason that I object to having this inquiry directed to the President. Sir, will you ask the President whether the Government of the United States is pledged? And what will be his answer? Can he send us a treaty? No, sir, he has none to send. That he has none, is proved by the fact that we are invited, according to his opinion of the invitation, to go to a designated place to make one. Why, then, will you go to the President? The Minister has held official language—that is plain; and what, sir, is his language worth? It is worth as much as the official language of an American Minister in any part of the world. Do you ask what was his authority for using this language? He used it by virtue of his plenipotentiary powers, and under the instructions of his Chief. Has not the President sent to this House documents which produce everywhere the deepest impression? And are they not fully, and in every particular, a justification of such language as our Minister has held? It is the language of the Secretary of State: he, too, speaks to the American nations of the memorable pledge of the President of the United States. What will you go to the President for? Do you wish to know if the language is justified by the spirit of his instructions? Sir, it must be. Some gentlemen, perhaps, may find arguments to satisfy themselves that the language is not justified to its whole extent; but nothing short of the recall of the Minister can satisfy this nation that the language is not approved. Sir, the language of a Minister is something—it goes for something. He says we are pledged; we are called on to redeem the pledge; and he has given to the Mexican Government such assurances that they infer we will fulfil this pledge. A question then presents itself—by what power has the President acted? Where is the sanction of such an act in the constitution? Has the Executive trampled on the powers of this House and of the Senate? Sir, it is a grave inquiry, and one which it is proper, on every account, should be submitted to a committee.

Sir, I am agreeably surprised to see the interest which this matter has excited; yet I cannot but be surprised. The President of the United States is the official organ to express the will and guard the interests of the people in their intercourse with foreign powers.

Is it strange he should presume to call a message to this House, not disapproved, a pledge? How often have we been told that the mere report of a branch of an Executive Department was adopted, and bound this House and the Executive, because an appropriation had been made to execute a part of it? Has not an act been passed, which recognizes as contemplated a great system of internal improvement, upon which there has been neither vote nor examination by Congress? There is a still deeper example: a law has been construed and executed, not according to the law itself, but according to the construction contained in the Message of a former President of the United States—the Slave act; and this, because the construction was not disapproved by Congress. Important consequences followed this construction: large sums of money were spent—a war ensued—and one hundred human victims perished on a barren and distant shore. Is it surprising that the President should now make a similar presumption, in a case similar, although not so strong? In 1823, a President of the United States made a very important and striking declaration on the subject of our future policy in relation to the South American States. No disapprobation was expressed by Congress; and therefore, it is considered as approved, and as a fair expression of the will of Congress. Sir, I object to all such inferences; but these are more defensible in our foreign intercourse than at home. Permit me to bring the facts on this subject before the House. I was at that time present in the House; and I confess that, when the Message was read, I was startled at its boldness. It was so different from the ordinary tone of that gentleman's communications, that we were at a loss to account for it. But, sir, the mystery was soon explained. We soon saw, that, however bold this declaration might appear to be, there had been no imprudence in making it, because there was, in fact, no danger. This declaration followed a determination of another Government. That Government had declared to the other cabinets of Europe, by an official conversation with France, that it would not see, with indifference, any interference with Spanish America, and our declaration came in tagging behind that official conversation. The declaration itself, was, I believe, generally approved in this country. Sir, I approve of it myself, if it is rightly understood, but I strongly disapprove of it, if it commits to any alliance with the South American Governments. I will now, however, resume the history of what passed in the House. A gentleman from Kentucky, thinking that this declaration of the President was only a declaration of the President, introduced a resolution corresponding in tone with the language in the Message. It is in these words:

United States and South America.

Resolved, &c. That the people of these States would not see, without serious inquietude, any forcible interposition by the Allied Powers of Europe, in the behalf of Spain, to reduce to their former subjection those parts of the continent of America which have proclaimed and established for themselves, respectively, independent Governments, and which have been solemnly recognized by the United States."

The resolution took the ordinary course: it was referred to a Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union, and there it slept until the last day of the session. The gentleman thus distinctly stated that, as there was not the remotest danger that the contingency contemplated in the resolution would actually take place, he had not called it up. Sir, the meaning of this declaration was in no wise contingent or doubtful; it was perfectly understood without the protest which the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts says he then made, (and which I had not the good fortune to hear,) and that of a gentleman from Virginia, not now in his seat; it was perfectly understood by the House as nothing more than a mere declaration. The Government, it seems, has since occasioned it to become something more, and the object of the present resolution, as I understand it, is to reduce this formidable pledge back to its original importance as a mere declaration of the President of the United States to the Congress of the United States.

If gentlemen suppose that any thing we shall get from the President will put it in a different light, the resolution ought to be directed to the President. I do not, and I trust, therefore, that the amendment will be rejected, and that the original motion will prevail.

Mr. MALLARY said, that it seemed to him the resolution was not understood. The real point of inquiry was, by what authority Mr. Poinsett had made the declaration in question to the Mexican Minister. Now, the matter seemed to be understood in a different way. An entirely distinct question had been substituted for the original inquiry, and the resolution had been so worded, that he doubted if it would be of any use. We are now, it seems, to inquire if the United States have given any pledge recognized by the constitution, to those Governments. But we deny that the Executive can pledge the United States. We suppose, from the papers, that our Minister pretended to give a pledge, which neither he nor the President had a right to give. We deny that any pledge can constitutionally exist, at all; and, if it has been given, what we want to know is, by what authority.

Mr. WRIGHT said he rose to say a word in reply to the gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. FORSYTH.) From the gentleman's speech on this subject, on Saturday, a report of which I hold in my hand, it appears, he was then of opinion, the inquiry should be directed to the President. He thought then the committee had no information to give. I thought he was correct then, and I agreed with him. Now he thinks we ought to direct the inquiry to the committee! What has effected this change in his mind? Has any thing transpired in the interim to effect it? It is sudden. I do not know, and cannot imagine, what has effected it, and I cannot change too. I must agree with the opinion expressed on Saturday, with which I concurred, unless I too can see some cause for change, or be advised that the committee has now more information than it then had.

Mr. FORSYTH, who just returned into the hall, said, that the accidental absence from the House for a moment, had prevented him from hearing what had been said by a gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. WRIGHT.) A mutual friend had just informed him that the gentleman had spoken of a difference between the opinion of Mr. F. on this discussion and in the discussion of Saturday. No such difference existed. His opinion of Saturday had undergone no change. The gentleman had probably been misled by judging of his (Mr. F.'s) opinions by what was published for him, and not from what he had spoken for himself. He requested that gentlemen would hereafter confine their remarks to what he had said, and not to what was reported for him. Language and sentiments were frequently imputed to him, never uttered or conceived by him. In one of the public journals of this city, (the National Journal) the errors were so frequent and so remarkable, as to induce him almost to fear that he was purposely misrepresented. He had not complained, as he was not answerable for the errors of the reporter. In the paper which he held in his hand, (the National Intelligencer,) his remarks, when he first addressed the House, were reported with substantial accuracy. His explanatory remarks were altogether mistaken. He had said that the Committee on Foreign Relations had no information to give to the House. But that he presumed that the desire of the gentleman from Kentucky was, that an inquiry should be made into the propriety of the language used by our Minister, and of the instructions on which it was founded; and that if that was his wish, he ought to make the language of his resolution more specific. It would then present a very important question. The resolution had since been modified, and it does now present a very important question. That, sir, is my opinion to-day—it was my opinion on Saturday last. I am persuaded that neither the Committee of Foreign Relations nor the President of the United States have any information to give the House, of which it is not already possessed.

Mr. LIVINGSTON said, that he was so very unfortunate as not to be able to vote for either of the two resolutions before the House. One of those resolutions requires the Committee on Foreign Affairs to inquire whether, in any manner, according to the constitution, a pledge has been given by this Government, that it will aid the South American States in a certain contingency. Now, sir, the only constitutional way of giving any pledge of this kind is by treaty. But we have no treaty. We know this already. But this is not the real object of the House. The real object of the inquiry grows out of the papers which have been submitted to us. What I want to know is, whether our Minister has been instructed to give any pledge. I do not want to know whether any contract exists by which he was constitutionally authorized to use the language he did, but whether he was authorized in any manner whatever. Unless this expression is altered I cannot vote for either of the resolutions. The subject I consider as one of high import. This House ought to know—this nation ought to know—whether the Government of the United States recognizes any such pledge as that referred to by Mr. Poinsett. Without saying what ought to be the conduct of this House, I wish first that we should have the information. As the resolutions are now framed, we ask a question that can only be answered in the negative. We ask if a constitutional pledge has been given. Why, sir, the President will, of course, answer “No. You know that a constitutional pledge can only be given by a treaty, as well as I do.”

Mr. POWELL said he was satisfied that gentlemen would defeat their own object, and he therefore suggested to the gentleman from South Carolina, the omission of the words, “constitutional manner.”

Mr. McDUFFIE assented, and these words were stricken out.

Mr. WICKLIFFE said that he did not know whether he was to consider himself as the parent of the resolution in its present shape, or only as its god-father. It was very immaterial to him which. But he wished to have a look at another document; and he therefore moved to add the following amendment at the end of the resolution:

“And, also, to communicate to this House a copy of the communication from our Minister at Mexico, in which he informed the Government of the United States that the Mexican Government called upon this Government to fulfil the memorable pledge,” &c.

The amendment was adopted, without opposition, and the whole resolution thus amended, read as follows:

“Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to transmit to this House a copy of such parts of the answer of the Secretary of State to Mr. Poinsett's letter to Mr. Clay, dated Mexico, 28th September, 1825, and numbered 22, as relates to the pledge of the United States therein mentioned; and, also, to inform this House whether the United States have, in any manner, made any pledge to the Governments of Mexico and South America, that the United States would not permit the interference of any foreign power with the independence or form of government of those nations; and, if so, when? in what manner? and to what extent? And, also, to communicate to this House a copy of the communication from our Minister at Mexico, in which he informed the Government of the United States that the Mexican Government called upon this Government to fulfil the memorable pledge of the President of the United States, in his Message to Congress of December, 1823.”

Mr. FORSYTH made a question of order whether the House can pass upon the resolution in this form, without violating that rule which directs that all resolutions proposing a call upon the President or Heads of Departments should lie one day upon the table.

The SPEAKER decided that the resolution need not lie.

From this decision Mr. FORSYTH appealed to the House, and in support of the appeal observed, that the resolution offered on Saturday, was not a call upon the President of the United States, but simply a direction to one of the standing committees of the House. As now modified, it has become a call upon the Executive.

Mr. CAMPBELL observed, that the resolution had already been considered and discussed for two days, and that, therefore, the spirit of the rule, if not its letter, had been complied with, and if every alteration in a resolution obliges it to lie one day longer, any resolution might thus be indefinitely postponed.

The decision of the Chair was sustained—Ayes 112, noes 41.

Mr. TRIMBLE suggested the propriety of further amending the resolution, by inserting the usual restrictive clause, which leaves it discretionary with the Executive to communicate only so much of a paper called for as in his opinion may not be inconsistent with the public interest; but he made no motion to this effect.

The question was then taken on the adoption of the resolution, as amended, and determined in the affirmative, by yeas and nays.

And then the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, March 28.

Amendment of the Constitution.

Mr. McDUFFIE moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to take into consideration the proposed amendment to the constitution,

Amendment of the Constitution.

[H. OF R.]

in relation to the election of President and Vice President.

The motion prevailed—ayes 108, noes 29.

So the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. DWIGHT in the chair, on that subject; and it was further discussed by Mr. WHIFFLE, Mr. GARNSEY, Mr. KELLOGG, Mr. WORTHINGTON, and Mr. MINER.

WEDNESDAY, March 29.

National Southern Road.

The following resolution, yesterday offered by Mr. ISAACS, was taken up:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to lay before this House, copies of all the correspondence between that department and any members of Congress, since the first day of December last, on the subject of an examination of a route for the contemplated National Road from Washington to New Orleans, in such direction, through the western part of Tennessee, the northern part of Alabama, and the State of Mississippi, as should be found most eligible, with copies of the instructions to the engineers on that subject; and also to inform this House, whether such examination has been made, or is now making; and, if not, when such examination is intended to be made."

Mr. STEWART renewed his motion to lay the resolution on the table; which was carried, ayes 84, noes 53.

Amendment of the Constitution.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. DWIGHT in the chair; and, on motion of Mr. McDUFFIE, took up the proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States, in relation to the election of President and Vice President.

Mr. HOFFMAN addressed the committee at length.

Mr. HOFFMAN was followed by Mr. COOK, who was in favor of taking the Presidential election from the House of Representatives, but was opposed to the District System. He concluded a short speech, by offering the following, to be added to the first branch of Mr. McDUFFIE's amendment:

"And as will authorize the voters qualified to vote for members of the House of Representatives of the United States in each State, to vote directly, in such manner as the Legislature thereof shall direct, for the aforesaid officers, reserving to each State, after the failure to make a choice of either of the aforesaid officers, in the primary election, on the principle that such primary election is now made, an equal vote in such election; and that a convention be authorized, in each State, to act on the aforesaid amendments."

Mr. McDUFFIE requested the mover to consent to withdraw the amendment, on which he would remark in the course of his general reply; but Mr. COOK wished to have the sense of the House taken on this amendment, before it was taken on the main proposition.

Mr. McDUFFIE then moved that the committee rise. The motion was negatived.

Mr. BARBOUR, of Virginia, expressed a wish to conclude the remarks he had commenced some days since, before the question should be taken on the amendment now offered.

Mr. COOK consented, and Mr. BARBOUR concluded his speech.

Mr. J. S. BARBOUR, of Virginia said: I must ask, Mr. Chairman, the indulging attention of the committee, while I endeavor to offer to its candid deliberation, those reflections upon the question in debate, which occur to me; an indulgence at all times necessary to me, and peculiarly so upon this occasion. The protracted discussion for several weeks past has divested the subject of that interest which novelty usually imparts to the proceedings of the House. But the intrinsic magnitude of this question, the intense anxiety of the public mind, and the solemn obligations of representative duty, excuse, and, I humbly think, justify, whatever has been said and whatever may be said in this debate.

It has been again and again reiterated, in the progress of the discussion, that this amendment owes its birth to disappointed ambition; and to that restless spirit of inquietude which was cradled in the hearts of a recent election. And the hazard of disturbing the fundamental law, by novel and untried experiment, has been presented to us in all the terrors with which fancy and genius could surround it. Sir, I know of no other moral agents, in meliorating the defects of political institutions, than the judgment, the passions, and the interests of men.

If the effervescence of the public mind is permitted to subside, without realizing the attainable good, it is worse than idle to expect it in a period of tranquillity. Can we rationally hope to obtain from languishing lethargy, that which is not to be had from active enthusiasm; when the judgments of men are awakened by the approach of danger, and their passions kindled in the recent detection of flagrant and alarming abuses? The dread of innovation and the dangers of reform, have been the sword and the shield, with which usurpation, in all past time, has defended itself, and combated popular liberty. Had these doctrines prevailed, the glories of our own Revolution would have lain forever wrapt in the night of despotism.

The gentleman from South Carolina, who has submitted the resolutions for amendment, with propriety remarked, that, so far as the choice of the Chief Magistrate depended upon uniformity, "we are without any constitutional rule whatever." The perplexing difficulties which encompassed the convention, upon this subject, are visible in the journal of their proceedings. History could not guide their footsteps, and the lamp of experience reflected too faint a light to direct, with safety, their own deliberations. "Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors equal to the whole number of the Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in Congress." The power is here evidently lodged in the people of the State, and the Legislature possesses the right of directing the mode by which it may be exercised.

However wisely this power of directing the manner of appointment may be supposed to be lodged, it is certainly any thing but uniformity. The case would be rare, indeed, when the fluctuating counsels of four and twenty distinct and independent legislative bodies would invariably conduct them all to one common result?

Sir, this want of uniformity is, by no means, the most serious mischief that impends the existing system. Those creative acts of popular sovereignty, which infuse vitality into all our Governments, never intended to leave those agencies of their creation subject to control or destruction, from any other quarter than the sovereign will creating them. The conservative principle, in the mechanism of political institution, is its own inherent means for continued existence. Now, this constitution, has not provided, within itself, by its own action, the essential principle of self-preservation. Can that be called a safe system, which is not armed with a power, indispensably necessary in creating and protecting its essential organs? A very slight attention to the constitution will show to us its entire dependence upon the Legislatures of an inconsiderable proportion of the States, and of less than one-tenth of the members of this House, for the appointment of the Executive.

What is your whole number of members upon this floor? Two hundred and thirteen Representatives are in this House, from twenty-four States. The absence, either intentional or accidental, of the delegations from nine States, will defeat this eventual appointment, and nine of the smaller States send into this House but twenty Representatives. It is thus seen that, in the popular branch of the Government, the Representatives of less than one-tenth part of the American people may dissolve the Union of the States, and leave it a wreck upon the strand. Although the Government is divided into three departments, yet each is wrapped up, and indissolubly connected with others. Tear from it the Executive branch, (most especially this branch,) and all is lost.

The Revolutionary War presents us with unnumbered instances of State dereliction from constitutional obligation, in the midst of the struggle, and in the glow of patriotism. The present constitution is the creature of State delinquency.

Let me invite the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who opposes all amendment, to go with me into the history of his own State. Let me beg the gentleman from New York, (Mr. STORRS,) to turn to the annals of that great Commonwealth which he, in part, represents. Let me request the gentleman from New Jersey to recollect the difficulties of 1800, in making up their electoral vote—and I will then entreat the delegates from Vermont, Maryland, and Virginia, to adopt the counsels of conciliation and prevention which their several States pursued in those distracting times. In the two first elections, Pennsylvania had voted by General Ticket, but her law then expired by its own limitation. Her Legislature convened while all the springs of party feeling were in full excitement. The House of Representatives demanded one mode of appointing electors, the Senate another. Every effort to produce harmony of opinion, and concert of movement, was frustrated by the force of party. And, although no law existed, with no provided means of fulfilling the commands of the Federal Constitution, and no session of the Legislature intervening, before the election of a President, yet both Houses adjourned, with a total neglect of this important duty, and to that extent, with a secession from the Union. This struggle in the Legislature presented one continual scene of strife, crimination, and recrimination. The voice of the people was totally disregarded in the conflict, although public opinion was not inactive: for it had disclosed itself in one embodied front, and spoke a language that was both heard and understood. In relation to this duty, the same discord prevailed between the House of Representatives and the Council of New Jersey that had given so much inquietude to Pennsylvania, but these distracting views yielded, happily, to a temper of conciliation, upon a special and extraordinary meeting of the Legislature.

The States of Vermont and Massachusetts proposed and approved amendments to the constitution, and a similar one was offered, in Congress, by a Representative from New Hampshire. These propositions reached no farther than to expunge the indiscriminate vote for two persons, and to designate the President and Vice President. Virginia saw the evil in all its deformity, and proposed to amend the constitution in a manner that would reach and eradicate the threatening mischief. Her counsels were enlightened at the time by an illustrious man, who had much agency in forming and putting into motion the present system of Federal Government, and who has since worn so well the highest honors of the Union—upon him devolved the task of warding off these besetting calamities—a double duty pressed itself upon him. When the plan first went into operation, under the influence of those patriot and genial feelings, which are a happy substitute for Government itself, there was nothing of that bane of union resulting from the rivalry and jealousy of State power and sectional influence. Unfortunately, these passions were engendered in the lust of domination, and several of the States had so altered their mode of exercising the choice of electors, as to mar the better designs of the constitution, and to hold the greatest weight in the election by State concentration. Virginia could not behold this condition of things with silence nor indifference. Her statesmen had not only to defend and secure her appropriate influence in the contest then pending, but to propose a reform in the plan itself, which would spare us the return of these convulsive contests. The principles of self-defence, which are admitted and enjoined by every code of morals and of law, justified the State in putting on the armor of concentration, and in striking with all the force of one collected blow. She was indifferent neither to her powers nor her duties. The General Ticket system was in itself enough to guard the State against all the dangers of combination in others; yet the violent distractions of the States, and, above all, the imminent hazard of the constitution itself, called Virginia to loftier purposes and to sublimer duties. Convulsion and tumult had agitated several parts of the Union: hers was the grateful task to pour oil upon the waves; to present the beacon that might enlighten and direct her sister States; and to supply a safe defence for the wholesome principles of the constitution, both from open violence and insidious attack. Her General Assembly was then rent into parties, heated and exasperated by collision, but, in this great and solemn duty, party paused, and faction was silent. Reverence for the constitution, love for the Union, and for that equality which is the nurse of concord, prevailed over the ignoble passions of the hour, and produced, in one common effort by both parties, that amendment which is embraced in one of the resolutions now submitted by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. McDUFFIE.) The opinions of such men, and under such circumstances, ought not to be lightly regarded. The General Ticket mode of appointment was sustained by Mr. Madison, upon the single basis of retributive justice. He was the parent of the law in Virginia, and took especial care that his views should not be left open to future cavil, by inserting them in the preamble to the bill which he introduced. As it is before me, Mr. Chairman, I crave your indulgence while I read it.

"Whereas, until some uniform mode of choosing a President and Vice President of the United States shall be prescribed by an amendment to the constitution, it may happen, under a law of this Commonwealth, for appointing electors for that purpose, that a choice may take place contrary to the will of a majority of the United States, and also contrary to the will of a majority of the people of this State, which would be inconsistent with the true intent and meaning of the Constitution of the United States; and, although this Commonwealth is willing to accede to any reasonable and proper amendment of the said constitution, to remedy the said evil, yet, so far as it ought, in the mean time, to be counteracted, by every constitutional regulation within the power of the Legislature, until it shall be so removed: be it enacted," &c.

This preamble was not a delusive feint, which looked to nothing beyond the expression of abstract opinions, and the attainment of temporary purposes. I repeat, that an amendment to the constitution, having for its object a permanent mode of choosing by districts, was offered, and adopted with a unanimity which distinguished no other act of the General Assembly at that session. A few days after this movement in Virginia, one of the delegates from that State, (John Nicholas,) chosen by the people that I represent upon this floor, offered the same amendment.

The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. EVERETT) assures us that no failure has occurred in the operations of the existing system; and that the objections now urged grow out of the election of the present Chief Magistrate—an officer who has received the "highest marks of confidence from every Administration;" and this result showed, as he said, "perfect success, unexampled success, glorious success."

I have not heard urged, in this debate, any personal objections to the President of the United States. The opposition was exclusively to the mode of his election; to the belief that the primary and secondary intention of the constitution had been defeated; and that the election was made in violation of the will of a majority of the people and a majority of the States. It is in vain to tell me, that any man possessed the confidence of every Administration, when I see that he is not clothed with that confidence which the constitution demands for his investment.

The tendency of the proposition now in debate to trench upon the power of the States in their corporate capacities, has been urged with fervor and ability, by my colleagues, (Messrs. ARCHER and STEVENSON,) and also by the gentlemen from New York and Massachusetts, (Mr. STORES and Mr. EVERETT.)

Sir, uniformity of any kind, in the operations of this Government, must, in itself, encroach upon the power of action in the States; and yet it has been repeatedly admitted, in the progress of this discussion, that uniformity of movement, in the local authorities, is greatly to be wished in this respect. Is not this dread of encroachment rather a figment of the fancy, than the sober reality of enlightened judgment? Is it not an apprehension existing in speculations upon the theory of our system, rather than a deliberate conviction of mischievous results in its practical operations? Power is valuable in its possession only as it enables us to advance the public weal, to promote national prosperity, and to secure the blessings of free institutions to the present and future generations of men. Appropriated to malverse purposes, and to other ends than these, delegated power becomes alarming to society, and subversive of every legitimate object in the social compact. If rightfully employed, this power of directing the mode of appointing electors is but an instrumental agency in the State Legislatures.

The first reflection which occurs upon the claim of power for the State Legislatures, is, that they, of themselves, do, in effect, give the vote for President, instead of directing a mode by which the people of the State may choose the electors; and this result subverts the whole theory of the constitution, and invades its best principles.

First, the President (or rather the candidate for that station) is made to appoint the elector—not the elector to appoint the President. The elector, by previous arrangement, is clothed with the power of voting, for no other reason than his devotion to a particular candidate. The forms of the constitution are preserved, in giving the elector an empty shadow of power, while its efficient substance has been already exercised (not by the elector, nor by the people of the State, but) by its Legislature.

Nothing is more remarkable, in the progressive formation of this constitution, than the extreme caution employed in excluding the State Legislatures from any positive elective agency in making the Chief Executive Magistrate.

In our political system, the restraints on power, and the security of public liberty, result from the happy combination of State, federate, and popular action. The fruits of this combination constitute the unshared possession of this land, and supply to us that meliorating principle, which expands itself to the widest exigencies of national progress.

Any invasion upon the reserved sovereignty of the States, considered as political societies, must always be received with distrust. But, we should not permit this jealous sentiment to conduct us into error.

A slight attention to historical facts, will disclose to us the material action of the States in the Federal plan. The recommendation of Congress, in 1787, was, "for a firm national Government, and that the Convention shall render the constitution adequate to the exigencies of the Government, and the preservation of the Union."

The States were not prepared to follow the counsels of Congress; and, in acceding to the call of a Convention, they recommended a Federal, not a National Government. Several States delayed, for a time, to appoint any delegates, and Rhode Island declined, altogether, a representation in the Convention. Delaware coupled her acceptance of the invitation with an express condition that the system should secure to each State an equal vote in Congress.

The first movements of the Convention were evidently in accordance with the recommendation of Congress for a national plan. The propositions of Governor Randolph and Mr. Pinckney, both point to that result; and the votes of the Convention, in its early sessions, indicate, most distinctly, its preference for the National, over the Federal system. The gradual operation of public sentiment upon its deliberations, is visible in the progressive development of the federative feature, and the position which it is finally made to assume in the plan itself. But, Mr. Chairman, I repeat, that we must look into the Senate for the lodgment of State influence in the action of this Government.

The distribution of electoral power presented a complicated question: Two principles had already been fixed as the basis of our Government. The first resulting from the agency of the people; the second from the agency of the States. The first securing the rights of the people; the second the sovereignty of the States; both were considered essential to freedom. Certain political functions were required to be performed by both of these agencies, and each possessed a check upon the other.

The election of 1801 disclosed the dangers that hung over those provisions of the constitution. The amendment which followed, encroached upon the federative principle, and fixed the popular will as the basis of the election. Designating in the ballots the candidates for the office of President and Vice President, limited the contingent choice of the States. The candidate for Vice President was no longer within the range of State selection. It trammels the federate power, and binds it to the popular will; it prohibits the States from putting into the Chief Executive office an individual intended by the people for another station. Nor does it stop here—the right of choice is narrowed into a smaller compass, by requiring it to be made from the three highest on the people's list, in substitution of the number five.

This change in the constitution is a conclusive reply to much of the argument we have heard. It fixes public opinion as the element of our policy, and as the basis of our political structure.

Whenever an Executive comes into office by an appointment from this House, dangerous consequences inevitably result. Congress is converted into an arena for electioneering strife; its sublimer duties are obscured in the conflict. The President, so chosen, will employ all the arts of management and conciliation to win the favor of his enemies, in the hope that, by these means, he may secure a majority for the next election.

Upon the other hand, those opposing divisions, which constitute a majority when consolidated, will not be idle spectators of passing events. However segregated they may once have been, the triumph of a minority will furnish a sufficient principle of cohesion, to unite them in future action, and to secure a successful result. Amid these conflicts, public interest is a victim and a sacrifice. Here is a serious consideration for all. The hour is upon the wing, when greater difficulties may obstruct this salutary change. Political evils grow inveterate, and become incurable. To deliver a diseased and debilitated Government from the complicated miseries under which it may, in some distant age, lay expiring, is an impracticable task. The mischief is now but a seedling, a germ in the constitution. Crush it, and it is no more; warm it into life, and some noxious Upas will grow up from it, whose branches will overshadow the Republic, and stifle popular liberty.

THURSDAY, March 30.

Amendment of the Constitution.

On motion of Mr. McDUFFIE, the House then went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; Mr. DWIGHT in the chair, on the proposed amendments to the constitution, offered by Mr. McDUFFIE:

And the amendment, offered by Mr. COOK, to be added to the first branch of Mr. McDUFFIE's amendment, being also under consideration:

Mr. BARTLETT said: I am opposed to the resolutions now under consideration; to the amendment; the amendment of the amendment; and the twenty-one other resolutions for altering the constitution, which have been referred to this committee.

When the subject of a change of any of the provisions of the constitution was first introduced, I regretted that there should exist, or should be supposed to exist, a necessity for its discussion. I believed of the constitution, as of all other results of human effort, that it was imperfect. I had fears that imperfections would be exhibited, for which no practicable remedy could be found; and that thus our labors, instead of improving our condition, would serve only to weaken our political institutions, by diminishing our respect for them. But, so far from such an effect upon my mind, after an unremitted attention to the elaborate and protracted discussion, I look to THE CONSTITUTION as it is, with better hopes, with increased confidence and veneration. Should such be the influence of this investigation upon the community—impatient as the nation may be of the debate—I shall never deem it to have been the wasted time of the House. Whatever disposition this tribunal may make of the different propositions before it, the principles advanced in the discussion deserve consideration; and, as touching the foundations of our Government, are of deep and lasting interest, in their character, their application, and their consequences.

The resolutions before us, when originally introduced, proposed, first, the plan of the General District system, and, secondly, the scheme of taking from the House the power of election by States. But, by an adroit military manœuvre, the whole order of attack upon the constitution is reversed, and the resolutions now propose, first, to take from the States their contingent right of election, by the House, and, secondly, the right of regulating the election by districts, or General Ticket system. There is unquestionable generalship in this.

The scattered forces that may be gathered round the rights of the small States, are supposed to be easily vanquished.

The successful operation of our Government, thus far, should not lead us, in our exultation, to believe it so settled and permanent, that we may venture safely to test it with all sorts of untried schemes. In the triumph of its anticipated perpetuity, a gentleman near me exulted, even in the language of Napoleon, in his pride. Let us take with that, too, its instructions. It was, when receiving adoration from the Mamelukes, on the plains of Egypt, that the conqueror exclaimed, "Forty centuries shall look down from yonder pyramids upon our achievements;" and yet, less than one-fourth of one of those periods found him chained in mid-ocean to a desolate rock.

We are reminded that our fathers here kindled the beacon fire of liberty, while our foes still predict that it is but the transient flash of a meteor, soon to leave the world in deeper gloom. We glory to see its blaze, in our own time, gleaming along the mountains of our southern hemisphere, and even penetrating the darkness of European despotism. May it continue to burn with a purer and a brighter flame, till, when the tide of war and desolation abate, its light, reflected from the whole arch of heaven, shall remain, the bow of peace and of liberty to the emancipated nations of the earth.

Mr. McDUFFIE then observed, that he had expected and intended, according to the understanding yesterday, to have addressed the committee to-day in reply to the several gentlemen who had spoken in opposition to the resolutions—but, as the remarks of the gentleman from New Hampshire had greatly exceeded the time he had anticipated, he must defer his reply till to-morrow.

Some conversation took place between Messrs. BARTLETT, McDUFFIE, and WEBSTER, the result of which was, that an effort should be made to close this discussion to-morrow.

Mr. COOK then addressed the committee in favor of taking the Presidential election from the House of Representatives, and of the adoption of the resolution, (which he offered yesterday, and was afterwards withdrawn.)

Mr. COOK concluded his remarks about three o'clock, when, on motion of Mr. McDUFFIE, the committee rose.

FRIDAY, March 31.

Amendment of the Constitution.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, in the chair, on the resolutions for the amendment of the constitution.

Mr. McDUFFIE addressed the committee in support of the amendments—and in reply to the several speeches made in opposition to him, as follows:

Mr. Chairman: I feel most deeply sensible of the difficulties by which I am surrounded, and of the painful and embarrassing responsibility of the position I occupy, in relation to this important proposition. If it had not been all along apparent, from the very nature of things, it is now placed beyond doubt by the course and character of the arguments urged in opposition to the proposed amendment, that he who attempts, under any circumstances, to effect a fundamental change of existing institutions, particularly if the object of that change is to divest those of power who have been in the habit either of using or abusing it—undertakes, if not a rash and hazardous, certainly an Herculean task. He must not only encounter the intrinsic difficulties inseparably connected with the merits of every such proposition, by vanquishing objections which naturally present themselves even to the most dispassionate understandings; but he must encounter and vanquish those very passions and prejudices by which the judgments of men are most liable to be disturbed and perverted, in the conduct of political affairs.

In reference to the general conduct and character of the argument in opposition to the proposed amendment, I must be permitted to say, that not a single gentleman who has spoken in opposition to both resolutions, has met my arguments fairly, or pretended to answer them as they were really presented.

The honorable gentleman from New York, (Mr. STORRS,) opened his address by warning us not to tread, with unhallowed feet, on the holy ground of the constitution; and every gentleman who has followed in his wake, has favored the committee with a grave and portentous homily on the sacredness of the constitution, the wisdom of our ancestors, and the danger of innovation. These, sir, are the hackneyed and threadbare arguments. I was not, therefore, surprised, to hear them repeated, with all the changes which could be rung upon them, on the present occasion. But I confess, sir, that I was not prepared to hear the extraordinary doctrine advanced by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. EVERETT,) on this subject: a doctrine which, though I have paid some little attention to the history and philosophy of Government, it has been my lot to hear, for the first time in my life, advanced on the floor of the American Congress. No, sir, I did not expect to hear, in an age distinguished for its improvements in political science, and in the popular branch of the freest Government on earth, a doctrine which even the Films of the Old World did not dare to advance, as an offering at the shrine of despotic power, when the "divine right of kings" was assumed as the only legitimate basis of Government. What is it, sir? That it is unconstitutional to amend the constitution; or, as the gentleman in another place expressed it, in a more philosophical and imposing form, it is incompetent for political functionaries to assume that the constitution, from which they derive their existence, is imperfect. As this strange and startling proposition is in direct contradiction both to the letter and common sense of the constitution, I shall certainly not gravely set about refuting it by argument. It has at least the advantage of being beyond the reach of that weapon.

In the National Journal of the 10th of August, 1824, are these authoritative declarations: "Facts and inferences: 1st. That if Mr. Crawford should be elected, we cannot expect from him, or from his friends, any movement in favor of an amendment of the constitution, securing to the people the right and power of electing the President of the United States. 2dly. If Mr. Adams should be elected, we think we may safely affirm our belief, that he will conscientiously and firmly do all that it may be proper for him to do, to secure the election of the President in the hands of the people." 3dly. "If Mr. Clay should be elected, he and his friends will be bound, by a regard for consistency, if by no political considerations, to pursue the same course. If there were no other objection to the election of Mr. Crawford, that which has been stated would be sufficient. We sincerely believe that an election by the people, in the worst possible mode that could be devised by those whose object was to devise the best, would be infinitely preferable to the best possible mode of electing a President, in which Congress or the State Legislatures have any concern."

Referring to an article in which the editors of the Intelligencer had expressed an earnest hope that a uniform system of voting by districts would be established before another Presidential term should elapse, the Journal of 25th August contains the following commentary:

"We presented it to our readers, with a strong expression of our entire concurrence in its sentiments." "If the editors of the National Intelligencer are sincere, as we believe they are, in the expression of their earnest hope, they are bound by conscience, by honor, by patriotism, to give their support to some other candidate, from whom and whose friends may be confidently anticipated every effort to accomplish, and, indeed, the actual accomplishment of a hope, the failure of which will be the ruin of this nation, and finally of the cause of free government throughout the world."

Deeply as I have felt, sir, on this subject, I have used no language stronger than this.

Such, sir, were the avowed principles of Mr. Adams, while a candidate; principles directly hostile to his subsequent practices. By advertising to the letter of acceptance which he addressed to the committee of this House, which announced to him the fact of his election, it will be seen that, at that period, he still felt the obligation of the pledge which had been given to the nation, and was still disposed to do homage to the principles which had been violated in his election.

MARCH, 1826.]

Amendment of the Constitution.

[H. OF R.]

I shall now proceed to show that, by some strange fatality, not only the President himself, but his prominent and leading supporters, editorial and congressional, have undergone a most extraordinary change of opinion on this very subject. The Journal, which had recently denounced as "aristocrats and usurpers" those Representatives who did not "respond to the voice of the people, and give it its full effect," suddenly changed its principles on the formation of the coalition between Mr. Adams and Mr. Clay, and eulogized the latter gentleman for his "independence" in disregarding the request of the Kentucky Legislature, and the known and undisputed will of the people of that State. But the change which has taken place in the editorial organ of the Administration, is not more striking than that which is exhibited in the gentleman from New York, (Mr. STORRE,) who is put forward on this occasion, in the front rank, as their champion on this floor. Two years ago, when I introduced these very resolutions, they were referred to a select committee, of which the gentleman from New York was a member; and I then found him my most strenuous and ardent coadjutor.

In proceeding to answer the arguments of the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. EVERETT,) and the gentleman from New York, (Mr. STORRE,) against the District system, I shall have the full weight of both their former opinions to aid me in the undertaking: for the gentleman from New York also, as was shown by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. BARBOUR,) maintained, two years ago, that the plan of the new Government was intended to subvert the whole system, and convert the Confederacy into a national Government; though he can now see no danger but in the choice of a "national" President by "the people of America," and no safety but in the federative action of the States in that election. As a gentleman from Virginia (Mr. ARCHER) has assumed that public opinion is opposed to this (as he is pleased to term it) theoretical branch of the proposed amendment, it may not be amiss to set him right on this subject, by recurring to a few facts connected with its history.

When this proposition, some eight or ten years ago, was recommended to the several States by the Legislature of North Carolina, it was adopted by the Legislatures of a large majority of the States, and by those of two of the largest, New York and Virginia, almost unanimously. This system was particularly a favorite in New England, owing, perhaps, to the recollection and abhorrence of the Gerrymandering affair in Massachusetts; and though I believe it was adopted by every New England State, yet I now understand—and it is one of the most portentous signs of the times—that there will not be as many as half a dozen votes from that quarter of the Union in favor of either branch of the amendment. The Senate of the United States have repeatedly adopted, by the constitutional majority of two-thirds, resolutions in favor of the District system, and in 1820 this House sanctioned it, by a vote of 94 to 54, wanting but four or five votes of a constitutional majority. In fact, there is no idea that strikes the sound common sense of the people more forcibly, than that of having some uniform system of giving the votes of the respective States on this great question; and the actual experience of every State that has made the experiment of the General Ticket system, has demonstrated that, as a means of ascertaining the voice of the people, it is a delusive and insulting mockery. And yet, the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. ARCHER) is pleased to represent me as a "theoretical genius," sacrificing every thing to mere symmetry, for maintaining the expediency of this plain, old-fashioned District system; when all the arguments which either he or any other gentleman has urged against it, seem to me to have been inspired by the very genius of metaphysical abstraction.

In answer to the objection which I urged against the General Ticket system, that it tended, by an inevitable necessity, to throw the whole elective power of a State into the hands of a few political managers, acting by caucus nomination, the gentlemen from New York and Massachusetts have both replied, that, by the District system, you would increase the evil, by multiplying the number of caucuses. I was not surprised to hear this argument from the gentleman from Massachusetts: for, he informed us that he had no practical knowledge of the subject; but I confess I heard it with astonishment, coming from the gentleman from New York, who has witnessed the operation, and thoroughly understands the principle of the caucus system. The existence of a caucus arises entirely out of the necessity of preventing distraction, and producing concert, in the votes of a large mass of people, who have a common object to accomplish. A State, for example, that has thirty-six electors to choose by a general vote of the people, must either submit to have the electors nominated by some central agency, or run the hazard of having the popular will entirely defeated by a want of concert as to the electoral ticket. Almost every district would have its separate list of electors, and, though agreeing as to the person they might desire to make President, they would unavoidably disagree as to the means of effecting the object. But, sir, divide the State into thirty-six districts, each entitled to one vote, and acting upon its own separate and independent basis, and there will exist no necessity for the preliminary concert of a caucus nomination. The people of a district can move in concert, without any such machinery.

I will now invite the attention of the committee to a very brief examination of the objections urged by several gentlemen to the District system, founded upon its supposed tendency to interfere with the essential rights of the States, to impair the federative character of our Government, and to lead to its consolidation. And here, sir, I cannot but remark, that gentlemen must be favored with some special illumination on the subject of State rights, to discover that they are engendered by a system, proposed, as was shown by a gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. BARBOUR,) as early as 1799, by Mr. Madison; who, of all the statesmen of this country, would be most acute to detect, and most prompt to resist, any encroachment upon the rights of the States.

The gentleman from New York has been pleased to call the District system a crucible, by which the States of this Union were to be amalgamated into one common mass, by fusion; and has, throughout his speech, assumed that I have proposed and maintained what I expressly disclaimed, and what is nowhere to be found, but in his own imagination, and in the resolution of his colleague, (Mr. GARNSKY.) My proposition distinctly secures to each State, in the primary election, the precise number of votes to which she is now entitled. The people of each State will give the electoral votes of that State, in districts, laid off by the Legislature; and how the people are to be melted into one mass, by being separated into two hundred and sixty-one, surpasses, I confess, my poor comprehension.

The constitution has provided, that the people of each State shall give a certain number of electoral votes for President, and that, if any one person shall have a majority of those votes, he shall be the President. We then have the authority of the constitution itself for saying, that this is the best mode of electing that important officer; in other words, to use the language of the Federalist, that the framers of the constitution intended that his electors should be chosen by "the immediate act of the American people." How, then, can it be said, that we violate the principles of the constitution, by making those principles more effective? The failure to elect a President by the primary vote, is certainly a political evil, and is so regarded by the constitution: for it compels us to resort to a mode of choice, which, to say the least of it, the Convention did not think the best, or they would have made it the primary mode. To prevent that failure, then, it seems to me, is to do nothing more than we should be authorized to do, according to the restricted notion of our power of amendment, entertained by the gentleman from Massachusetts. It would be only carrying the existing principles of the constitution into "a more perfect and happier operation."

There cannot be a greater political solecism than that which is involved in the idea of commencing the election of the President upon one principle, and ending it according to another. If the popular principle is the true principle of this election, as indicated by the constitution itself, nothing can be more absurd than to abandon it entirely as soon as the people, at the first effort, fail to give a majority of votes for one candidate. It looks like punishing the people, by forfeiture, for not being more unanimous. And rest assured, sir, they will adopt means to avoid the penalty hereafter, even if you do not amend the constitution. Not only the large States, but all the States that regard the principles and the purity of our Government as objects worth preserving, will certainly concur in some preliminary measures to make the popular vote conclusive, and prevent what, under the most favorable circumstances, is a great national evil—an election by the House of Representatives.

In my opening remarks, I stated that, in every well-organized Government, extensive powers must be vested in the Executive Department; that the only effectual means of rendering these powers compatible with public liberty, was an efficient and direct responsibility to the people; and that, in point of fact, the power of the President of the United States was nearly equal to that of the king of England. This, says the gentleman, is "an exaggeration too violent to be admitted in the heat of argument;" but, being resolved to surpass his antagonist, in whatever he undertakes, even should it be exaggeration, he asserts that the Executive has no power at all; that we have no Government!

The gentleman from New Hampshire (Mr. BARTLETT) urges it as an argument against taking the election of the President from this House, that we are compelled to choose one of the three highest on the list of those voted for by the electors; and it is, therefore, of very little importance which of them we choose, whether the highest or the lowest. In my judgment, a stronger argument could not be advanced for divesting this House of the power it now exercises. If it is of so little importance which of the three prominent candidates shall be elected, why bring the agitating question into this House? Why expose this body to certain distraction and probable corruption, when there is no object to be accomplished by it that will compensate for the hazard? Shall the members of this House wantonly run into temptation, merely for the sake of illustrating their incorruptible purity? The gentleman from Massachusetts has said, that, if the king of England were elective for four years, no ministry could keep their seats for four weeks. Sir, if I know any thing of England, a single election of a king, by the Parliament, would literally destroy the political system, by the corruption and violence to which it would give rise. The same consequences, or very nearly the same, must, in the course of time, and at no very distant period, take place in this country, if we do not make this change in our constitution. Ambition, that, in all ages, has either marched to empire through blood and violence, or made its inglorious way through fraud and corruption, is the same active, restless, and ungovernable passion here, that it has been found in all other countries. No political millennium has opened upon us. The nature of man is unchanged. We can only hope for exemption from the corruption and depravity which history records of other countries, by avoiding the imperfection in our political organization that produced those evils in their systems.

But, appealing from the history of other countries, gentlemen have triumphantly referred to our own to disprove the alleged imperfection in the mode of choosing the President. The gentleman from New Hampshire (Mr. BARTLETT) has called our attention to the election of 1801, by the House of Representatives, and he cites the success of Mr. Jefferson as a proof of the fitness of this House to perform the electoral function. Sir, the gentleman could not have selected a more unfortunate example to illustrate his argument. If ever there was a dark and portentous period in our political history, it was that of the contested election between Thomas Jefferson and Aaron Burr, in the House of Representatives. Those who were then on the theatre of political life, can tell the gentleman with what trembling apprehensions, with what indignant denunciations, the people of the United States looked, week after week, upon the disgraceful drama that was going on within these walls; when the peace of the Union and the fate of the Republic were suspended on a thread, and when the nation was finally saved from the usurped dominion of a vile and unprincipled intriguer, more by the Providence of God, than either by the wisdom or virtue of those upon whom the high duty had devolved of electing a President. Sir, what was the principle involved in the attempt, so nearly consummated by success, to make Aaron Burr the President, by the vote of this House? It was a question of naked, unmitigated, desperate usurpation. With the undisputed fact before them, that he had not received one solitary vote in the Union for President, there were found in these walls, not only one or two men, but almost an entire party, prepared to bid a bold and reckless defiance, both to the will of the nation and the principles of the constitution. If they had succeeded, this nation would have been shaken to its centre, and what commenced in faction, would, probably, have ended in blood. And yet this scene, where all the madness of faction presided over the deliberations of the conclave, is referred to as an argument against taking the election from this House!

But those, it may be said, were days of factionous violence, when the country was divided into two organized parties. I admit they were, sir; and do you expect a new era in history—that we are, from this time forward, to have no parties?

As to my own course, it is distinctly marked out. I shall liberally sustain the just and proper measures of this Administration: and, for the sake of illustrating my principles, I wish I could sustain them all—but I shall as decidedly oppose their re-election. Brought into existence by the sinful embraces of an unprincipled coalition, with the "primal curse" of usurpation indelibly stamped upon them, no subsequent measures can purify them from the original sin of their generation and birth.

An honorable member from New Hampshire (Mr. BARTLETT) has been pleased to refer to the celebrated sentiment of Mr. Crawford—"Judge the Administration by their measures"—as a just rebuke to the petulance of faction. Judge the Administration by their measures! No, sir; I will judge of the measures of the Administration by their own intrinsic merits: but I will not judge of the Administration by their measures only, when they come to settle the accounts of their stewardship, and ask for a renewal of their trust. It would be just as reasonable to ask of me, when my horse is stolen, to let the judgment of condemnation depend, not upon the fact of the felony, but upon the kindness or cruelty with which the thief should use the stolen animal.

When Mr. McDUFFIE had finished his argument, Mr. TREMBLE obtained the floor, but gave way at the request of

Mr. EVERETT, who begged leave to offer a single word of explanation. The gentleman from South Carolina, Mr. E. said, has taken occasion, after claiming to himself the merit of exclusive consistency on this subject, to attempt to fix a charge of inconsistency and change of opinion upon me; and has endeavored to support this charge by a selection of sentences, and parts of sentences, from an article published, six years ago, in a journal with which I had an editorial connection. It is a sufficient reply to this charge to say, that I never, in my life, expressed an opinion upon the subject of the gentleman's amendment, in either branch of it, until I came to the discussion of it this winter. I never could have expressed an opinion, for I am not conscious of ever having devoted an hour to the examination of the question. With respect to the sentiments which the gentleman has cited from the North American Review, though I have but a general recollection of the contents of the article in question, which I have not seen since the correction of the proof-sheets, the gentleman knows—since he appears to have read it with care—that they refer to a very different matter. The writer of that article attempts a sort of outline of the constitution, in reply to a remark of Jeremy Bentham, whose information of our institutions appears to have remained stationary since the Old Confederation, and who actually speaks of the President of the United States as the President of Congress. Quoting this remark, and refuting the doctrine implied in it, the writer of the article goes on to say, that the present Government of the United States is a National Government, (not like the old one,) a Confederacy of the States. The President is the President of the people; the Representatives, the Reprerepresentatives of the people; the Judiciary, the Judiciary of the people; and the Senate, the only branch which represents the States as such: that, had the Union been a compact simply between the States as such, they would have had an equal vote in the choice of President, &c. All this, sir, is unquestionably true. The gentleman says, these were my former views; they certainly are my present views: for, though the present constitution was formed by compact between States equally sovereign, it is not itself a compact between States, retaining each an equal share of the sovereignty, as was the case with the former Confederation. I freely grant the gentleman that the writer of the article, in saying that the representation in the Senate, is the only trace of Federal equality, fell into an error, no doubt, from the haste and carelessness incident to anonymous periodical writing. The choice of President is, also, in some respects, federative: this is not matter of opinion, on which to ground a charge of inconsistency; it is matter of fact, overlooked or omitted by the author of the essay which the gentleman cites. The gentleman from South Carolina and myself do not differ as to the proposition that the choice of the President is, to a certain extent, a federative feature of the Government. We differ as to the right now to alter that, which, at the time, was fixed by compromise, between parties then equally sovereign, and who agreed to give up certain portions of their equal sovereignty, and no more; and to establish a Government to a certain degree National, and to a certain degree Federative.

SATURDAY, April 1.

Amendment of the Constitution.

The House, on motion of Mr. McDUFFIE, went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, in the chair, on the amendments proposed by Mr. McDUFFIE, to the constitution.

Mr. TRIMBLE addressed the committee. He began by saying, that the Locrians had a statute which required the person who intended to propose an alteration or amendment of their fundamental laws, to go into the assembly of the people, with a rope round his neck; and if he failed in his plan of alteration or amendment, the statute declared that he should be instantly hung up, without any further trial or conviction. He thought it possible that similar enactments might be useful in our day and generation, to repress the rage in favor of amending constitutions; but he did not wish for such a law at present, because there were some twenty plans before the House to amend the Federal Constitution; nineteen of which would fail beyond a doubt, and probably the other also; and of course the law of the Locrians, if in force among us, would sweep us off by tens and twenties, and thin our ranks most marvelously. But he would hold it up to the committee as a fit remedy for premature and useless innovations in the course of legislation. Historians tell us that these Locrians made no alterations in the body of their laws for about two hundred years; during which period they were a prosperous and a happy people; applauded and admired by all the other States of Greece around them.

Mr. T. was in favor of the proposition to exclude the election from the House, but was decidedly opposed to any scheme which would diminish or impair the full power of the States to regulate the whole subject, as separate independent bodies, or communities of people. His best judgment was opposed to the districts, and he should vote against the District system, unless he should find the people of his State in favor of that plan. It was admitted on all sides, in debate, that the States, in adopting the District system, would have to surrender some portions of their power over the election; and this was not consistent with his views of Federal or State policy. His opinion was, before he came into Congress, that the Federal Government was rather too weak and feeble to maintain itself against the States: but he was now fully satisfied that the States were the weaker vessels, and he would not agree to increase their weakness by taking power from them.

He would vote, he said, with the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. McDUFFIE,) in favor of his abstract proposition to exclude the election from the House, but not for the reasons offered by that member.

The great objection urged against the present mode of election is, the improper use that may be made of power and patronage to corrupt the members and control their votes. But here a plain distinction had been overlooked by those who had preceded him in argument. There are, said he, two classes, or divisions, of this power and patronage; first, the power and patronage incident to the Presidential office, and to be exercised, from time to time, by the man in office, in the discharge of his official duties; and, second, the power and patronage incident to each of the three candidates before the House; and which each of them could only use potentially. These two classes of power and patronage differ widely from each other. The first is not complained of; on the contrary, the gentleman (Mr. McDUFFIE) approved it in his first speech—contended that it was right and proper—protested against its diminution—declared himself the last man who would oppose it—made it out to be equal, or nearly equal, to the power and patronage of the king of England—thought it absolutely necessary in our system of Government, and was unwilling to place any check upon it, except the check of “sublime responsibility.” In fact, the plans and propositions of amendment in debate, were not brought forward or intended as a check upon the exercise of power and patronage by the President after he is inducted into office.

April, 1826.]

Amendment of the Constitution.

[H. OF R.]

And yet the President, after his induction, may use the same power and patronage to secure his re-election. He could use it in both Houses, and in the States and Districts also; and the pernicious effects resulting from the actual use of it, here or elsewhere, for a period of four years, would far exceed the effects resulting from the use of it potentially, by the candidates before the House, for a few days, or at most, a few weeks only. And then again the President, after his re-election, may use this power and patronage during his last term of four years, to bring in a favorite successor. And yet the gentleman offers us no plan to check the left-handed exercise of all this mass of power and patronage. He dreads the power and patronage incident to the candidates before the House. It is this that he complains of; and this, he thinks, will make this body more corrupt than any legislative body ever has been heretofore.

Mr. VANOM then addressed the committee: Sir, the members of the Convention that framed this constitution put the election, in the last resort, where it now rests; and I have no doubt that they viewed the whole ground, and weighed, in a proper manner, the difficulties that were to be encountered, either in throwing it back a second time to the people, or any pre-existing body under the State authorities. The gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. STEVENSON,) to whom I listened with so much pleasure, in the very able view he took of the Federal features of this Government, has proposed, in the last resort, to give the election to the State Legislatures. Sir, volumes might be spoken and written, in my opinion, to show the impropriety of such a step; if there was no other objection, the simple fact that those bodies, under the constitution, have the appointment of Senators confided to their charge, would be sufficient of itself.

The Executive Department consists of two branches, the President and the Senate. The Senate is intended to operate as a check upon the President. The Senate, also, in its judicial character, is to sit as a court of impeachment, to try the President. It is, therefore, manifest, that they ought to be as independent of each other in sentiment and feeling, as practicable. Is it not then improper, that the President and Senate should owe their election to the same bodies of men? I ask that gentleman, seriously, to reflect before he takes this step. I ask this House, and this nation, to pause before they unhinge the constitution of their country; to remember the difficulties that their ancestors had in bringing into successful operation this splendid monument of intellectual wisdom—the result of one of the noblest efforts of mutual concession and compromise, that was ever effected by any political body in any age or nation.

Mr. T. P. MOORE, of Kentucky, said he was in favor of the resolutions of the gentleman from South Carolina. They were in strict accordance with a fundamental article in his political creed, that the people were the safest depository of every power which it was practicable for them to exercise. But the duties with which he had been charged, by his immediate constituents, and the vigorous support which the resolutions had received, rendered any exertions, on his part, to advance them, both inconvenient and unnecessary.

Mr. HAMILTON moved that the committee rise.

Mr. BUCHANAN appealed to the committee on the propriety of closing the debate on these resolutions; stating that he had himself prepared, with much care, a speech on the subject, which, after what had taken place, he now would suppress.

Mr. WEBSTER pressed the same point, and moved that the committee rise.

Mr. STOKES asked him to withdraw the motion, that he might merely state that his vote on the propositions would be the same as recorded on the Journals among the yeas and nays, in a former Congress; but he refused to comply, and the question being taken, the committee rose.

Mr. WEBSTER then moved, in the House, that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of these resolutions; which was agreed to, and the committee was discharged accordingly.

Mr. McDUFFIE then substituted for his original resolutions, the amendments he had offered in Committee of the Whole, viz:

"Resolved, That for the purpose of electing the President and Vice President of the United States, the constitution ought to be amended in such manner as will prevent the election of the aforesaid officers from devolving on Congress.

"Resolved, That a uniform system of voting by Districts ought to be established in all the States, the number of Districts in each State to equal the number of Senators and Representatives to which such State may be entitled in Congress, and each District having one vote.

"Resolved, That a select committee be appointed, with instructions to prepare and report a joint resolution, embracing the aforesaid objects."

Mr. COOK again moved the amendment which he had offered, in Committee of the Whole, as an addition to the first branch of Mr. McD.'s amendment, viz:

"And as will authorize the voters qualified to vote for the members of the House of Representatives of the United States in each State, to vote directly, in such manner as the Legislature thereof shall direct, for the aforesaid officers, reserving to each State, after the failure to make a choice of either of the aforesaid officers in the primary election, on the principle that such primary election is now made, an equal vote in such election; and that a convention be authorized in each State, to act on the aforesaid amendments."

Mr. WICKLIFFE moved to amend Mr. Cook's amendment, by striking out that clause which proposes the calling of a convention in each State to consider the amendments that may be sent down to the several States for acceptance or rejection.

Mr. SAUNDERS now moved the Previous Question, (the effect of which precludes all amendments and debate, and requires at once a decision on the main question before the House.) The motion of Mr. SAUNDERS was sustained,—ayes 86, noes 60. The previous question was then put, viz: "Shall the main question now be taken?"

On the decision of this question, Mr. POWELL called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and were—yeas 128, nays 64.

So it was determined that the main question should now be taken.

Mr. McDUFFIE called for a division of the question, that the vote might be taken first on the proposition to remove the Presidential Election from the House of Representatives, and then on the District System; which was agreed to.

The question was accordingly stated on the following resolution, viz:

"Resolved, That, for the purpose of electing the President and Vice President of the United States, the constitution ought to be amended in such manner as will prevent the election of the aforesaid officers from devolving on Congress."

And, by request of Mr. BARBOUR, of Virginia, the question was taken by yeas and nays, and decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Adams of N. Y., Addams of Pa., Alexander of Va., Alexander of Tenn., Allen of Tenn., Alston, Anderson, Angel, Armstrong, Ashley, Bailey, Badger, Barbour of Va., Barney, Bassett, Baylies, Blair, Boone, Brent, Buchanan, Buckner, Cambreleng, Campbell, Carson, Carter, Cary, Caseddy, Claiborne, Cocke, Conner, Cook, Crump, Davenport, Deitz, Drayton, Edwards of Penn., Edwards of N. So the first resolution was agreed to.

The question was then taken on the following (second) resolution:

"Resolved, That a uniform system of voting by Districts, ought to be established in all the States, the number of Districts in each State to equal the number of Senators and Representatives to which such State may be entitled in Congress, and each District having one vote."

And, by request of Mr. LITTLE, decided by yeas and nays, which resulted as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Adams of N. Y., Alexander of Tenn., Allen of Tenn., Alston, Anderson, Angel, Armstrong, Ashley, Bailey, Badger, Barbour of Va., Barney, Baylies, Blair, Bryan, Cambreleng, Campbell, Carson, Carter, Claiborne, Cocke, Conner, Deitz, Edwards of N. J., Tucker of S. C., Van Rensselaer, Vance, Varnum, Vinton, Wales, Whipple, Whittlesey, James Wilson, Henry Wilson, Wilson of S. C., Wilson of Ohio, Wolf, Wood of N. Y., Woods of Ohio, Wright, Wurts, Young—102.

So the second resolution was rejected.

Mr. McDUFFIE then moved that the first resolution, which had been agreed to, be referred to a select committee, to report thereon to this House.

The motion was carried—ayes 118.

The committee was ordered to consist of 24 members, as follows:

Mr. McDUFFIE, Mr. LINCOLN, Mr. BARTLETT, Mr. BAILEY, Mr. PRABOE, Mr. INGERSOLL, Mr.

And then the House adjourned.

MONDAY, April 3.

Mr. THOMAS H. SILL, a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania, in the place of the Hon. Patrick Farrelly, deceased, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

Diplomatic Addresses.

The following resolution, offered by Mr. ISAACKS, of Tennessee, on Saturday, was taken up :

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House, copies of the public addresses delivered by the Ministers of the United States to the King of Spain, since the year 1818, and also such correspondence as may have occurred between the Ministers of the United States and any of the Independent Governments of Spanish America, relating to either of said addresses ; or any communications from any of our Ministers at such Governments to our Government, in relation thereto."

Mr. ISAACKS said he would briefly state the reasons for desiring this call. He was not sure that any very important information would result from it ; and he could assure gentlemen he did not ask for these papers with any view of finding fault with what had been done by anybody. But the House was about entering upon the consideration of the general subject of our relations with Spain and with the South American Republics ; and he thought it was desirable that as full a view as possible should be obtained of the whole ground. With this view it was that he had moved the resolution. It might be that some change had taken place, within these two years past, in the views of our Government towards Spain, and it might be that the South American Republics had noticed some change. It might also be desirable to see and understand in what light they considered such apparent change, and how the subject had been treated by our Ministers to those Governments.

Mr. FORSYTH observed that he did not know of any public inconvenience that would result from an adoption of the resolution ; and, even if he did, it would be a very ungracious task in him to oppose it. He thought, however, that it needed some little modification ; he would suggest such modification to the gentleman who had moved it, but should himself make no specific motion to effect it.

The resolution, said he, calls for the public addresses, delivered by our Ministers to certain foreign Governments. Now, strictly speaking, there are no addresses delivered in public. When a Minister goes to a foreign Government, he presents his credentials to the head of the Government, accompanied by a speech, if he thinks proper—but this latter is discretionary. This, however, is not strictly a public address. Whenever, afterwards, any interchange of letters becomes necessary, an audience is demanded of the Minister for the purpose of presenting the letters, &c. There is one other occasion when a Minister has the right to present an address. If he thinks that the Minister of the Government who holds diplomatic intercourse with him is actuated by an unfriendly disposition, and manifests it by unfair and improper treatment, he may demand an audience, and make his appeal to the head of the Government. I do not know, however, that this has ever been done by any Minister of this Government. If I understand the object of the gentleman's resolution, it is to get copies of the addresses delivered by our Ministers to Spain, &c., when they presented their credentials, or were about to leave the country, and I suggest to him so to modify the resolution as to embrace his object more distinctly. I beg leave to say a word on the subject of these addresses. If any judgment unfavorable to our present Minister to Spain has been formed from any thing that has appeared in the newspapers, as his address to the Spanish court, great injustice has been done to him. The first knowledge possessed here of that address, is from a translation of it, as it appeared in the Gazette of Madrid. That print is under the absolute control of the Court. The translation of the address has no doubt been prepared for that paper in order to produce an effect in Spain. I happen to know the fidelity of the translations made for that paper. The expressions which are thought to be of a favorable kind for the Government, are made as strong as possible. Mr. F. here referred to a Message of the late President of the United States to Congress, which he said was translated so falsely, that he was very sure, could the President have read it in the Madrid Gazette, he would not have known his own language. I had some idea of complaining of this, said Mr. F.—(he was at the time our Minister to Spain)—but I knew it would do no good. Every paper for the Madrid Gazette is prepared under the eye of the Government, with a view to producing an effect.

Mr. ISAACKS signified his acceptance of the modification proposed by Mr. FORSYTH.

Mr. WHEELER said this was a small business. If any call of this kind was to be made at all, he was in favor of going for the whole. The gentleman from Georgia says that speeches are made on presenting credentials at a foreign court, and on taking leave. These are complimentary, of course ; they are considered as hardly official, and he believed were viewed as but of little importance at any time. In the same way, addresses of congratulation and of condolence were made, but they were mere matters of compliment. As, therefore, there seemed to be no bearing, in the papers asked for by the resolution, on any subject likely to come before the House, though the task of opposing the call might be some what invidious, he thought the resolution ought not to pass. Why was this call to go back no further than 1818? Why not sweep the foreign offices clean at once? Why do we want the addresses at taking leave? If the resolution must go to the President, let it at least go in its original form, calling only for those delivered on presentation. He thought the inquiry not worth pursuing, and, under that impression, would move to lay the resolution on the table.

The question being taken, the motion of Mr. WEBSTER prevailed—ayes 75, noes 57.

So the resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

Mission to Panama.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. STEVENSON, of Va., in the chair, on the report of the committee to whom was referred the Message of the President in relation to the Mission to Panama; which report concludes with the following resolution:

“Resolved, That, in the opinion of the House, it is expedient to appropriate the funds necessary to enable the President of the United States to send Ministers to the Congress of Panama.”

Mr. McLANE, of Del., proposed an amendment, which he prefaced by remarking that he preferred deferring the delivering of his views in support of the amendment to another time. He did not offer it with any view of embarrassing the general subject, but from a sense of the duty he owed to himself, and to those who sent him here. He wished that, before he was called to express his sentiments, the committee would so far indulge him as to allow the amendment to be printed: and, in the meanwhile, would rise for that purpose.

The amendment proposed by Mr. McLANE, is as follows:

“It being understood as the opinion of this House, that, as it has always been the settled policy of this Government, in extending our commercial relations with foreign nations, to have with them as little political connection as possible; to preserve peace, commerce, and friendship, with all nations, and to form entangling alliances with none; the Ministers who may be sent shall attend at the said Congress in a diplomatic character merely; and ought not to be authorized to discuss, consider, or consult, upon any proposition of alliance, offensive or defensive, between this country and any of the South American Governments, or any stipulation, compact, or declaration, binding the United States in any way, or to any extent, to resist interference from abroad with the domestic concerns of the aforesaid Governments, or any measure which shall commit the present or future neutral rights or duties of these United States, either as may regard European nations, or between the several States of Mexico and South America.”

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD expressed his assent to this arrangement, though opposed to the amendment.

Mr. FORSYTH said he was very desirous of coming to some understanding with the gentleman who had moved this amendment, so that he might, without embarrassing it, present, at the same time, to the committee, another amendment, which he had prepared, and which better met his views; but he was very loth to offer it as an amendment to the gentleman's amendment, yet did not know how else to get it before the committee consistently with the rules of the House.

The Chairman decided that it could not come before the committee in any other form.

Mr. FORSYTH then read his resolution as follows, and gave notice that, in case that of Mr. McLANE should not prevail he would offer his.

“That, in the opinion of the House, it is expedient to make an appropriation, to enable the President to send Ministers to be present at, but not to become members of, the Congress of the American States at Panama; it being distinctly understood that the said Ministers are to be authorized merely to express to that Congress the deep interest of this country in the security and prosperity of the other American States; to explain, if requested, the principles which govern the United States in their political and commercial intercourse with all foreign nations; to receive and to remit to their own Government any proposition that the whole or any one of the powers represented in Congress may think proper to offer for the consideration of the Government of the United States.”

On motion of Mr. McLANE, the committee then rose, and the House ordered both the resolutions for amendment to be printed.

Penitentiary for District of Columbia.

The House then, on motion of Mr. THOMSON, of Pennsylvania, took up, in Committee of the Whole, the bill providing for the erection of a Penitentiary in the District of Columbia. An amendment was proposed to the bill by Mr. THOMSON, to strike out the whole of the original bill, and insert a new one. This motion was agreed to, and, after some conversation, the bill was reported to the House, and ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

The bill from the Senate, for further regulating the accountability of public officers, next underwent some discussion in Committee of the Whole, where it was supported by Messrs. HAMILTON and TATNALL. It was opposed by Mr. CARY, on the ground of its going to enlarge the patronage of the Executive, and increase, instead of economize, the public expenditure. He failed, however, in successive motions, to amend the bill, and to lay it on the table; and the bill was ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

The House adjourned.

count of the time for the consideration of resolutions having expired, came up as the unfinished business.

On this resolution the debate was farther continued by Messrs. MERRICK, WHITE, and FORSYTH. Mr. WHITE offered a slight amendment, which was accepted by Mr. MERRICK as a modification of his motion; and, after some explanations by Mr. FORSYTH, and observations in complete exculpation of the character of Judge Tate, the question was taken on the resolution, as modified, in the following form:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to this House, such portion of the proceedings of the Judge of the Superior Court of West Florida, acting as Commissioner under the ninth article of the treaty of 22d February, 1819, as relates to the rights of certain persons therein named to the cargoes of the slave vessels, Constitution, Louisa, and Marino; and that he also communicate the amount of the several sums of money, if any, paid to the said claimants respectively; the dates of the payment, and the authority under which they have been made.

Thus modified, the resolution was agreed to. Mr. DRAYTON moved the following:

Resolved, That the constitution be so amended, that, if no candidate for the Presidency of the United States shall receive a majority of the whole number of votes in the primary colleges of electors, that the candidate having the two highest numbers on the list, shall again be voted for in the same manner as at the first ballot; the votes at the second ballot to be counted by States; and that the election for the Vice Presidency of the United States shall, under the same circumstances, mutatis mutandis, be conducted in the same manner, and be regulated by the same principles.

Resolved, That no one who was an elector of the President and Vice President in the primary colleges, shall be eligible as an elector at the second election.

These resolutions were referred to the Select Committee of twenty-four, on the general subject.

The following joint resolution from the Senate was twice read, and, on motion of Mr. COOK, of Illinois, was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—Ayes 62, Nays 59.

"Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both Houses concurring, that the following amendment to the Constitution of the United States be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States; and which, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the States, shall be valid, to all intents and purposes, as part of the said constitution."

"No person who shall have been elected to the office of President of the United States a second time, shall again be eligible to that office."

Mission to Panama.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. STEVENSON, of Virginia, in the chair, on the report of the Committee of Foreign Relations on the Message of the President of the United States, proposing to send Ministers to Panama; which report concludes with a recommendation of the following resolve, viz:

"Resolved, That, in the opinion of the House, it is expedient to appropriate the funds necessary to enable the President of the United States to send Ministers to the Congress of Panama"—

And the amendment offered by Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, yesterday, being under consideration, in the following words:

"It being understood, as the opinion of this House, that, as it has always been the settled policy of this Government, in extending our commercial relations with foreign nations, to have with them as little political connection as possible; to preserve peace, commerce, and friendship, with all nations, and to form entangling alliances with none; the Ministers who may be sent shall attend at the said Congress in a diplomatic character merely; and ought not to be authorized to discuss, consider, or consult upon any proposition of alliance, offensive or defensive, between this country and any of the South American Governments; or any stipulation, compact, or declaration, binding the United States in any way, or to any extent, to resist interference from abroad, with the domestic concerns of the aforesaid Governments; or any measure which shall commit the present or future neutral rights or duties of these United States, either as may regard European nations or between the several States of Mexico and South America."

Mr. McLANE, presuming that the amendment he had offered yesterday was still within his control, desired to modify it, by adding to it the following:

"Leaving the United States free to adopt, in any event which may happen, affecting the relations of the South American Governments with each other, or with foreign nations, such measures as the friendly disposition cherished by the American people, towards the people of those States, and the honor and interests of this nation, may dictate."

In submitting this resolution, Mr. McLANE said he had been actuated by a sense of the duty he owed to himself and to those who had honored him with a seat on this floor. He had endeavored, in wording the resolution, to embrace all those principles which had characterized the policy of the United States from our earliest history; and his great object in offering it, was to preserve that policy unimpaired. He had founded the resolution on principle wholly. He was indifferent what was the phraseology employed, and was ready to submit to any modification which might be proposed, provided it did not impair the force and virtue of the resolution in the preservation of the principles it contained.

The measure to which it related, was one of great importance, and was wholly novel and unprecedented. The manner in which it had been at first presented, the manner in which it had been since conducted, and in which this House had now been called to deliberate upon it, all went to show that it was novel in its character. He did not wish to be understood to say that it was therefore improper or inexpedient; but it was certainly novel, and it was therefore the duty of the House to ponder it well. He considered it as a subject on which the House could not be left too free in its deliberations; no extraneous influence of any kind ought to be brought to bear on its discussion. He did not think that the source from whence it proceeded ought to have the smallest influence; with him it had none; it neither weakened the force of the considerations involved in the measure itself, nor did it in the least strengthen them. He professed to feel, and he did feel, all proper respect to the functionaries of the Government—all that it became him to feel as a member of this House: he did not profess more, nor did he feel any more. He thought it very injudicious to connect with this deliberation any influence of an extrinsic kind. Every proposed measure of the Government should be left to stand on its own basis. If the present measure was to be considered on account of the source from which it proceeded, that source should have had the whole responsibility. But when the Executive throws it off, and submits the measure to this House, it comes here free from all connection with that influence. The members of the House are called to deliberate on it, on their own responsibility. The constitutional responsibility pertains alone to the Executive Department. None other has to do with it as a public measure. If it had originated in the Executive Department, and been carried on by it alone, whatever consequences of good or evil might flow from it, the entire amount of responsibility would devolve on the Executive alone. If, in this case, the Executive had assumed this legitimate and constitutional responsibility—if the President, after the Senate had approved of this mission, had come to this House and asked simply for an appropriation, Mr. McL. would have been willing to grant it with fewer scruples than he now felt; because, then the President would have had the whole responsibility. But the Executive had, he would not say shunned the responsibility, but had not assumed the whole constitutional responsibility which belonged to him. He does in substance say, that although in his judgment, it was proper that Ministers should be sent and should attend this Congress, yet he will not send them unless this House expresses its approbation of the measure, unless we are willing to share the responsibility, and shall say it is right that it should be done. By choosing this course, the President submits the measure to the free determination of Congress. He says he cannot send these Ministers without our approbation, and he therefore submits the plan to our free deliberation. I say I do not censure this course, and I am very sincere in so saying; there is much in the novelty and peculiar character of this measure, which may make it prudent in the Executive to choose such a course; but, when I say this, it is nevertheless true, that the measure is submitted to us, and that we must express an opinion upon it. We cannot recommend the measure without being a party to it. The President asks us not only for money, but for our opinion also. If he had asked for money only, I would give it with less hesitation, but he asks the House to decide on the propriety of the measure. His request is submitted to the Committee of Foreign Affairs, who, after full investigation, recommend a resolution, expressing the opinion of this House in favor of the expediency of the mission.

If I have not entirely mistaken this subject, I think the time has arrived in which this House is called upon to express an opinion upon some of the topics connected with this mission. It is due to ourselves; it is due to the President; it is due to the country, that we should express an opinion. Things which are now floating in the imaginations of gentlemen; which serve to beget various political speculations; to mislead our functionaries abroad; to decorate their arguments, or make a figure in their diplomatic communications, are likely soon to become no unsubstantial pageant. It is time they were brought to some definite form—that they were brought down to our judgments; that we may see what they are, and deal with them as they deserve. Ever since the memorable Message of the late President Monroe, we have seen the misconstructions to which certain parts of that Message have been exposed; we have seen, too, the consequences to which they have led. Those expressions have been seized upon and cherished by our public functionaries; and now we assail them for proceeding on the ground of that language, though we have done nothing to disavow it. If we disapproved the sentiment, or did not intend to adopt it, we ought to have acted before. We ought to have said so when the Message was delivered.

Mr. Chairman, I cannot reconcile myself to the explanation which is given in conversation, and in the language of debate, in another quarter, respecting this Message. It will not do to treat it as a pledge from ourselves to ourselves, or as designed to throw the moral weight of the opinion of this nation into the cause of these Governments. Nor can it be considered as having performed its office, because foreign interference has not hitherto been made. Its efficacy is to be tested when the danger comes; and if it prove unreal, then it will be any thing but moral. What, then, does its language mean? What does it give out? Is it a declaration in terrorem only—to be good if others are alarmed at its sound, and good for nothing if they have the temerity to disregard it? Is it simply a vapor? Or does it contain substance? We say we will not look with indifference on certain attempts of the powers of Europe in respect to South America. The substance of this declaration evidently is, that we are prepared to resist any such attempt. This is either the holding out a threat with the hope that that threat would be sufficient, or it means that we intend to execute the threat, when the time for executing it shall arrive. Is this what is meant? If it is not, the threat should not be made; or if made, should not be recognized. Supposing the crisis should arrive, and this declaration should be understood as meaning resistance: What can we answer? Can we tell these powers, that we meant only to take a moral attitude? That the expression of the President was merely a declaration of our abstract opinions? That it was made without any intention ever to carry it into effect? Sir, I am unwilling to place myself or my country in that attitude.

Mission to Panama.

[H. OF R.]

But the question now assumes a graver character. The resistance implied in that threat, is now to be a matter of formal and public discussion. It is to be discussed at Panama. And we are called on to give an opinion in relation to the expediency of discussing it there. Here is where the subject presses on me. If we were left afloat, it would be another thing: but we are called to act. We cannot avoid it if we would. Could this House, or would it, avoid expressing an opinion upon this topic, if it were now submitted for our legislative action—if we were called on to enable the Executive to carry it into effect? Certainly it could not. It is true the subject is not now brought here for a decision; but it is carried to Panama, and we are to send Ministers there for the express purpose of discussing, arranging, and reducing it to some definite stipulation. It becomes the duty of the House to consider well such a posture of things!

As to the nature of the Congress at Panama, the view I propose at present to take of the general subject, in explanation of my amendment, relieves me from the necessity of any very minute consideration of it, and I have no desire to trouble the House with any unnecessary remarks. I must be permitted to say, (and I am sincere in the declaration,) that I do not concur with the Committee of Foreign Relations in their view of this Congress. I do not mean as to what is to be done there by our Ministers, but as to the intentions of the parties themselves in this Congress. I have no idea that it is to be a mere diplomatic meeting as regards the South American States. I think that the deliberations there are intended to be binding on the parties, without any revision of its decisions, by their respective Governments. I ask, how did that Congress at first originate? The South American States agreed upon it by treaties between each other—it is in those treaties that the powers of this Congress are to be found—and when we consult the treaties, we find that the Congress is the result of a “compact of union, league, and confederation; it is to be charged with cementing, in the most solid and stable manner, the intimate relations which ought to exist between all and every one of the contracting parties; it is to serve as a council in the great conflicts, as a rallying point in the common dangers, as a faithful interpreter of their public treaties when difficulties occur, and as an umpire and conciliator in their disputes and differences. All these objects are to be accomplished by the Congress, not by the parties creating it, and it must necessarily have the power of giving effect to its own decisions. Each party to the Congress must be bound by its acts, as they would be bound by a treaty; for it is by treaty stipulation they have conferred its powers. The very reservations in the treaties with respect to this Congress, is conclusive proof of the view I have advanced. That reservation extends only to their national sovereignty over their municipal affairs, and to their relations with foreign nations, not parties to the Confederation, or Congress. The exercise of these is not to be interrupted by the Congress; but with this exception, there is no limitation upon its powers; as to all other matters, its acts must be recognized as binding; and suppose our Ministers should conclude a treaty with any of the South American States at this Congress, and any difficulty should afterwards arise as to its interpretation, who are to be the arbiters of the dispute? The Congress at Panama.

None will deny that the settled policy of this country has been not only pacific and neutral, but has been to avoid, as far as possible, all participation in the concerns of other powers, all political connections and entangling alliances, and associations not necessary for commercial purposes. It is for the interest and happiness of the people that such a policy should prevail, and it is the duty of the Government to make it prevail. It is the duty of a wise Government to consult the true and permanent interest of the nation over which it is the guardian: it pertains to such a Government not to act under, but to repress all public excitement of this kind, though it be in the main the excess of a good feeling. Public sympathy may be often aroused, and the people under such excitement will eagerly espouse the cause of a suffering nation. In such a crisis, it becomes the Government to keep a steady course of policy, and avoid the surrounding danger. The moment it casts loose from those moorings of fixed and steady principle, we are all afloat and liable to be drawn about by every gust of popular excitement. The neutrality of 1798 was proclaimed by “the Father of his Country” upon this principle: it was an act of the cool but firm moderation of the Government operating on the people; it was the basis of this neutral policy, and was the preservation of the country. The American people was infinitely more excited in behalf of the French Revolution than it is now in the cause of these South American States; and was such as would have carried the nation into a war, but for the wisdom and coolness of the Government. The same was the case with respect to the Greek struggle. It was hailed with acclamation in every part of this country, but the Government moved steadily on and kept down the excess of feeling. The same was the case with regard to the South American States.

This was another case in which the moderation of the Government counteracted and controlled the public excitement. Gentlemen all recollect how slow we were, how cautious and deliberate in acknowledging their independence. This care and caution was the act of the Government, and was considered by some as very censurable. But, in my judgment, it was wise and salutary. So in the present case, it is the duty of the Government—it is the duty of this House to interpose, and to prevent our being hurried into measures incompatible with our fundamental policy. If neutrality is our settled policy, they should have reasons of the strongest and most satisfactory kind, who desire to change it; and I am compelled to say, all that part of the Message which relates to this subject is unsatisfactory to me. I cannot assent to its reasoning. It takes this valedictory address of the Father of his Country as the foundation of our neutral policy. But it was not so. That policy was commensurate with the very existence of the Government, or, if not with its existence, it originated at least as early as '98. That valedictory address did not create the policy. The policy existed already. It was laid in the foundations of the Government. The address only advised the country to continue to adhere to it. The object of the address, I repeat it, was not to originate but to continue this policy. I think its spirit has equally been mistaken. If I have not greatly misunderstood its import, it had no relation to any particular people or particular time, but embraced all time and all people. The great object it had in view was to keep us out of the quarrels of all other nations; to disconnect us from their disputes and broils, whoever and wherever they might be. Its operation would be to leave the country untrammelled, and to preserve to it the right of free deliberation when any crisis should arise which called upon it to act. There may have existed additional and peculiar motives to recommend this policy at that particular time, and in regard to European nations.

Mr. WEBSTER said, that he did not mean at present to do more than to state, in very few words, what he thought of this amendment. When it was moved by the honorable member, looking at it as the effort to better a measure which the honorable member meant to support, and not as a mere operative in debate, he had felt a very sincere disposition to agree to it for one. But it appeared to him impossible to do so, without departing from principle, as well as precedent. It would be, as he thought, to give instructions, by this House, to a foreign Minister. Disguise it as we might, the substance was, "we will agree that the Minister shall go, if we may be allowed to draw his instructions." He would ask two questions: First. Does not the constitutional vest the Executive power in the President? Second. Is not the giving of instructions to Ministers abroad, an exercise of Executive power? Why should we take this responsibility upon ourselves? He denied that the President had devolved, or could devolve, his own constitutional responsibility, or any part of it, on this House. The President had sent the subject to the House for its concurrence, by voting the necessary appropriation. Beyond this, the House was not called on to act. We might refuse the appropriation, if we saw fit. We had the power to do so: but we had not, as he thought, power to make our vote conditional, and to attach instructions to it. There was a way, indeed, in which this House might express, and often ought to express its opinion, in regard to our foreign politics. That is, by resolution. He agreed, entirely, with the gentleman, that, if the House were of opinion that a wrong course was given to our foreign relations, it ought to say so, and to say so by some measure that should affect the whole, and not a part of our diplomatic intercourse. It ought to control all missions, and not one only. There was no reason why the Ministers at Panama should act under these restrictions, which did not equally apply to other diplomatic agents: for example, to our Ministers at Colombia, Mexico, or the other new States. A resolution, expressive of the sense of the House, would, on the contrary, lead to instructions to be given to them all—a resolution, therefore, was the regular mode of proceeding. We saw, for instance, in looking at these documents, that our Government has declared to some of the Governments of Europe—perhaps it has declared to all the principal powers—that we could not consent to the transfer of Cuba to any European power. No doubt the Executive Government can maintain that ground only so long as it receives the approbation and support of Congress. If Congress be of opinion that this course of policy is wrong, then he agreed it was in the power, and he thought, indeed, the duty of Congress to interfere, and to express its dissent. If the amendment now offered prevailed, the declarations, so distinctly made on this point, could not be repeated, under any circumstances, at Panama. But they might, nevertheless, be repeated anywhere, and everywhere else. Therefore, if we dissent from this opinion, that dissent should be declared by resolution; and that would change the whole course of our diplomatic correspondence on that subject, in all places. If any gentleman thinks, therefore, (and such opinions have been expressed,) that we ought to take no measure, under any circumstances, to prevent the transfer of Cuba into the hands of any Government, European or American, let him bring forward his resolution to that effect. If it shall pass, it will effectually prevent the repetition of such declarations as have been made. Mr. W. said he would not continue his observations, holding the floor, at present, only through the courtesy of the honorable member near him, from Virginia. He would recapitulate only his objections to this amendment. It was unprecedented, nothing of the kind having been attempted before. It was, in his opinion, unconstitutional; as it was taking the proper responsibility from the Executive, and exercising, ourselves, a power which, from its nature, belongs to the Executive, and not to us. It was prescribing, by the House, the instructions for a Minister abroad. It was nugatory, as it attached conditions which might be complied with, or might not. And lastly, if gentlemen thought it important to express the sense of the House on these subjects, or any of them, the regular and customary way was by resolution. At present, it seemed to him that we must make the appropriation without conditions, or refuse it. The President had laid the case before us. If our opinion of the character of the meeting, or its objects, led us to withhold the appropriation, we had the power to do so. If we had not so much confidence in the Executive, as to render us willing to trust to the constitutional exercise of the Executive power, we have power to refuse the money. It is a direct question of aye or no. If the Ministers to be sent to Panama may not be trusted to act, like other Ministers, under the instructions of the Executive, they ought not to go at all.

ARIZ., 1826.]

Mission to Panama.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. POWELL addressed the committee to the following effect:

I am in favor, Mr. Chairman, of the proposed mission; and, of course, in favor of the necessary appropriations to carry it into effect; and I will briefly state my reasons. When a diplomatic mission has been recommended by the President, and has received the sanction of the Senate, it ought, according to my theory of the constitution, to be an extreme case, that would warrant or justify this House in refusing means to carry the mission into effect. The President and Senate are charged with the treaty-making power, and the superintendence of the foreign relations of the nation. They possess the means of acquiring all the necessary information, and duty demands that they should exercise this power of knowing the true state of our foreign relations. They are the constitutional judges of the policy and propriety of all foreign missions. If they abuse this power, or use it unwarily, the responsibility rests with them—they must answer to the country. I will not say that occasions would not occur, where, under particular circumstances, it would not be in the power of this House—nay, where it might be their imperative duty to withhold the means of carrying the proposed mission into effect. But such a case ought to be palpable and striking. These principles have been sanctioned, without an exception, within my recollection, from the organization of the Government.

The President has recommended a mission, and nominated Ministers to Panama. The Senate, after long and mature deliberation, has sanctioned the measure. They are responsible for the measure; we are asked for an appropriation to carry this measure into effect. Unless we see distinctly that the happiness or the peace of the nation is to be endangered by this mission, it is our duty to vote for the means. It is not for us to look through the wide range of our foreign relations minutely, to examine how such a measure may operate upon the complicated and various relations we hold with other nations, and to pronounce upon its expediency. This would be a departure from our constitutional sphere, and assuming responsibilities not devolved upon us. It is enough for us to inquire whether this measure hazards the peace, or prostrates the great interests of the nation. If we are not satisfied that such results are probable, we ought to vote for the appropriation.

Before I proceed to examine these questions, I will advert to the policy we have pursued, and the feelings manifested by the people of this country in relation to the South American Republics, from the commencement of their struggle for self-government.

If the United States were capable of acting on selfish and interested motives exclusively—if actuated solely by considerations of national pre-eminence on the American Continent: it is evident our policy would have been to have perpetuated the colonial state of servitude—the moral and political degradation of Spanish America that existed prior to the mighty struggle by which they assumed a rank in the scale of nations. In the then state of our continent, we presented the only effulgent point upon the political and geographic chart. Around us, all was dark, hopeless, wretched, and degraded. The political and moral horizon served only to add lustre to our brightness. Happily for the cause of liberal and enlightened principles, the country that gave them birth indulged no such feelings. We were free and happy ourselves. We were sensible of the blessings of our wise and benign Government. We were not yet sufficiently politically hardened to have become basely selfish. We, at an early period, from the first dawning of hope, rejoiced in their successes, and sympathized in their disasters. Under the influence of these honorable and magnanimous feelings, impelled by public sentiment, at the first moment, consistent with justice to ourselves and good faith to others, this Government, in the year 1822, voted an appropriation of 100,000 dollars to enable the President to recognize a portion of these States as independent, by sending Ministers to them.

We stood foremost, as it became us to do, in recognizing them, in despite of the angry frowns and threatening intimations of Spain. Nay, more, we did this in the very teeth, and in direct opposition to the policy, of the allied sovereigns of Europe. The act was worthy the Government, and in strict accordance with its professions and avowed policy.

Are we prepared, in the face of the world, to admit that this magnanimous act was the result of transient feeling and fleeting enthusiasm? or are we determined to assert it as an act of wisdom, justice, and philanthropy? We have hitherto considered it a subject of honest pride, that we led the way, and marked the road, to the extension of liberal and enlightened principles. We have believed that we had given the first great impulse to the principle of self-government, as belonging to enlightened man.

But it may be said, that topics are to be there discussed, and subjects to be proposed for negotiation, that may endanger the peace and compromise the high interests of the nation. It strikes me, Mr. Chairman, as a novel doctrine in diplomacy—that a nation is to abstain from negotiating for the security and advancement of its interests, because subjects may be discussed, and measures proposed for adoption, inconsistent with neutral relations, and subversive of its interests. Did the United States violate its neutrality in the year 1798, by the subjects discussed and the proposal made in our special message to France—the history of which mission is familiar to every gentleman on this floor? Should we have violated our neutral relations, during the late European wars, by any proposition made to this Government, or to its envoys abroad, to take part in the war, and the discussion of such proposition, resulting in its rejection? I presume this will hardly be contended. It is not the propositions made or discussed between Ministers, that violate neutral relations; it is the result of such discussions alone, that can have that effect. If we have legitimate objects to attain, by a mission to Panama, we neither endanger our peace, subvert our interests, nor violate our neutrality.

Is not this mission demanded by high and important considerations, bearing directly upon the special interests of the Union? In my humble opinion, it would have been a criminal dereliction of duty, on the part of the Executive, to have declined the mission. I will proceed to present some of the objects of deep interest, inviting the vigilant attention of this Government, connected with the Congress at Panama. These Southern Republics having a population of thirty millions, abounding in all the means and resources of power—Mexico alone covering upon the map almost as much space as the United States, and bordering upon our southern frontier—are bound together by common feelings, common interests, and by solemn treaties, offensive and defensive. Can we shut our eyes upon the period when, in the course of human events, collisions of interests, and jarings of policy, may place us at issue with some or all of them? Do we derive from these considerations, no motive to meet them in discussion, upon subjects connected with our present and future relations with them? May not the present occasion, if judiciously employed, result in the adjustment of a uniform commercial policy, upon a fixed basis, that may postpone, if not entirely prevent, collision on this fruitful subject of war? If the aid of our advice and experience can improve the political or moral condition of the Southern States, are we not bound, in reference to our own interests, to afford them the aid of both? May not our Ministers, by argument or persuasion, exert a powerful influence in preventing schemes being devised and matured, detrimental to our interests both commercial and political? These general considerations, would of themselves afford an adequate motive, to my mind, for the mission. There are some specific objects, however, in which we have a deep interest, that will form subjects of discussion in the Congress. The documents before us disclose a fixed purpose, on the part of the Southern Republics, to assail Spain, through Cuba and Porto Rico. This purpose has only been delayed at our earnest solicitation, and the subject is for discussion at the proposed Congress.

I presume there can be but one sentiment upon this subject in this Union. It is demanded of this Government, by every consideration of self-preservation—the great law of nature, and paramount to all other law—by our interests, and by humanity, not to suffer the present condition of Cuba to be altered. If this island is revolutionized, and they are separated from the Spanish Government, what are to be the consequences? Another St. Domingo tragedy is to be acted over again. The power goes into the hands of the black population, at the sacrifice and extermination of the whites. Anarchy, confiscation, and confusion ensues. An export trade of sixty millions, in which we have a deep stake, is annihilated. The commerce of this country receives a deep and lasting wound. I will not pretend to fancy a picture of the effects of such an event upon the safety and tranquillity of the slave-holding States bordering on the Atlantic. Are these States prepared to tolerate another Hayti, almost at their threshold? I answer, as a Representative of a slave-holding State, No. Again, look to the position of Cuba, in relation to the Gulf of Mexico, the mouth of the Mississippi, and the rivers to the east, emptying into the Gulf. Whether conquered by the Southern Republics, and held for their joint concern, or conquered by any strong naval power in Europe, it would afford the means of sealing up the commerce of one-third of the territory of this Union. I ask this committee, I appeal especially to the gentlemen of the Valley of the Mississippi, to say whether they are disposed quietly to acquiesce either in the emancipation of this island, with its present population, or to the more probable event—its conquest by the Southern Republics upon joint concern? In the hands of any strong naval power, especially in the hands of the leagued Republics, it is destined to be the apple of discord to this country. Is not the mission to Panama, in relation to this subject alone, necessary—nay, is it not absolutely demanded by a due regard to our safety and interests? At that Congress this matter is to be discussed and settled. Ought not the voice of this nation there to be heard, employing, first, argument and persuasion, to divert them from their purpose? If these means fail, solemn protest; and, if this be ineffectual to stay them, the time will then have arrived for us to act. The present state of our negotiations with Mexico, furnishes another argument in favor of this mission. A discrepancy in the basis upon which our commercial relations with her Southern neighbors is to stand, would be deeply to be deplored, and must necessarily lead to unpleasant and perplexing results. The Congress at Panama affords the most promising opportunity of attaining the object of uniformity as well as reciprocity. Backed, as we shall be, by those with whom we have concluded commercial arrangements, it is hardly credible that Mexico will still adhere to a principle, to us inadmissible, and not insisted upon by any other party. There are many other objects of interest to this nation, that might be enumerated. I have, however, presented enough to satisfy every dispassionate man, that this mission is demanded by sound policy. I have examined this subject with anxiety, to come to a just conclusion—an anxiety proportioned to the appalling admonitions of threatening danger and ruin, that we have heard from another quarter. I have come to an honest and dispassionate conclusion, to vote for the mission. Whether, this conclusion be wise or not, time will determine. If it should lead to entangling alliances with the nations of this continent or elsewhere, I shall deplore the error of my judgment. But, if such should be the result, the vigilance of the Senate must slumber—upon them will rest the responsibility. They hold the corrective and preventive power. This much is certain—the authors of such a policy will be hurled from their high places, and consigned, by an indignant people, to a just reprobation.

One word more as to the amendment of my friend from Delaware. I respond, Mr. Chairman, to almost every sentiment in that amendment; and, if it can be so modified as to meet my entire views, I shall hereafter be prepared to give it my decided vote: for it will be recollected that, only a few days ago, I explicitly declared that I was opposed to every thing in the shape of a pledge. I will not consent to give such a pledge, either in reference to my own country, or to the Southern Republics themselves. But, at the same time, unless circumstances shall produce an important change, whenever any of the powerful nations of Europe shall attempt to seize upon Mexico, I am disposed not to view such an attempt with indifference, and I will use my utmost influence to rouse the nation, in such a case, to interpose our military power. I will never suffer Mexico to be seized by any power of Europe, immediately under my observation, without making an effort to prevent it.

WEDNESDAY, April 5.

Mission to Panama.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. STEVENSON, of Virginia, in the chair, on the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations, which concludes with a resolution proposing to send Ministers to Panama; the amendment offered by Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, being also under consideration.

Vol. IX.—7

When the measure recommended by the Committee on Foreign Affairs was first announced by the President, in his message to Congress, Mr. WICKLIFFE said, like many others, not understanding the precise character of the Congress, its powers, and tendency, and probable consequences to this country, his first impressions were favorable to it. We were told by the President that, "among the measures which have been suggested to them by the new relations with one another, resulting from the recent changes in their condition, is that of assembling, at the Isthmus of Panama, a Congress, at which each of them should be represented, to deliberate upon subjects important to the welfare of all. The Republics of Colombia, of Mexico, and of Central America, have already deputed Plenipotentiaries to such a meeting, and they have invited the United States to be also represented there by their Ministers. The invitation has been accepted, and Ministers on the part of the United States will be commissioned to attend at those deliberations," &c., &c. The Message, upon every other topic, connected with our relations, whether foreign or domestic, was lucid and able. Upon this subject, all must admit it to be deficient. It did not specifically define the nature and character of this Congress, its powers, and mode of action. The people of the United States, ever alive to the success of liberty, in whatever clime or country she struggles; and believing this measure calculated to promote and cheer its success, without jeopardizing her abode in this her own land, saw no cause to oppose this measure. He said he himself had viewed it, at first, in that aspect. He had considered it merely a meeting of diplomatic agents. He had not read the treaties which created it; and, as a measure of the Administration, having for its objects, diplomatic results, he had not condemned it. But, when documents, connected with this subject, had been submitted to our inspection, and been carefully examined by him, his first impressions had been changed. He had examined the Message of the President and the documents which accompanied it, with as sincere a desire to lend the sanction of his judgment to the measure, as ever did poor sinner read the pages of Revelation, to fix and confirm his faith. He was unable to succeed. And the more he examined the question, and stripped it of that mask which is incident to diplomacy, the more he became convinced of the dangerous tendency of some of the objects contemplated by this Congress, connected with our own immediate and future interests. And if, in the opinion of any one, he should fall under the dreadful denunciation of having united himself with the "unprincipled faction," in this, or the other House, to thwart the just measures of the Administration, he should appeal to the enlightened judgments of his constituents, to whom he was accountable for all his acts here, to ask them, upon an impartial review of his past life, to pronounce upon his course. With them, he knew he should meet with a liberal indulgence; and if they, upon examination of all the documents, disapproved the course he had pursued, he felt satisfied they would award to him honesty of purpose, and a devotedness to the political institutions of our common country.

Since the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. McLANE) had submitted his amendment, and favored the committee with his views and reasons for so doing, Mr. WICKLIFFE said he felt himself relieved from much of that dread responsibility which he had before assumed. He was pleased to find his views of this subject in concert with those of that gentleman, so distinguished for his talents, and so justly entitled to, and enjoying, the confidence of this House.

This committee is called upon to give an expression of its opinion as to the expediency of the mission. It is called upon to do this, not by the report and resolution upon your table alone, but by the President himself, in his Message to this and the other House. With the understanding of this House, expressed by its vote, as is contained in the amendment of the gentleman from Delaware, he thought the mission expedient: without it he deemed it inexpedient, and fraught with danger. If it should be thought by this committee, as has been asserted by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. WEBSTER,) and the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. POWELL,) that the amendment interferes with the constitutional power of the Executive Department, over the foreign relations of the country; so far as there may be any interference, it has been invited by the Executive himself, and now imposed upon us, by the original resolution of the committee. We are called upon by the committee to say, that this mission is expedient. Suppose that a majority of this House shall say that they do believe it inexpedient: for if they have a right to vote that it is expedient, they certainly have the right to vote that it is inexpedient. The one is no more an interference with the Executive power than the other: and if we have a right to vote that it is inexpedient in toto, we certainly have a right to say, for some of the objects contemplated, it is expedient; for others, that it is not. But, sir, I must express my unqualified dissent to the doctrine of both the gentlemen: a doctrine long since exploded from the politics of this House, and which, if I am not mistaken, received its vital stab some twenty-six years ago; and I am against its resuscitation now.

I hold it to be within the power of this House; it is its duty upon all fit occasions, to pronounce the judgment of the people upon measures, perfected or contemplated, touching the foreign relations of the United States: more especially upon a measure which contemplates a radical change—an inroad upon the long-established and settled policy of this Government: for such, I believe in my soul, the present one to be.

The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. WEBSTER) told us upon yesterday, that to the amendments of the gentleman from Delaware he could see no objection, so far as it might be proper to express our opinion, but that he thought it improper to annex it, by way of amendment, to the resolution of the committee.

[Mr. WEBSTER explained. He had said, that, in the greater part of the sentiments contained in the amendment, he entirely concurred; but there were some positions in it to which he had decisive objections.]

Mr. WICKLIFFE proceeded. I was not disposed to misunderstand the gentleman; and as he did not, yesterday, apprise us of any particular portion of the resolution to which he objected, I understood him as assenting to the whole. He does not now say to what "portions of it he has decided objections." [Mr. WEBSTER here farther explained. With respect to the general tone of the remarks of the gentleman from Delaware, on the wisdom of maintaining a neutral policy, or the impropriety of departing from it, he entirely concurred; but the adoption of the amendment in any form, would go to change the whole course of our diplomacy, and particularly to affect one subject of vital interest to the country—he meant the policy of the United States with respect to Cuba. The amendment is entirely adverse to the ground taken by the American Government on that subject, not only in their correspondence with the South American Governments, but also with the courts of Europe. The amendment says that no subject shall be discussed, which may, in any wise, commit our neutral relations. How, then, can this declaration of ours, respecting Cuba—I mean the declaration that we cannot without indifference, see that island pass into the hands of any other power than Spain—be discussed, if this amendment prevails? It is with that part of the amendment that I do not concur.]

Mr. WICKLIFFE resumed. Sir, this remark of the gentleman did not escape my attention yesterday, and I do not mean that it shall to-day. When I said that the gentleman from Massachusetts acquiesced in the sentiments of the amendment, I referred more particularly to that part of it which declares that our Ministers who may be commissioned to attend the Congress at Panama, ought not to be authorized to discuss, consider, or consult, upon any proposition of alliance, offensive or defensive, between this country and any of the Spanish American Governments, or any stipulation, compact, or declaration, binding the United States, in any way, or to any extent, to resist interference from abroad with the domestic concerns of the aforesaid Governments. I do not understand him as avowing his dissent to this portion of the resolution. I do not believe there is a Representative upon this floor who is bold enough to avow his wish to the world, that these subjects shall be discussed, considered, and the alliance formed. If it is not proper to form the alliance, why entertain a discussion? If the gentleman from Massachusetts desires to leave our Ministers free to discuss the subject of the contemplated invasion, or probable transfer of Cuba—and the amendment, in his judgment, precludes the consideration of that topic—we will assent to any modification of it, so that you keep us free from the other subjects; whenever it is proper to discuss them, here, in this House, is the proper place.

Again: the gentleman says, it is unconstitutional for this House to interfere in this form with the Executive powers of the Government. I would ask him whether this House has never, on any former occasion, expressed its opinion with regard to our foreign relations? Whether it never proceeded so far as to go ahead of the Executive Department? And when I speak of the Executive Department, in reference to our foreign relations, I wish to be understood as including the Senate as a very important portion of that department. Upon this, as upon all other matters, I regard them as the sentinels placed upon the watch towers of State sovereignty, out of whom I do not believe there can be formed an "unprincipled faction." Did not the gentleman himself call upon the last Congress, by resolution, to express its opinion upon the course the Executive ought to pursue toward the Greeks, who were struggling for the establishment of civil and religious liberty? The history of the proceedings of this House in reference to the South American Republics, in reference to this very mission, furnishes ample authority for the propriety of the present course.

To the final and permanent success of the revolution in the Spanish Colonies, this Confederate Congress of belligerent nations was necessary and proper. With the objects contemplated to be attained by it, the United States, as a neutral power, had nothing to do. And hence we find that, in all the treaties between those different Republics creating this Congress and defining its powers, there is no provision made or contemplated for the participation of the United States in its deliberations. It is true that, as early as May, 1823, we seemed to have received some unofficial intimation that we were to be called upon to preside at this Congress; but not until after the Message of President Monroe, of 1823, had superinduced the belief, in some of these Republics, that the United States "had pledged themselves to make cause with them in case any other power, united with Spain, should attempt to interfere with their independence or form of Government," do we hear of any determination, officially, to invite us to take part (not "to preside") in the deliberations of this Congress.

I will not stop here to inquire how our Cabinet at home, or its functionaries abroad, have countenanced the idea that this nation had so pledged itself; but I am warranted in saying that Mr. Poinsett, our Minister near Mexico, has, in his official language, contributed much toward that impression, and I am unable to find that the language which he had thus held has been disapproved by the Executive. The invitation is now given and accepted, and it ought not to escape the attention of this committee, that the invitation has only been given by three of those Republics, whose Representatives are expected to compose this Congress. Given by a minority of those States, what is to be the result, if the other Republics, who have not invited us to this political banquet, shall object to our Ministers taking their seats at this national board? Would it not have been better to have waited until we were invited by at least a majority, if not all of these nations? No, sir; we have displayed an eagerness, and an impatience, in the acceptance of this partial invitation, as if we were afraid that it might be withdrawn. We have determined to go there, blind-folded, as invited guests, for our conduct to be regulated by "modes of action," of which we know nothing, and about which we, in all probability, never will know any thing. We were invited, sir, because of a belief by these nations, that we stood pledged to make common cause with them, if the contingency happened; and but for this belief, we should not have been thus honored, and, as some suppose, complimented, by the invitation.

Mr. Chairman, as the friends of this measure all unite in the opinion, that any alliance would be an impolitic and a dangerous departure from that system of neutral and safe policy which has been so long and happily pursued by this Government, and conducted us to such prosperous results: I entreat them to unite with us, and, by our unanimous vote, let us relieve the Cabinet from what I believe to be a most embarrassing condition.

Whatever may be our notions of this memorable pledge, "this pledge to ourselves," the Spanish American States understand and believe us committed upon the subject. They understand, from the nature of their invitation and of our acceptance, that the President sends his Ministers there "specially instructed" upon these subjects. It is our duty to them, we owe it to ourselves, to undeceive them; and how can we do it more appropriately, more respectfully, and more effectively, than by adopting the amendment?

If we vote that this mission is expedient, without the declaration contained in the amendment, we stand committed. It is no longer a declaration of our President; it remains no longer "a pledge to ourselves;" our fate, at least our honor, is on board this Spanish vessel of State. But one of my colleagues, (Mr. F. JOHNSON,) the other day, expressed the hope that we should never have a President and an Administration, who would be unwilling to redeem this pledge. He triumphantly asked us, if we are prepared to back out? Do we seek to withdraw a pledge we have given? To this I have but one answer—Leave the Government of the United States free to act. And whenever the war-making power shall say the time has come when it becomes us, as a free nation, to unsheath our sword, buckle on our armor, and to defend our liberties and free institutions, he will find in those who oppose this measure as much moral, political, and physical courage, when dangers press, as belong to its advocates.

We will suppose the occasion to have occurred; we will imagine that Spain has prevailed upon the sympathies of France, and that a French fleet and army were upon the shores of our sister Republics, for the avowed determination of re-conquering those States, and to reduce them to their former condition as colonies. In the language of Mr. Salazar, we will suppose the casus fœderis to have occurred. I put it to gentlemen—I put it to my colleague to say, if he would now declare war in defence of South American liberty?

Upon a question involving such consequences, I would pause. I would consult the judgments of the men who may be called upon to traverse the burning regions of that country, and, in the language of Mr. Poinsett, “who are to bear the brunt of the contest;” upon that judgment I could more safely rest than upon the heated excitement of politicians, who have caught what has been appropriately termed “the South American fever.”

I will not detain the committee with noticing the other topics, suggested by the Spanish commissioners as fit subjects for the deliberations and determinations of this Congress, save one or two, and these also have mingled themselves with the views of the Executive. They propose to settle some principles, or, in other words, to change some principles of international law. I do not profess to be a civilian, yet it occurs to me to be rather an extraordinary body to adjust, change, or alter, the known and settled law of nations. The people of a portion of the world, containing a population of some thirty or forty millions of inhabitants, (and the greater portion of them just emerging from a state of the most wretched and oppressed colonization,) propose to settle, adjust, and to alter, the law of nations—that law, which alike must govern and regulate all civilized States!

Again: the political condition of Hayti is also to form the subject of discussion, and is to be settled. That is a question for our Government to settle; and, should this House ever be called upon by this, or any other President, for an outfit and salary of a Minister to this sable independent Government, you will then find more advocates for the constitutional power of this House over the subject of our foreign relations, than have been, or will be found, on the present occasion. Whether the Spanish American States will or will not hail the inhabitants of this ill-fated isle as a free and independent nation, cannot, must not, direct or regulate our course. We have no right to say to those nations “it is not fit and proper for you to recognize the national existence and independence of this island.” The principle of universal emancipation, upon which they have proclaimed their Republics to be based, forbid them the right to distinguish the sable inhabitants of St. Domingo from the less dark republicans of their own clime.

We have a more full and explicit exposé of the objects of this Congress, given officially by the Government of Colombia to the world. I will read them to the committee:

1. To form a solemn compact, or league, by which the States whose Representatives are present, will be bound to unite in prosecuting the war against their common enemy, Old Spain, or against any other power which shall assist Spain in her hostile designs, or any otherwise assume the attitude of an enemy.
2. To draw up and publish a manifesto, setting forth to the world the justice of their cause, and the relations they desire to hold with other Christian powers.
3. To form a convention of navigation and commerce, applicable to both the confederated States, and to their allies.
4. To consider the expediency of combining the forces of the Republics to free the islands of Puerto Rico and Cuba from the yoke of Spain, and, in such case, what contingent each ought to contribute for this end.
5. To take measures for joining in a prosecution of the war at sea, and on the coast of Spain.
6. To determine whether those measures shall also be extended to the Canary and Philippine Islands.
7. To take into consideration the means of making effectual the declaration of the President of the United States, respecting any ulterior designs of any foreign power to colonize any portion of this continent; and also the means of resisting all interference from abroad with the domestic concerns of the American Governments.
8. To settle, by common consent, the principles of those rights of nations, which are, in their nature, controvertible.
10. To determine on what footing shall be placed, the political and commercial relations of those portions of our hemisphere, which have obtained, or shall obtain, their independence, but whose independence has not been recognized by any American or European power, as was, for many years, the case with Hayti.

A word or two upon this principle of colonization—this “intercontinental law, in relations of Europe and America.” This is a subject, admitted by the President himself, as being proper to be discussed and settled there. What is it? We will not permit any European colony to be established upon any part of the American continent. I will not stop to examine the correctness of this principle in the abstract, or in connection with the claims asserted by certain European powers to portions of this continent. I will only consider it in that light in which the President has presented it to us. In his Message, he remarks, “Should it be deemed advisable to contract any conventional engagement on this topic, our views would extend no further than a mutual pledge of the parties to the compact to maintain the principle in application to its own territory, and to permit no colonial lodgements or establishments of European jurisdiction upon its own soil."

Can this be necessary? Why should we be called upon to stipulate by treaty that we will not suffer our own soil to be invaded; to be occupied by a European power; to be colonized? We need no paper stipulations upon such a subject. We have a stronger guarantee than all the parchment the South can give us: it is that devotion to liberty and self-government which is felt and seen by our citizens. For the honor and character of my country, I would not enter into such a stipulation with any power.

Mr. WOOD, of New York, next rose, and said:

Mr. Chairman: I think that those gentlemen who, some time past, have been so apprehensive of the power of the President, as to have had their slumbers disturbed, will, hereafter, repose in peace: as he is in a fair way of being stripped of his powers.

What is the resolution now before us, but instructions, or semi-instructions, for our Ministers that are to go to the Congress of Panama? If the House of Representatives have a right to instruct, certainly the Senate, who share with the President in the treaty-making power, have as good a right; and no one will deny the right to the President. I beg to know how our Ministers are to conduct with three sets of instructions in their pockets. The House of Representatives instruct them to look on, and to inform their Government, from time to time, what is going on; the Senate instruct them to take their residence ten leagues from the Congress, and to have no communication with them but by couriers; and the President instructs them to enter into any agreement beneficial to this country, that will not compromise its neutrality. The Ministers, under the President's instructions, make a treaty, in which the benevolent and grand idea of Henry the Fourth of France is realized, by the erection of a board of Ministers, who shall be the umpire of all differences which shall ever occur to disturb the peace of the several States of Spanish America and the United States, so as forever to prevent the existence of war between them; that inhibits privateering in case of war between the parties; that restricts the list of contraband to munitions of war; that restricts blockades to places invested by a competent force; and regulates the exercise of the right of search, so as to render it as harmless as possible.

The Ministers return with the treaty, the most beneficial for the country and humanity that was ever formed. They have, however, acted contrary to the instructions of the House of Representatives. If the House have a right to instruct, they have a right to impeach the Ministers for disobedience to their instructions. They, therefore, institute an impeachment. Now, sir, I beg to know on what ground the Senate are to sustain the impeachment? I shall leave it to the gentlemen who propose or advocate these Congressional instructions, to explain how the subject may be relieved from embarrassment.

I have given this view of the subject to show that an attempt to instruct our Ministers is an interference with the powers and duties of the Executive. By the second section of the second article of the constitution, the President has "power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur." The constitution has not conferred upon the House of Representatives any participation in the treaty-making power. This subject was examined and settled in the Congress of 1796. The House of Representatives was dissatisfied with the treaty formed with Great Britain, and requested the President to furnish them with a copy of the instructions of the Minister who negotiated it. General Washington, in assigning his reasons for refusing to comply with the request, states, that, "having been a member of the General Convention, and knowing the principles on which the constitution was formed, I have ever entertained but one opinion on this subject; and, from the first establishment of the Government to this moment, my conduct has exemplified that opinion: that the power of making treaties is exclusively vested in the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and that every treaty, so made and promulgated, thenceforward became the law of the land. It is thus that the treaty-making power has been understood by foreign nations; and, in all the treaties made with them, we have declared, and they have believed, that, when ratified by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, they became obligatory. In this construction of the constitution, every House of Representatives has heretofore acquiesced, and, until the present time, not a doubt or suspicion has appeared, to my knowledge, that this construction was not the true one. Nay, they have more than acquiesced; for, till now, without controverting the obligation of such treaties, they have made all the requisite provisions for carrying them into effect." And, in conclusion, he adds: "As, therefore, it is perfectly clear to my understanding, that the assent of the House of Representatives is not necessary to the validity of a treaty; as the treaty with Great Britain exhibits within itself all the objects requiring legislative provision; and, on these, the papers called for can throw no light; and, as it is essential to the due administration of the Government that the boundaries fixed by the constitution, between the different departments, should be preserved, a just regard to the constitution, and to the duty of my office, under all the circumstances of this case, forbid a compliance with your request."

After this, the House of Representatives expressed their sense on this subject by two resolutions, the first of which is in the following terms:

"Resolved, That it being declared, by the second section of the second article of the constitution, 'That the President shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur,' the House of Representatives do not claim any agency in making treaties; but that, when a treaty stipulates regulations on any of the subjects submitted by the constitution to the power of Congress, it must depend for its execution, as to such stipulations, on a law or laws to be passed by Congress; and it is the constitutional right and duty of the House of Representatives, in all such cases, to deliberate on the expediency or inexpediency of carrying such treaty into effect, and to determine and act thereon, as, in their judgment, may be most conducive to the public good."

Thus, it is evident that I am fully sustained in my construction of the constitution, both by President Washington and the House of Representatives of 1796, after a full discussion of the subject.

The resolution before the committee ought not, therefore, to be coupled with conditions which we have no right to make, and which, if they were calculated to have any effect, it would be to assume the responsibility which the constitution has imposed upon the Executive. Instructions might, on the same principle, be annexed to the salary of every public officer. If it were necessary, I should have no objection, at a proper time, and disconnected with this appropriation, to express an opinion upon the subject of our foreign policy; and I have embodied an opinion, in the form of a resolution, to that effect, but this is not the proper time to make a proposition of that nature.

Mr. CARSON, of North Carolina, then addressed the committee, and said: It will be recollected, Mr. Chairman, that when this measure was introduced into the House by a communication from the Executive, the whole subject was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. That committee have had it under consideration; and the result of their labors is before us, in an elaborate and argumentative report. I am well aware that, when a committee of this House have had an important subject under their deliberation, and have presented to the House a report upon it, such report is entitled to great consideration, and ought to have its full weight with every member of this body. But, while I am perfectly aware of this, I also hold that such a report is not of binding force; and that every member is still left free to think and to act, as his views of duty may call him. Under these circumstances, I hope I shall have the pardon of the honorable committee for differing from them, as to the conclusions to which they have come—believing that the premises from which they are drawn have been wholly mistaken. To show this, is my chief design in addressing the committee. I say, then, that the grounds on which some of the principal reasons which the committee have urged, to show the importance of carrying this mission into effect, have been mistaken by the committee themselves. Should I succeed in showing this, I shall consider myself as having done much: for the basis on which their conclusions rest having been torn away, the whole superstructure of their argument must necessarily fall to the ground.

We are told by the committee, "that it is important to be represented at Panama, for the purpose of discussing and negotiating matters of deep concern to this nation, as regards our political and commercial interests with the South American Republics; and that it will be more convenient to treat with all those powers collectively, and at the same time, than it will, considering their geographical disconnection, to negotiate treaties separately." In taking this position, the committee must assume the ground, that the Plenipotentiaries of these Republics will be clothed with powers to negotiate those treaties, which are to be of so much importance to our political and commercial concerns. Here, sir, is where we differ—and this is the point in which I insist the committee have mistaken the ground from which they argue. I maintain that, however desirable this object may be, and however important to our commercial interests, the Plenipotentiaries who are to meet our Ministers at Panama, can negotiate no such treaties: and for this plain reason, that such powers are not only not given, but are expressly prohibited to them; and this by the very article of the treaty which the committee have quoted in their report, as furnishing reasons in favor of the mission. The words of prohibition are the very words which immediately follow the words quoted by the committee, and are necessary to fill up the sentence. Yes, sir: it is an extraordinary fact, that the committee have cited just such words in the treaty, as will justify their reasoning in favor of the mission, and have left out the words which immediately follow, and which must overturn all their arguments. Hence I say, sir, that they are mistaken in their premises, (which they take from the words of the treaties,) and consequently mistaken in all their conclusions from those premises.

Not, sir, that I am disposed to charge that honorable committee with intentional error; that is as far from my purpose as perhaps it is unwarranted by the fact. Now, sir, to the words of the treaties, and to the quotations in the report: let us compare them.

In the report they say, "that it is an assembly of diplomatic agents, clothed with no powers, except to discuss and negotiate; deputed by Governments whose institutions require, that all engagements with foreign powers should be subject to the ratification of some organic body at home." And the more effectually to guard against mistake, even of the de- sign in which this Congress has been proposed, it is stipulated, in the several treaties formed by Colombia with the other new Republics, that the meeting at Panama (now, sir, here follow the words as quoted from the treaties just mentioned) "shall not affect in any manner the exercise of the national sovereignty, in regard to their laws, and the establishment and form of their respective Governments." And here the committee stop short. But what follows, in the treaty? This, sir: "NOR SHALL DO NOTHING, AS REGARDS OUR RELATIONS WITH ANY OTHER FOREIGN NATION."

Now, sir, if those Plenipotentiaries can "do nothing as regards their foreign relations," how is it possible that our Plenipotentiaries can "discuss and negotiate treaties with them, in regard to our political and commercial interests?" Sir, they cannot; and however desirable and important it may be to us, to establish a commercial intercourse with those Republics, and however ample and full the powers with which our Ministers may be clothed, to effect this object, it will be impossible for them to effect it there, because the Plenipotentiaries on the part of those Republics, are expressly prohibited, by all the treaties between those Republics, (all, at least, which have been laid before us,) from doing any thing, as regards their relations with foreign nations. Then, sir, if this object cannot be effected, (which appears to have been the most important consideration with the committee in recommending the mission,) why send Ministers to Panama?

I repeat it again, Mr. Chairman, there is nothing more clear, nothing more obvious, than that those Plenipotentiaries can enter into no negotiation on behalf of their different Governments, as regards their relations with foreign nations. How, then, is the object, thought of so much consequence by the committee, to be accomplished? How are we to make treaties with Plenipotentiaries who are forbidden to make any?

To prove, sir, that this object cannot be effected at the Congress of Panama, permit me to read the article of the treaty between Colombia and Chili, which is precisely the same as in all the other treaties before us, and the very article, too, quoted by the committee, (not in extenso, sir, but just so far as to leave justifiable ground for their conclusion from the part cited.) It reads as follows: Article 64. "This compact of union, league, and confederation, shall in no wise interrupt the exercise of the national sovereignty of each of the contracting parties, as well as to what regards their laws, and the establishment and form of their respective Governments, as to what regards their relations with other foreign nations." These latter are the words omitted by the committee, and the words which defeat the object of negotiating a treaty with those powers, as regards our political and commercial concerns; for each of these powers has reserved the right to establish such relations with foreign nations, as may best suit its individual interest.

Seeing, then, that this object cannot be attained at Panama, the question arises: What objects are to be attained by sending Ministers to that Congress? None, sir; in my opinion, none; none, at least, that will be beneficial to the interests of the United States. On the contrary, much may be done to injure, if not to ruin, our political prospects.

Besides, let me ask, should we send our Ministers to this Congress, in what capacity and with what powers are they to attend the deliberations that may be held? Surely, sir, they must enter it clothed with the same powers which the Plenipotentiaries on the part of the other States are clothed with. It is idle to tell me that the Representatives of different nations would meet there clothed with different powers and for different purposes; if so, what could they effect? No, sir: they meet there from their respective nations, just as we meet here from our respective districts; all equal, and upon the same footing.

And where are we to look for the powers they are to possess? Why, sir, I would have said, to the treaties between those States; but I am here met at the threshold by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. Wood,) who tells us that the powers of these Plenipotentiaries are not derived from those treaties, but from their own instructions, with which we are not acquainted. But, sir, if their powers are not to be found in these treaties, then am I thrown upon the wide world for conjecture. But, sir, I shall, with great deference for that gentleman, assume the contrary ground, and say that they have no powers, except those only which are given them by these treaties; for it is clearly correct to say, that the power which creates, gives to the creature whatever power it possesses. This admitted, I ask where is the power which created this Congress, and established the rules by which these Plenipotentiaries are to act and to be governed? These treaties are the power. The Congress has no other creator. And here let me invite the attention of the committee to the 12th, 13th, and 14th articles of the treaty between Colombia and Chili, where the first mention of this assembly is to be seen; (and there are correspondent articles in all the other treaties before us.)

Article 12. "To draw more closely the bonds which ought, in future, to unite both States, and to remove any difficulty which may present itself, or interrupt, in any manner, their good correspondence and harmony, an Assembly (here, sir, is the origin) shall be formed, composed of two Plenipotentiaries for each party, in the same terms and with the same formalities, which, in conformity to established usages, ought to be observed for the appointment of the Ministers of equal class near the Governments of foreign nations."

Article 13. "Both parties oblige themselves to interpose their good offices with the Governments of the other States of America, formerly Spanish, to enter into this compact of union, league, and confederation."

Yea, sir, and they have not confined themselves to the Spanish American States only: but are "interposing their good offices," "to induce us to enter into this compact of union, league, and confederation."

And what is to be done by the Ministers at this meeting? We find the answer in the next article:

Article 14. "As soon as the great object has been attained, a General Assembly of the American States shall be convened, composed of their Plenipotentiaries, with the charge of cementing, in the most solid manner, the intimate relations which ought to exist between every one of them; and who may serve as a council in the great conflicts, as a rallying point in the common dangers, as a faithful interpreter of their public treaties when difficulties occur, and as an umpire and conciliator in their disputes and differences."

This, sir, is what the Plenipotentiaries will have to do when they meet at Panama; for these treaties are their charter—the constitution which is to govern their acts, as our Federal constitution governs ours. So that, if we send our Ministers there, they too must be "charged with cementing, in the most solid and stable manner, those intimate relations which are to exist between them." We, too, sir, must assist in forging out those "bonds which are to bind them together in this compact of union, league, and confederation;" and, if we assist in forging out these bonds, we must become one incorporate, and bound by them: (unless, indeed, we send our Plenipotentiaries there, only to shake hands with the Plenipotentiaries of these nations, and to say to them, We wish you well—good bye; and this, he suspected, would be nearly the amount of what we should be able to accomplish so far as respects our commercial interests.) But, if we are to be bound by these ties, what shall we have done? We shall have entered into an alliance—"an entangling alliance." And should Old Spain ever attempt to reconquer her colonies, or should any other power attempt to sever their union, then shall we be bound to step forward and defend them; and, in the memorable language of Cæsar, when he entered the conspiracy against Cæsar, the United States must "set her foot as far as who goes farthest."

But we are told by the President that we are to send our Ministers there to advise and consult. I am not, said Mr. C., sufficiently acquainted with the law of nations to hazard an opinion upon this point; but it does appear to me, sir, that it would be cause of just complaint on the part of Spain, and that she might consider it a violation of the treaty of peace and amity which now exist between us and that power; for it is a principle of municipal law, and will, I presume, apply equally to the law of nations, that the adviser of a crime is equally guilty with the perpetrator. If A advises B to take the life of C, and, in accordance with this advice, B commits the murder, then is A an accessory before the fact, and, in law, equally guilty with B. But, as regards nations, there are no accessories, all are principals; and it does appear to me, that, should we send Ministers to Panama, to advise and consult with these belligerent Republics, how to maintain their independence against Spain, that, by that very act, we become co-belligerents, and must, and may, justly, be considered by Spain as her enemy. To bring this home to the members of this House, permit me to put a case, hypothetically. Suppose this country was at war with England, and she, in order the better to arrange some plan by which she could effect our overthrow, proposed to the crowned heads of Europe to send Plenipotentiaries to meet at some particular point, designated by her, for the purpose of consulting and advising with her how to accomplish that object. And suppose that, in accordance with this invitation, those powers with whom we have the most friendly intercourse, and between whom and us there exist treaties of peace, amity, and commerce, should accept the invitation, and send their Ministers for that purpose—I appeal to every gentleman on this floor, if he would not view this, on the part of those powers, as a violation of those friendly relations which exist between us. Can they deny that they would? And if so, is not this case strictly in point? But, sir, on this part of the argument, I submit my remarks with diffidence, for the reason I before assigned.

Mr. RIVERA, of Virginia, then moved to amend Mr. McLANE's amendment, by inserting the following after the words "aforesaid Governments," where those words occur:

"Or any compact or engagement by which the United States shall be pledged to the Spanish American States to maintain, by force, the principle that no part of the American continents is henceforward subject to colonization by any European power."

Mr. R. expressed an intention to address the committee in support of this amendment, but, in the meanwhile, moved that the committee rise.

The motion prevailed—ayes 94—and then the committee rose.

The House adjourned.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. STEVENSON, of Va., in the chair, on the report of the Committee of Foreign Relations, on the Message of the President of the United States, in relation to the Mission to Panama.

Mr. RIVERA, who had a right to the floor, (having moved last evening for the rising of the committee,) being unexpectedly absent from the House, Mr. Brent addressed the committee as follows:

Mr. Chairman: There is one subject to be discussed at the Congress at Panama, in which I feel a deep interest, as being one of the Representatives of a Southern State. I allude to the condition of the islands of Cuba and Porto Rico. If the amendment now before the committee should be adopted, our Ministers will be prevented from taking any part, or making any remonstrance upon that subject, and for this reason, if for none other, I am opposed to that amendment. Sir, the condition of the Island of Cuba, in the neighborhood of the State of Louisiana, one of whose Representatives I am, excites my most lively anxieties. To the destiny of Cuba we are not indifferent. Our sympathies, our partiality for free and independent Governments, make us not indifferent to the condition of our fellow-men, the subjects of monarchy; under any other circumstances, and differently situated, we would hail with pleasure the independence of Cuba; but for reasons, Mr. Chairman, which you, as a Southern man, feel, and the nation know, I should look upon that event, as connected with our interests and with humanity, as one of the greatest evils which, in the existing state of things, could befall the Southern States, and particularly the State of Louisiana. I need not refer to the population of Cuba to justify my fears. Sir, do you believe that if the Republics of the South were to unite to aid Cuba in her independence, that its liberty would be achieved, in peace and good feeling between all, and without scenes of ruin, horror, and desolation, too painful to be portrayed? Would not the signal for its independence be the watchword for another object? And how could it be restrained? Where would be the armed force to stop the bloody torrent?

But, let us for a moment suppose, that the independence of Cuba could be effected without an attempt of a certain part of its population to attain the ascendancy—is it not reasonable for us to suppose that part of its population, as in the other South American Republics, would all be declared free; and, if so, with the black population of Mexico on the frontier of Louisiana, and Hayti and Cuba for neighbors, what would be the condition of the Southern planters? Sir, the very thought of the consequences flowing from such a state of things, excite feelings too heart-rending to be dwelt upon for one moment. I must turn from them. To prevent such a state of things, and to remonstrate with the South American Republics against their lending their aid to produce an event so filled with evil to the Southern States, and so shocking to humanity, the President of the United States has told us in his Message that, “the condition of the islands of Cuba and Porto Rico is of deeper import and more immediate bearing upon the present interests and future prospects of our Union. The correspondence herewith transmitted, will show how earnestly it has engaged the attention of this Government. The invasion of both those islands, by the united forces of Mexico and Colombia, is avowedly among the objects to be matured by the belligerent States at Panama. The convulsions to which, from the peculiar composition of their population, they would be liable in the event of such an invasion, and the danger therefrom resulting of their falling ultimately into the hands of some European power other than Spain, will not admit of our looking at the consequences to which the Congress at Panama may lead, with indifference. It is unnecessary to enlarge upon this topic, or to say more than that all our efforts in reference to this interest, will be to preserve the existing state of things: the tranquillity of the islands, and the peace and security of their inhabitants.” And if the present amendment be adopted, this very subject, so interesting to the South, will be excluded from the instructions of our Ministers. How can it be expected that, situated as I am, and representing the interests I do, I would advocate an amendment calculated to do so great an evil to my constituents? No, never. Were I to do it, I would be unworthy of the station I now fill.

I have been astonished, Mr. Chairman, at the course of some gentlemen from the South, in the other branch of Congress, (for I suppose I can refer to their speeches as matter of history,) in opposing this mission. Sir, not a voice from the South ought to be raised against it. It is suicide to do it. Is it not extraordinary that Louisiana alone, of all the Southern States, except Maryland, in the vote given in the other branch of this Legislature, should have been in favor of this mission? Is it possible that Southern men so far forget the vital interests they represent, as to overlook them for other objects? Can an opposition to the present Administration be so prejudiced as not to see that this measure, recommended by the President, is for the protection of our Southern interests? No, it is impossible that they can overlook it, if they divest themselves of all prejudices, and calmly look at the attitude of affairs.

To contradict the assertions which have gone abroad in the public prints and otherwise, and have been repeated in this Hall, that, as regards Cuba, the Administration is friendly to the views of the South American Republics, and that this mission will lead to this Government's lending their aid in that way, to do an injury to the Southern interests, I must call the attention of the committee to the President's Message, in which he discloses his views upon the subject, and clearly refutes the motives attempted to be attributed to him, and conclusively shows that the object of the Administration is to prevent, if possible, a change in the condition of Cuba, in any manner whatsoever, and thereby to protect our interests, instead of destroying them. His words are, and I have referred to them before: “The convulsions to which, from the peculiar composition of their population, [alluding to Cuba and Porto Rico,] they would be liable in the event of such an invasion, and the danger therefrom resulting of their falling ultimately into the hands of some European power, other than Spain, will not admit of our looking at the consequences to which the Congress at Panama may lead, with indifference. It is unnecessary to enlarge upon this topic; or to say more than that all our efforts in reference to this interest, [meaning the Southern,] will be to preserve the existing state of things, the tranquillity of the islands, and the peace and security of their inhabitants."

After this fair, mainly exposition of the views of the Administration, how can gentlemen misconstrue the real motives which govern in this case? I much fear, Mr. Chairman, that the impolitic opposition made to this mission, has before this sealed the fate of Cuba. It has been delayed by the very interest which ought to have hastened it. Two months sooner and the firm remonstrance of our Government against any interference of the Republics, in the affairs of Cuba, might have produced all the beneficial effects we could hope for. If the reports we have lately received from Campeachy be true, of a large force having assembled to make an attack on Cuba, under the direction of the Republics of Mexico and Colombia, I fear the patriotic exertions of the President to stay the blow, will be too late. If so, what will or can the opposers of this wise and salutary measure say, to justify themselves to the American people? Sir, gentlemen may declaim and fret, and the opposition may resort to what schemes and intrigues they please, the people of the United States will respond to the wishes of the Administration upon this subject, and overwhelm its opposers with shame and confusion. Sir, the people are not to be driven; they will follow their own judgments, formed from sober reflection, and the best considerations, for their country's good. They may, for a time, be hurried away by the enthusiasm of their character, but they soon return to their better judgments; and whenever a measure, like the present, is calculated to promote their interests, to protect the principles of liberty, upon which their happy Government is founded, and to ameliorate the condition of their fellow-men throughout the world, they will always approve of it; and he who undertakes to deceive them, deceives himself.

Mr. Rives said he was admonished, by every consideration of a personal nature, to abstain from any participation in the present discussion. No one could be more sensible than himself how little ability he possessed, at any time, to assist the deliberations of this House, and that ability, small as it was at all times, was now materially lessened by the effects of long-continued infirmity. Nevertheless, he was urged, by an impulse which he could not resist, to say something upon the present occasion. The motives of public men, for the part they shall act in reference to this subject, have been, and will be, drawn into question. While, on the one hand, servility and subservience may be attributed to those who shall support the measure, (he was not aware that such an imputation had been made, and he was, certainly, very far from making it himself,) on the other hand, we know that those who cannot bring their minds to approve it, in all the latitude of its various objects, have been accused of being actuated by a spirit of factious opposition to the present Administration. This consideration naturally made one desirous of placing his opinions, and the grounds of them, before the world, that they might speak for themselves, and that it might be seen that they have, at least, a sufficient foundation, in reason, to exempt them from the suspicion of originating in personal and unworthy motives. But this is not all. The subject itself is one of the deepest interest. No question has arisen, in my opinion, said Mr. R., since we assumed our equal rank among the nations of the earth, not excepting the late declaration of war against Great Britain, fearful and momentous as that was, which involves more important consequences to the peace, happiness, and free political institutions of this country. The measure proposed is an acknowledged departure from the uniform and settled policy pursued by this Government in times past—a policy, in the observance of which, we have reaped the most abundant fruits of prosperity and honor. It seeks to introduce a new system in the conduct and adjustment of our foreign relations. While we profess to cultivate "peace, commerce, and honest friendship," with all nations, this system proposes to connect us, by ties of a more intimate and fraternal character, with the nations of one-half of the globe, by which we are to be segregated from, and, in a manner, arrayed against, those of the other half; by which we are to make common cause with the former, in the defence of their new-born, and yet precarious independence; and, in short, to identify our interests, and unite our destinies, with theirs.

If this be the true character of the measure now under consideration, and, in my conscience, I most solemnly believe that it is, it becomes us to weigh it well before we give it the irrevocable sanction of our votes in this Hall. That we have the right thus freely to deliberate upon it, has not yet been openly questioned, in the progress of this discussion; but the idea has been suggested, in conversation, that, as the constitution has confided to the President and Senate the power of making appointments, and as Ministers to Panama have been appointed by them, we have no longer any discretion upon the subject, but are bound to make the appropriations necessary for defraying the expenses of the mission. Such, sir, is not the doctrine of the President himself, who has shown no disposition to concede, with too much facility, powers to other departments of the Government, in derogation of his own. In his Message, both to this House and the Senate, he submits the subject to the "free determination" of the Legislature. Neither was this the doctrine of this House, in '96, when these seats were filled with some of the wisest men who have adorned any portion of our annals. On that occasion, the House of Representatives, in a much more doubtful case—in the case of a treaty which had been duly ratified—affirmed their right, in the freest and fullest manner, to grant or withhold an appropriation of money, or any other act necessary to carry the treaty into effect. A treaty is a mutual and solemn contract, between two parties; and, when it has been consummated, with all the forms prescribed by the constitution, there is plausibility, at least, in contending that it binds the faith of the nation, and is obligatory upon all the authorities of the Government. But the appointment of Ministers is an act confined to one party only, inferring no obligation to any other; and there can be no ground for saying that the faith of the nation is pledged by it. But, sir, why need I dwell upon this objection? Have we been engaged in a solemn farce for the last two months? Wherefore have we repeated call after call upon the Executive, for information, and received from the Executive communication after communication, in relation to this subject, if not to enable us to decide whether we would or would not grant the appropriation which has been asked of us? Did it need all this preparation to qualify us for an act which we were bound, in any event, to perform? Was it proper, on the one part, to ask, or, on the other, to give, so much light, if we were compelled, blindly and implicitly, to sanction the measure proposed?

Mission to Panama.

[H. OF R.]

In deciding the question submitted to us, then, we must dismiss all extraneous considerations, and look exclusively to the intrinsic merits of the measure itself, or, in other words, to the character of the objects proposed to be accomplished by it. So many and such various objects have been suggested, as the motives of this extraordinary measure, that the mind is bewildered and lost in confusion, amid their multiplicity; and it is exceedingly difficult to fix the attention long enough upon any one of them, to estimate its precise bearing on the general proposition. But, in reviewing them again and again, my attention has been forcibly arrested by two, of a character so portentous to the peace and happiness of the country, that, were all the rest not only innocent and safe, but in the highest degree useful and important, I could not lend my concurrence to the measure, while they continued to be embraced within its scope. The two objects alluded to, are resistance to the interference of any third power in the quarrel between Spain and her late colonies, and opposition to all future colonization on either continent of America. So general seems to be the impression of the danger and inexpediency of committing ourselves, in relation to these topics, that the consideration of the propriety of the mission to Panama, with a large majority of persons, has assumed the shape of an inquiry whether we are likely to be so committed—not whether we ought to be. Some of the friends of the mission earnestly deny that there is any reason to apprehend that we shall be committed upon these topics, by any thing proposed to be done at Panama, while others, who have more carefully explored the evidence, observe a discreet silence upon the subject. Although these topics evidently constituted the original inducement, the primum mobile of the invitation given us to attend the Congress at Panama, yet, in the elaborate report of the Committee of Foreign Relations, there is not the slightest allusion to them. In the Message of the President, although alluded to, they are overlaid and smothered by other matter; and there is a manifest shyness in approaching them, on this floor.

How it has happened that these objects, which originally stood in the front of the picture, have been thus shifted to the background, where they are almost lost in the obscurity of the distance, it is not for me to explain; but, believing that they are all-important in giving its true character and expression to the piece, I shall bring them forward, in full relief, to their proper position upon the canvas. I shall undertake to prove, from an examination of the documents in our possession, that, if Ministers are sent to the Congress at Panama, our Government is committed to take part in its deliberations, relating to these objects—that they are the principal, if not the only objects, in which our participation was sought, by the States who invited our attendance—and that the result of our participation in them will most probably be the adoption of measures endangering the future peace of the country. In the prosecution of this plan, it will be beside my purpose to inquire how far a Congress, which has the power to "fix" and "determine" the respective military and naval contingents, or their equivalents, which are to be furnished by parties engaged in a common war, which has, too, the farther power of "interpreting the treaties" that may be made, and of "arbitrating the differences" that may arise among those parties, can be justly denominated a diplomatic meeting, or a consultative body, merely. Whether the Congress be sovereign or consultative, legislative or diplomatic, still the objects I have indicated are to be acted upon by it, and in a manner exposing the peace of the nation to the most serious hazards. Nor shall I inquire how far it is consistent with our professions of neutrality, in the existing war between Spain and her late colonies, to take part in the proceedings of a Congress, which has evidently grown out of the exigencies of that war, and the avowed and leading object of which is to combine the resources, and to unite the efforts of the belligerents on one side, in a more vigorous prosecution of it—a Congress, too, whose occasional secret sittings, as they would afford a convenient cover for our participation in its hostile deliberations, might well excite suspicions as to the good faith with which we observed our declaration, not to share in its counsels of that character. I shall also forbear to consider any of the various objects, other than those I have already referred to, which have been suggested as proper for our joint consultations, in the Congress of Panama. All those objects, in my opinion, have been shown to be useless, impertinent, mischievous, impracticable, or attainable, with equal advantage, in the usual mode of diplomatic negotiation. It will be sufficient for my purpose, if I establish the propositions I have undertaken to maintain, in relation to the two prominent objects (so far as we are concerned) of the Congress at Panama, found in the means of resisting the interference of any third power, in the war between Spain and the Southern Republics, and the mode of opposing colonization on either continent of America.

My first proposition is, that, if we send Ministers to the Congress of Panama, our Government stands committed to take part in its deliberations relating to these objects. Now, sir, to determine this point, let us refer to the terms of the invitation, addressed to us, and the terms of its acceptance. It will be recollected by the committee, that the Ministers of Mexico and Colombia, justly doubting how far it would consist with the policy heretofore pursued by our Government, to accept an invitation to the Congress at Panama, previously consulted the Secretary of State, to know whether "it would be agreeable or not to the United States to receive such an invitation." The delicacy which marked the conduct of these Ministers is highly honorable to them. Their object was to leave us unembarrassed by the consideration of the wishes or feelings of their Governments, and in a condition of perfect freedom, to decide according to our own views of our own interests. The Secretary of State informed them that the President believed that the proposed Congress might be highly useful in several respects, but thought it expedient to adjust beforehand certain preliminary points, such as "the subjects to which the attention of the Congress was to be directed," and some other matters of a similar character; and added, that, if these points could be arranged in a manner satisfactory to the United States, the President would be disposed to accept the proffered invitations. For the purpose of satisfying this requisition, more particularly as it regarded the subjects of deliberation in the proposed Congress, the Mexican and Colombian Ministers addressed to Mr. Clay their respective letters of the 2d and 3d of November. What, sir, does the Mexican Minister say? The following extract from his letter will show: "The Government of the subscriber never supposed nor desired, that the United States of America would take part in the Congress about to be held, in other matters than those which, from their nature and importance, the late Administration pointed out and characterized as being of general interest to the Continent: for which reason, one of the subjects which will occupy the attention of the Congress, will be the resistance or opposition to the interference of any neutral nation, in the question and war of independence, between the new powers of the Continent and Spain. The Government of the undersigned apprehends, that, as the powers of America are of accord as to resistance, it behooves them to discuss the means of giving to that resistance all possible force, that the evil may be met, if it cannot be avoided; and the only means of accomplishing this object is, by a previous concert as to the mode in which each of them shall lend its co-operation: for, otherwise, resistance would operate but partially, and in a manner much less certain and effective. The opposition to colonization in America, by the European powers, will be another of the questions which may be discussed, and which is in like predicament with the foregoing. After these two principal subjects, the Representatives of the United States of America may be occupied upon others, to which the existence of the new States may give rise; and which it is not easy to point out or enumerate; for which the Government of the United States of Mexico will give instructions, and ample powers to its commissioners, and it trusts that those from the other powers may bear the same." And again: "To which end, and in compliance with the tenor of the conversations held with the honorable Secretary of State, the underwritten Minister Plenipotentiary invites this Government to send Representatives to the Congress of Panama, with authorities as aforesaid, and with express instructions in their credentials upon the two principal questions; in which step he is likewise joined by the Minister of Colombia, and with which he trusts he has fulfilled all that was stipulated to this end." Now, sir, let us see the language of Mr. Clay's answer. He says, "The President has therefore resolved, should the Senate of the United States, now expected to assemble in a few days, give their advice and consent, to send commissioners to the Congress of Panama. Whilst they will not be authorized to enter upon any deliberations, or to concur in any acts, inconsistent with the present neutral position of the United States, and its obligations, they will be fully empowered and instructed upon all questions likely to arise in the Congress on subjects in which the nations of America have a common interest."

My next proposition is, that these subjects, however, or for whatever reason they may have been kept out of sight recently, are the principal, if not the only subjects in which our participation was desired by the States who invited our attendance at the Congress of Panama. In the extract I have already read to the committee, from the letter of the Mexican Minister, he expressly styles them the

Mission to Panama.

"two principal subjects" for consultation with the United States; and indeed they are the only subjects specified by him. It is true that the Colombian Minister suggests, in a loose and general way, some other subjects, which might engage the attention of the United States in the Congress of Panama. But he dwells on these two with particular and emphatic earnestness, as "points of great interest," and "of immediate utility to the American States that are at war with Spain," and strongly appeals to the co-operation of this Government in relation to them.

I will now proceed to show that there is every reason to believe, from what has already passed between our Government and the Spanish American States, that the result of our participation in these subjects at the Congress of Panama, will be the adoption of measures endangering the future peace of the country. Sir, the principle of resistance by force is already agreed upon. Nothing remains but to adjust the details connected with its execution, and to consummate the understanding which has already taken place by entering into a formal compact. In the very pregnant extract from the letter of the Mexican Minister, to which I have already had occasion twice to refer, he says, "as the powers of America are of accord as to resistance," it behooves them "to discuss the means of giving to that resistance all possible force," and to determine by a "previous concert, in what mode each party is to lend its co-operation;" and we are invited to the Congress at Panama for the purpose of entering upon this "discussion," and arranging the terms of this "concert," or system of "co-operation." Now let us see what the Colombian Minister says: "The manner in which all colonization of European powers on the American Continent shall be resisted, and their interference in the present contest between Spain and her former colonies prevented, are other points of great interest. Were it proper, an eventual alliance, in case these events should occur, which is within the range of possibilities, and the treaty, of which no use should be made until the casus foderis should happen, to remain secret; or, if this should seem premature, a convention so anticipated would be different means to secure the same end of preventing foreign influence. This is a matter of immediate utility to the American States that are at war with Spain, and is in accordance with the repeated declarations and protests of the Cabinet at Washington. The conferences held on this subject being confidential, would increase mutual friendship, and promote the respective interests of the parties." The Secretary of State, in his answer to these letters, does not express any dissent from the propositions or statements contained in them; from which I will not argue, although I might do so with great plausibility, that he is to be considered as assenting to the particular measure of policy suggested in the extract last read. But this I do contend for: that, so far as those letters undertake to state matters of fact, the omission of the Secretary to qualify or deny, is a full admission of them. It is a rule of familiar application, in the investigation of evidence, in private controversies, that whatever is affirmed by one party, in the presence of the other, and not denied, is considered as admitted by the latter, and has all the effect of a positive confession against him. Now, what is this case? The Mexican Minister says, in his letter to Mr. Clay, "The powers of America," (including the United States, of course,) "are of accord as to resistance." The Colombian Minister, after suggesting a particular measure, to secure the joint efforts of the parties in this resistance, says: "This is in accordance with the repeated declarations and protests of the Cabinet at Washington." Mr. Clay does not gainsay either of these assertions, and does, therefore, in effect, admit them to be true.

But, sir, we have direct and positive evidence upon this subject, under the hand of the Secretary himself. In our diplomatic intercourse with the Spanish American States, he has treated and held out to them certain vague and oracular expressions, in a Message of the late President, as a pledge, on the part of the United States, not to permit any interference of the European powers in the war between them and the mother country. When, during the last summer, a French fleet appeared in the West Indies, with the supposed design of taking possession of the islands of Cuba and Porto Rico, and an appeal was made to us by those States to interpose in their behalf, Mr. Clay recurred to this "memorable pledge," as he expressly calls it, and in fulfilment and practical recognition of it as a pledge in fact, he wrote to Mr. Brown, our Minister to France, instructing him to say to that Government, that we "could not consent to the occupation of those islands by any European power other than Spain, under any contingency whatever." He afterwards communicated a copy of this letter to Mr. Poinsett, our Minister to Mexico, and authorized him to read it to the functionaries of that Government as an interpretation of our policy towards the States of Spanish America, and "what we were prepared to do" in their behalf. If this proceeding does not commit the Executive of the United States, (so far as they have power to decide the question,) to the point of resistance, upon the happening of a certain event, I am utterly at a loss to conceive what could have such an effect.

We have heretofore seen that our Minister to Mexico, acting under the authority of, and in presumed obedience to, the Secretary of State, had stated to that Government "that the United States had pledged themselves not to permit any third power to interfere either with the independence or form of Government of the new States." But we are now told by the Secretary, that the "United States have made no such pledge;" or, as he explains himself, have "contracted no engagement" to that effect. Sir, I never supposed that any treaty had been entered into with these States, by which we were bound to maintain their independence; and this is all that the assertion of the Secretary of State amounts to. It does not contradict the idea that official declarations have been made, and formal assurances of support given to these Governments in the name of the United States. Sir, it is impossible for any man to examine the documents before us with an impartial eye, and disguise from himself the fact, that it is a thing perfectly understood and agreed between the diplomatic functionaries of this and the Spanish American Governments, that all America is to make a common cause in maintaining, by force, the doctrines of a new public code, which Mr. Clay (feeling that new things require new names) calls "intercontinental," not international, "law;" and the purpose for which we are summoned to the Congress of Panama, is, to carry this understanding into effect, by entering into formal conventional stipulations upon the subject. Now, sir, let us inquire what will probably be the nature and effect of these stipulations, as regards the United States. We have seen that one of the Spanish American Ministers has suggested an "eventual alliance, to be kept secret until the casus fœderis occurs," as proper to be adopted. Another, without pointing out any particular form of agreement, insists, in general, upon the propriety of adopting some "previous concert," or plan of "co-operation." Let us now see what are the views of our own Government upon this subject; and, for that purpose, I beg leave to read to the committee the following extract from the Message of the President to this House. He says: "The late President of the United States, in his Message to Congress of the 2d of December, 1823, while announcing the negotiation then pending with Russia, relating to the northwest coast of this continent, observed, that the occasion of the discussion to which that incident had given rise, had been taken for asserting as a principle, in which the rights and interests of the United States were involved, that the American continents, by the free and independent condition which they had assumed and maintained, were, thenceforward, not to be considered as subjects for future colonization, by any European power. The principle had first been assumed in the negotiation with Russia. It rested upon a course of reasoning equally simple and conclusive. With the exception of the existing European colonies, which it was in no-wise intended to disturb, the two continents consisted of several sovereign and independent nations, whose territories covered their whole surface. By this, their independent condition, the United States enjoyed the right of commercial intercourse with every part of their possessions. To attempt the establishment of a colony in those possessions, would be to usurp, to the exclusion of others, a commercial intercourse which was the common possession of all. It could not be done without encroaching upon existing rights of the United States. The Government of Russia has never disputed these positions, nor manifested the slightest dissatisfaction at their having been taken. Most of the new American Republics have declared their entire assent to them; and they now propose, among the subjects of consultation at Panama, to take into consideration the means of making effectual the assertion of that principle, as well as the means of resisting interference from abroad, with the domestic concerns of the American Governments. In alluding to these means, it would obviously be premature at this time to anticipate that which is offered merely as matter for consultation; or to pronounce upon those measures which have been or may be suggested. The purpose of this Government is, to concur in none which would import hostility to Europe, or justly excite resentment in any of her States. Should it be advisable to contract any conventional engagement on this topic, our views would extend no further than to a mutual pledge of the parties to the compact to maintain the principle in application to its own territory, and to permit no colonial lodgements or establishment of European jurisdiction upon its own soil; and, with respect to the obtrusive interference from abroad, if its future character may be inferred from that which has been, and perhaps still is exercised in more than one of the new States, a joint declaration of its character, and exposure of it to the world, may be probably all that the occasion would require. Whether the United States should or should not be parties to such a declaration, may justly form a part of the deliberation. That there is an evil to be remedied, needs little insight into the secret history of late years to know, and that this remedy may best be concerted at the Panama meeting, deserves at least the experiment of consideration."

Let us now see what he suggests, in reference to the subject of interference from abroad, with the affairs of Spanish America. "A joint declaration of its character, and exposure of it to the world, may be probably all that the occasion would require." The nature and effect of this proposition deserves to be profoundly considered. Should the United States concur in such a declaration, in what situation would the nation then stand? Would they not be committed to support it by force? A declaration of the sort proposed, is no idle vaunt, no parade of words merely. It is a solemn appeal to the world, upon the justice of the cause which the parties have espoused, and implies a firm determination to support it with all their energies. How would we, the war-making power of the Government, stand, in relation to the subject? We are apprised, beforehand, by the Executive, that such a declaration is among the objects of the mission to Panama, and with this knowledge, we give our unqualified sanc- tion to the mission. The proposed declaration goes forth to the world, and is not heeded by the powers on whom it is intended to operate. Under these circumstances, would the honor of the nation admit of any retreat for us? In short, sir, is not the declaration proposed a conditional, or, to use more diplomatic phraseology, a provisional declaration of war, to take effect whensoever a certain event shall occur? If so, I ask, is the mind of this nation finally made up to go to war for the independence of Spanish America? No gentleman, I presume, will say so. But even if it were, why should we proclaim this determination beforehand, in such a manner as to preclude ourselves from the benefit of full and free deliberation, in regard to every circumstance of expediency, as well as justice, which ought to influence our decision, when the occasion may arrive?

Mission to Panama.

But, it may be said that there is no reason to apprehend the interference, which it is proposed thus to denounce to the world. If this be so, then I say the denunciation is a species of bravado, which it does not become the dignity of this nation to engage in. If otherwise, we should pause, before we assume upon ourselves the fearful responsibilities it may involve. It is true that Mr. Clay, in a communication lately made to this House, tells us, "that apprehensions of interference have ceased;" but, on the other hand, the President, in the portion of his Message which I have read to the committee, speaking of the same matter, says, "that there is an evil to be remedied, needs little insight into the secret history of late years to know; and that this remedy may best be concerted at the Panama meeting, deserves at least the experiment of consideration." The Minister of Colombia strongly corroborates this intimation of the President, and expresses a suspicion that a covert interference has already taken place. In a letter of the 30th of December last, addressed by him to Mr. Clay, he says: "Spain, in spite of her nullity, does not cease in her efforts to augment the army of America, so far as to induce us to suspect that a foreign hand affords these aids, which are by no means in harmony with the scantiness of the resources of the Peninsula." Now, sir, if we are to commit ourselves to go to war on behalf of the States of Spanish America, in the event of interference of a third power in the quarrel between them and Spain, the obligation will depend, I presume, upon the fact, and not upon the form, of interference. Whether that interference be by openly sending fleets and armies, to fight the battles of Spain, or by secretly furnishing the means with which those fleets and armies are procured and supported, the injury to our Southern friends will be the same, and the obligation upon us, to repel it, will consequently be the same.

But, sir, seeing the dangerous extent of the consequences involved in these measures suggested by the President, it may be said, he does not express a positive opinion that they ought or will be adopted at the Congress of Panama. Sir, they are evidently brought forward as the result of previous deliberation, and seem to be offered as substitutes for the projects which had been presented by the Spanish American Ministers. They must, therefore, have been duly weighed; and, it is fair to presume, that the President would not have suggested them at all, if he had not been prepared, on his part, for their adoption, or at least thought them entitled to the most favorable consideration. That the President has made up his mind to concur in these, or other measures, of an equivalent character, is farther manifested by a subsequent part of his Message, in which he labors to show that the advice of General Washington, to "have, with foreign nations, as little political connection as possible," is inapplicable to our relations with the States of this hemisphere. Why should the President have made this attempt—(how he has succeeded in it, I hope hereafter to show)—unless his object was to form, with the nations alluded to, those "political connections," against which the advice of Washington was directed?

But a quietus is found for all our apprehensions, in the assurances of the President, that "no alliances will be contracted," and, in general, that "nothing will be done incompatible with our neutrality," or "importing hostility to Europe." Sir, many things may be done which would commit the future peace of this country, and yet not amount to an alliance, or a violation of neutrality, or an act of hostility to Europe. I have endeavored to show, and I hope I have shown, to the satisfaction of the committee, that the measures suggested by the President himself, have a direct tendency to commit the peace of the country, and yet it cannot be said that they constitute an alliance, or a breach of neutrality, or an act of hostility to Europe. The President has given us a practical interpretation of the meaning of his declaration upon this subject, by recommending measures, whose unquestionable tendency it is to commit the peace of the nation, in certain contingencies, at the very time that he disclaims all intention of entering into alliances, or of doing any thing which would be incompatible with our neutrality, or import hostility to Europe. Sir, I do not mean to question the integrity and good faith of the President's declarations. I am not afraid that he intends to deceive us; but the consequences may be equally fatal, if we deceive ourselves. Let us not shut our eyes against the light, because it may disclose to us unwelcome dangers. Let us take the declarations of the President in the sense in which they were made. Let us understand them as he understands them; and, when so understood, they afford, in my opinion, no security for the peace of the nation.

Now, sir, to determine how far this construction of the President's can be sustained, let us turn to the advice of General Washington, in his own words. The language of that great man, which deserves to be as immortal as his fame, was this: "The great rule of conduct for us, in regard to foreign nations, is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible. So far as we have already formed engagements, let them be fulfilled with perfect good faith. Here let us stop. Europe has a set of primary interests which to us have none, or a very remote relation. Hence she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence, therefore, it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves, by artificial ties, in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics, or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships and enmities. Our detached and distant situation invites and enables us to pursue a different course. If we remain one people, under an efficient Government, the period is not far off, when we may defy material injury from external annoyance—when we may take such an attitude as will cause the neutrality, we may at any time resolve upon, to be scrupulously respected—when belligerent nations, under the impossibility of making acquisitions upon us, will not lightly hazard the giving us provocation—when we may choose peace or war, as our interest, guided by justice, shall counsel. Why forego the advantage of so peculiar a situation? Why quit our own, to stand upon foreign ground?"

One would think that language so plain, so clear, so unequivocal, could not, by any ingenuity of construction, be tortured into a recommendation or approval of "political connections with foreign nations"—the very thing against which it warned us. All that the most intrepid commentator could be supposed capable of contending for, (and that I hope to show cannot be successfully maintained,) is that, from circumstances which have arisen since the time of Washington, and not foreseen by him, his advice no longer applies to our condition, and does not, therefore, inhibit the formation of "political connections with foreign nations," under these new circumstances. But, sir, the President takes bolder ground. He says the propriety of these political connections is directly deducible from "the sound and judicious principles," from the "very words of Washington." Now, sir, how does the President make out this deduction? Why, sir, by superinducing his own words upon those of Washington. This passage of the President's Message is so curious a specimen of criticism and logic combined, that I beg leave to call the attention of the committee to it. "Compare our situation and the circumstances of that time, with those of the present day, and what, from the very words of Washington, then, would be his counsels to his countrymen now? Europe has still her set of primary interests, with which we have little or a remote relation. Our distant and detached situation, with reference to Europe, remains the same. But we were then the only independent nation of this hemisphere; and we were surrounded by European colonies, with the greater part of which we had no more intercourse than with the inhabitants of another planet. Those colonies have now been transformed into eight independent nations, extending to our very borders. Seven of them Republics, like ourselves, with whom we have an immensely growing commercial, and must have, and have already, important political connections; with reference to whom, our situation is neither distant nor detached—whose political principles and systems of Government, congenial with our own, must and will have an action and counteraction upon us and ours, to which we cannot be indifferent, if we would. The rapidity of our growth, and the consequent increase of our strength, have more than realized the anticipations of this admirable political legacy. Thirty years have nearly elapsed since it was written; and, in the interval, our population, our wealth, our territorial extension, our power, physical and moral, has nearly trebled. Reasoning upon this state of things, from the sound and judicious principles of Washington, and must we not say that the period which he predicted as then not far off, has arrived? That America has a set of primary interests, which have none or a remote relation to Europe. That the interference of Europe, therefore, in those concerns, should be spontaneously withheld by her upon the same principles, that we have never interfered with hers; and that, if she should interfere, as she may, by measures which may have a great and dangerous recoil upon ourselves, we might be called, in defence of our own altars and firesides, to take an attitude which would cause our neutrality to be respected, and choose peace or war, as our interest, guided by justice, should counsel."

The President here, after adverting to the rapid growth of the United States in wealth and population, since the date of General Washington's Address, asks, "must we not say that the period which Washington predicted as then not far off, has arrived?" What period is this? The President goes on to describe it as the period when America shall have her set of primary interests, with which Europe should not interfere, and if she should so interfere, we might be called upon to take an attitude for their defence—at this point, taking up again the language of General Washington's Address. It would seem, from the use here made of General Washington's prediction, that he had anticipated the period when America would have her set of peculiar interests, and had, in contemplation of that state of things, indicated to his countrymen the course of policy which it is now proposed to pursue. But, sir, there is nothing of all this in the Farewell Address. The period spoken of by General Washington as not far off, was the period when, by our advancement in wealth and power, "under an efficient Government, we might defy material injury from external annoyance." &c. General Washington evidently intended to ground upon this anticipation an additional argument in favor of the policy he had recommended, inasmuch as the ability to defy external annoyance, which he had looked forward to as the result of our remaining one people, under an efficient Government, would place us above the necessity of seeking foreign connections, for the purpose of strengthening ourselves. But this very anticipation, which General Washington had introduced as a strong motive for adhering to the policy of avoiding "political connections with foreign nations," the President, by a singular metamorphosis, has converted into an instrument for justifying and enforcing a departure from that policy. Sir, do not the heart and the head equally revolt at this perversion of the language and reasoning of General Washington? At the time when his Farewell Address was given to the world, we were yet an infant people; our numbers thinly scattered over an extensive territory; our finances embarrassed, and our resources, of every sort, impaired by the effects of our recent struggle for independence. In this situation, there were inducements to court foreign alliances, to aid and support us in the event of collisions with the rest of the world. If, under these circumstances, when the assistance of powerful friends might have been not only beneficial, but necessary to us, Washington yet advised us to steer clear of foreign alliances and connections, with how much more force does this advice apply to our present condition—when his anticipations of our national growth have been most amply realized; when we have already taken such an attitude as to ensure the respect of other nations; when we have proved ourselves competent to be our own champions, and the successful defenders of our own rights!

The President has, therefore, in my opinion, wholly failed, not only in his attempt to prove affirmatively that the advice of Washington leads to and proves the formation of the political connections in question, but in his endeavor to maintain the inferior negative proposition, that the injunction to avoid such connections in general, does not apply to the particular circumstances of our present condition. On the contrary, it is manifest, for the reasons I have just suggested, that this injunction applies with increased force, to the state in which we now are. It is true that General Washington illustrates his advice by reference to European politics, but the advice itself is not confined to our relations with Europe. In its spirit and its principles, it is universal and immutable, acknowledging no distinction of time or place. In the comprehensive words used by him in a subsequent part of his address, "tis our true policy to steer clear of permanent alliances with any portion of the foreign world." The parting injunction of the Father of his Country, then, can neither be construed nor reasoned away. It still continues to admonish us, in its deep and impressive tones, against the fatal policy of entangling ourselves by "political connections with foreign nations;" whether young or old, whether on this or the other side of the Atlantic.

But, sir, another argument urged in favor of this political connection with Spanish America is, that we owe it to the cause of liberty. Sir, in my opinion, we can best advance the cause of liberty by the influence of our example, and by presenting to the world the spectacle of a prosperous and happy people, blessed in the enjoyment of their free institutions. Let us, then, for the sake of mankind, as well as ourselves, attend to our own concerns; improve the gifts of Providence, with which we have been crowned; perfect and build up our political institutions, by every means of amelioration which time and experience may supply, that they may remain to our posterity, and stand in the eyes of the world, at once a monument and a model of human freedom. Let us, above all things, avoid the danger of being drawn into unnecessary foreign wars, which have, in all ages, been the grave of republican liberty. We do, indeed, owe a solemn responsibility to all mankind, in this and future ages, for the fate of the experiment of free Government, which has been committed to our hands. The success of this experiment does, in my opinion, mainly depend upon our keeping clear of entangling connections with other people, who may be less blessed with an aptitude and capacity for freedom than ourselves, and whose interests or passions might involve us in enterprises foreign to our sober and peaceful pursuits. Sir, if other nations are destined to lose their liberties, let us acquit ourselves of the high trust which Providence has devolved upon us, and endeavor to preserve our own; that one beacon-light, at least, may be left to cheer the darkness of the political world, and to guide those nations who may have lost their liberties, through that sea of revolution upon which they must embark to recover them.

Another argument urged in favor of the establishment of more intimate relations with the Spanish American States is, that by doing so, we shall secure their good will, which is highly important to us, both in a commercial and a political view. What success is likely to attend this experiment, may be inferred from that which has followed our past efforts, of a similar nature. I have already briefly alluded to the various offices of kindness, and manifestations of friendship, which we have exhibited towards these people. With what return have they ever met? Let any gentleman read the late message of the President of Mexico to his Congress, and then let his feelings of mortified and indignant pride give the answer. Sir, we have vainly imagined that, by the acts of disinterested friendship, and the solid and useful services we have rendered our Southern neighbors, we had won their gratitude and confidence; that they looked up to us as their patron and guide, and regarded us with filial reverence—to use the language of a gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. METCALFE,) as the Mother of Republics. But, sir, this fond delusion is dissipated. The message of the Mexican President begins with celebrating, in the most fulsome strains, the power, the wisdom, the magnanimity of Great Britain, in her transactions with the Spanish American States, and distinctly attributes the disconcertion of the schemes of their enemies to the interposition of the British trident—which trident was never interposed in any other way than by forming commercial relations with them, for her own benefit, and even this was not done till three or four years after we had made a formal and explicit acknowledgment of their independence, in the face of the world. Sir, we have, heretofore, supposed that we had some agency in disconcerting the schemes of their enemies, but the Mexican President gives the whole credit of the operation to Great Britain. In a subsequent part of the message, the United States are introduced, with a cold formality, as “the oldest of the independent States,” with some empty compliments upon our revolutionary struggle, and our political institutions; and the fact is admitted, because it could not be disguised, that we were the first to acknowledge their independence. But we recognize no traces of that ardent devotion, that fervent gratitude, that affectionate confidence, which we have been taught to believe were cherished in all Spanish American hearts towards us, and of which there are such ample and gratuitous displays towards Great Britain.

Sir, the same unwelcome discovery breaks in upon us in the history of our attempt to negotiate a commercial treaty with Mexico. We see our Minister earnestly entreating for equal privileges with the American States of Spanish origin, upon the ground that we are a member of the great American family, and that we have rendered important services to the cause of Spanish American independence. But, the claim is pertinaciously rejected, and the Mexican Government insists upon retaining the power of granting exclusive advantages to the other Spanish American States, expressly for the purpose of “evinced her sympathies in their favor” and to our detriment, of course, in the event of a war (which she ungraciously anticipates) between them and the United States. If we turn to the history of our transactions with the Republic of Colombia, we shall find in them, too, reason to apprehend that we have been deceived in relation to the feelings of that portion of the Spanish American people towards us. In fixing the basis of our commercial intercourse with that republic, all that we were able to obtain from her was the concession of equal privileges with the most favored nation. In a treaty, however, lately negotiated with Great Britain, she puts that nation on the footing of her own citizens.

It is true, that, by the consequential operations of our treaty, we shall now be invested with the same privileges which have been accorded to Great Britain. But the difference in the original character of the stipulations evinces a partiality, to which our Government cannot be, and has not been, insensible. Sir, it is impossible to look into the records of our diplomatic communications with the States of Spanish America, and not perceive that their minds have too readily imbibed the poison of suspicion, in relation to the singleness and disinterestedness of the views by which we have been actuated in our conduct towards them. The documents in our possession show, that a French emissary at Bogota, in 1823, labored to make the impression, that “the United States were influenced by interested motives, in recognizing the new Governments of Spanish America.” This insinuation, however injurious and unfounded, had its effect, and its influence is discernible in all our subsequent intercourse.

The result of our past efforts, therefore, to conciliate the good will and affection of these new States, affords but little ground to hope for success in the experiment now proposed. Sir, for myself, I do not believe there ever can be any cordial fraternity between us and them. The difference of origin, of blood, of physical and moral constitution, of language, of manners and customs, of religion, as they preclude all congeniality of feeling, must oppose insuperable impediments to any intimate political union. From the external circumstances, too, in which we are placed, there must arise between us, and, indeed, there have already arisen—as in the case of Cuba—serious collisions of interest or of ambition. It may be said, with fully as much justice as the remark has been applied to England and France, that Mexico and the United States, from their relative situation, and the position they occupy on the Gulf of Mexico, are natural enemies.

The question then is, whether these elements of discrepancy can be mitigated or harmonized by any system of political connection? I think not, sir. All history proves that confederacies have been the fruitful matrix of internal dissensions and domestic feuds. How was it, sir, with the Amphictyonic League of ancient Greece? The jealousies existing between the members of the League, particularly Athens and Sparta, its leading members (which jealousies, too, grew out of the relations to one another created by the League itself,) involved them in perpetual controversies, and finally lead to the Peloponnesian war, which terminated in its dissolution. Modern Europe affords us an equally instructive lesson. The history of the Germanic body, for centuries, is nothing but a history of the bloody and cruel wars among the princes and States which composed it. The scheme of a great American Confederacy, therefore, instead of affording a remedy for the evils which already exist, would but serve to aggravate them. It would itself be the parent of new dissensions, which, otherwise, would have no existence. In what has occurred, already, the germs of these dissensions are plainly distinguishable. We claim to be the head of the American powers. In the beau-ideal of this new planetary system, sketched by Mr. Clay, in 1820, we were, indeed, to be, not the orb of first magnitude merely, but the centre, around which all the other orbs were to revolve. At one period, our claim to this pre-eminence seemed to be acknowledged. When the project of the great American Congress was first communicated to this Government, it was intimated that the United States were to be invited to preside. But we hear nothing of this now. We are only invited as one among others. In the mean time, Colombia takes the lead, and our jealousy is excited in turn, as the letter from Mr. Adams to Mr. Forbes very plainly indicates. Here, then, we see the germ of these jealousies which would inevitably distract and embroil the great American Confederacy, as they have every other Confederacy which has gone before it. The United States and Colombia will be the Athens and the Sparta of this Modern Amphictyonic League, and their rivalry would lead to a Peloponnesian war, far more desolating and tremendous than that of which Grecian annals afford us the account.

Mission to Panama.

Mr. BUCKNER next rose and addressed the committee as follows:

Mr. Chairman: The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Delaware, (Mr. MOLLAY,) and that by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RIVES,) are nothing less than conditions, or restrictions, attempted to be imposed upon the constitutional power of the President. That the latter gentleman so understands them is evident, by the illustration of his argument which he gave, in speaking of the right, which he who has the power of granting possesses, of annexing whatever conditions he may think proper to his grant. If the gentleman had reflected a moment, it appears to me that his clear and discriminating mind could not have failed to observe the utter inaptitude of the comparison. There is not the slightest analogy between the conditions on which a grant by deed is made, and an appropriation by Congress. He who grants that to which he has an unqualified title, is certainly at liberty to dispose of it as he pleases, and upon whatever terms he may think proper. But has Congress the right to grant the money of the people to any one, and upon whatever terms we may choose?

Has the gentleman forgotten that the word grant, in a deed, has a technical signification, very different from that in which we use it when we speak of a grant of money? When we appropriate money to pay the salaries of the different officers of Government, have we a right to impose conditions? When we appropriate money to pay the salary of the President, can we say we do it on condition that he will pursue a certain course of policy pointed out? Can we, in like manner, make provision for the salaries of the judges of the Supreme Court, but do it upon the condition that they will decide some given case consistently with our opinions of the principles upon which the decision should be founded? The Senate, in the confirmation of a treaty, must be consulted; the concurrence of a certain portion of its members is essential. If the President has a right to demand our advice, so has the Senate. It must rest on the same grounds. In what a ridiculous attitude would they present themselves before us, to ask our advice with respect to the course they should pursue on such an occasion.

It is unwise that we should, by an interference in the form of advice, diminish that responsibility which the constitution has placed on the Executive, and the Senate, his advisers. I am not willing, sir, to interpose my little finger between the President and Senate, and that censure from the people, which inevitably awaits them, if, by carelessness—by a want of political foresight—or from any other cause growing out of this mission—they involve us in an unnecessary and ruinous war. If, however, it eventuates differently—as I most earnestly hope, and confidently believe, it will)—if, thereby, our commercial prospects are brightened—the best interests of the nation consulted—the cause of humanity and of liberty advanced—I am not so unjust as to wish to break a twig, or to pluck even a leaf from the civic wreath which the people of the United States will prepare, with which to entwine their brows.

Mr. Chairman, if it be proper for us to express our opinions, not only on the general expediency of this mission, but to point out with precision, and in detail, the point to which this Government may safely go, and the point beyond which it would be ruinous to venture, have we not a right to demand all the information upon which the President himself has acted? We cannot be reasonably called upon to take a leap in the dark. What are the terms of the resolution, in obedience to which the Executive made his communication to this House? He was called upon by that resolution to lay before this House so much of the correspondence between the Government of the United States, and the new States of America, or their Ministers, respecting the proposed Congress, or meeting of Diplomatic Agents at Panama, and such information respecting the general character of that expected Congress, as might be in his possession, and might, in his opinion, be communicated without prejudice to the public interest; and also, to inform us, as far as, in his opinion, the public interest might allow, in regard to what objects the agents of the United States were expected to take part in the deliberations of that Congress. We may then have a whole, or a part only, of the testimony before us. It is very probable that, in this case, we have all; but I speak on principles alike applicable to every case of this description. Sir, it is not a matter of discretion with us. We are not authorized to take upon ourselves a responsibility which our constitutional duty has not devolved on us. The Executive is not bound—and, in some cases, would act most unwisely, whilst negotiating a treaty, to lay all the information which might be in his possession upon the subject, even before the Senators, who are his constitutional advisers. We are told, that this is an unprecedented measure, and that in such view this House may be justified in pursuing, in relation to it, an unprecedented course. There is an obvious distinction between a course simply unprecedented, and one which is justly subject to that charge, and is, moreover, unconstitutional. Gentlemen do not, and cannot, point out a single example, in the whole history of our diplomatic proceedings, in which such an interference, on the part of the House of Representatives, has been attempted. But, it is not true, that the proposed mission will be an acknowledged departure from the settled policy of this Government. If it were true, as asserted, that we are about to enter into an alliance, offensive and defensive, to link our destinies with those of any other Government, then, indeed, it would be an acknowledged departure—then, indeed, would there be ground for apprehension; but, as the subject is now presented to us, the supposed cause of alarm is as airy as the baseless fabric of a vision. It seems to have originated in a most uncharitable and unfounded suspicion of the sincerity and integrity of the Executive. Can it reasonably be supposed, that the Administration will knowingly pursue a course alike ruinous to itself and to the country! As well might we expect to see one in the full enjoyment of his intellectual faculties—before whom was placed for his choice, health and happiness on one hand—death on the other—madly rushing upon the instrument of his own destruction.

Let us now, Mr. Chairman, consider the nature of the invitation which we have received from the Republics of Colombia, Mexico, and Central America, to be represented by our diplomatic agents at the Congress at Panama; the danger, if any, to be apprehended by an acceptance; and the objects worthy the attention of this Government, which the occasion may afford us an opportunity of securing. It was urged by my colleague, that we have received invitations from three only of the South American nations, whose Ministers compose that Congress. What inference he designed to draw from it, I am at a loss to conjecture, unless he would consider our attendance there as an intrusion upon those who have not joined in the invitation. They have all been long since informed of the intention of the Executive, that this Government would be represented at the Congress, if the Senate of the United States should give their sanction. Had any one of these Republics felt any dissatisfaction at the invitation given to us, and conditionally accepted, it is reasonable to presume they would have informed us of it. But this objection of my colleague directly conflicts with the ground which he immediately thereafter takes, in which he attributes the invitations, and the desire of those Republics that we should accept them, to entirely selfish, interested motives.

The objection, sir, appears to me to have but very little weight. Should they even refuse to treat or confer with us, we shall occupy ground less disadvantageous than we should have done by an uncivil and unfriendly rejection of their very kind and respectful invitations. In speaking of the risk which we are to encounter, by an attendance at that Congress, of being drawn into the vortex of ruinous entangling alliances, gentlemen appear to exert their powers of ingenuity, not of argument, but of supposition, to show the unlimited extent of the powers of the agents who compose it. If my view of the subject be correct, the extent of the powers with which they may be invested, presents no objects of terror to us. So far from it, I shall insist that, the greater it may be, the better for us; at least, so far as to ensure to us an opportunity of conferring and agreeing upon such principles of international law, with ministers of competent authority, and adjusting by treaty or otherwise, such matters as may be deemed of importance to the security or prosperity of this nation; and that, in no point of view, can we be injured by it, however unlimited. But it is really somewhat amusing to observe how far some gentlemen have permitted the most unbridled fancy to conjure up a thousand chimerical dangers, arising from powers equally chimerical. My colleague, in particular, seems to have suffered under the terrors of this vision. He favored us with a comparison of the powers of this Congress, and the nature of the alliance between the South American Republics and the powers of our former Congress, and the alliance of the States under the Articles of our former Confederation. He discovered, in some respects, a most striking similitude; yet he surely would not deny that, in many most important points, no two bodies of men could, in their powers, be more dissimilar.

I said, Mr. Chairman, that however unlimited the powers of the Ministers who compose that Congress might be, they presented no cause of terror to us. From whom do they derive their authority? From their respective Governments. Have those Governments any, the slightest control over us, by contract or otherwise? Have we bound ourselves by treaty? Have we formed any alliance whatever with them? Should Mr. Salazar, and Mr. Obregon, and Mr. Canaz, present themselves before this Government, with authority on paper, as unlimited as Heaven's expanse, and tell us that they came to propose to us an abolition of this Government; or to treat for a purchase of the United States; would any man be alarmed? "Shall I be frightened when a madman stares?" It has been said that they have a right to interpret treaties. That power, like all the others which they possess, is conferred on them by their respective Governments, and would no more affect us, than we could injure them by passing a resolution that certain commissioners named, should determine all controverted points arising out of any treaties between them and ourselves.

Mr. Chairman, it has been insisted by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Rives,) that if we send Ministers, we are committed to take part in the deliberations of the Congress, concerning an alliance; and, to support him in this, he adverts to the terms of the invitation on the part of the Ministers in behalf of their respective Governments, and of the acceptance by Mr. Clay. Were it true that we should be bound to take part in those discussions, can the gentleman perceive such a discussion to be fraught with any ruinous or deleterious consequences? To a certain extent, I hope they will take part in the discussion. It will be but a proper response to that politeness and good feeling which dictated the invitations; that our Ministers should meet them, and by every argument that may be suggested, in the most conciliatory manner, satisfy them of the impropriety of binding ourselves by treaty upon the subject. Let them be assured, again and again, if necessary, that the people of the United States feel no diminution of that deep solicitude for their prosperity, and the preservation of their independence unimpaired, which they have manifested on all suitable occasions. Let us advise them, when advice may be asked; but enter into no such alliance as that spoken of by the gentleman, of uniting our and their destinies, by a league, offensive and defensive. An idea of such an alliance has never entered the head of any one of the advocates of the proposed mission. But I will turn to the proof relied on, and, from that, show that those Governments have no right to hope for such an alliance; nay, that they do not even solicit it of us.

Mr. Salazar to Mr. Clay, in his communication of the 2d of November, 1825, says: "Of the points which will be under discussion by the Assembly of Panama, the undersigned is unable to give a minute enumeration, as they will, evidently, arise out of the deliberations of the Congress. He is, however, authorized by his Government to assure the United States, that these points have no tendency to violate their professed principles of neutrality." Again: "It belongs to each of the concurring parties to propose their views; but the voice of the United States will be heard with the respect and deference which its early labors in a work of such importance will merit." And again, in language still less capable of misconstruction: "The manner in which all colonization of European powers on the American continent shall be resisted, and their interference in the present contest between Spain and her former colonies prevented, are other points of great interest. Were it proper, [mark the language!] an eventual alliance in case these events should occur, which is within the range of possibilities, and the treaty, of which no use could be made, until the casus foderis should happen, to remain secret; or, if this should seem premature, a convention so anticipated would be different means to secure the same end."

Mr. Obregon says, that, "one of the subjects which will occupy the attention of the Congress, will be the resistance, or opposition, to the interference of any neutral nation in the question and war of independence between the new powers of the continent and Spain." But in no part of his official communication does he speak of an expected alliance between them and the United States.

In refusing, therefore, for the present, to bind this Government on the subject, those Republics will have no cause of complaint against us. That such a coalition, made public in Europe, would be calculated to aid them in the maintenance of their independence, is a proposition not altogether devoid of doubt. How far we, the people of the United States, might, in consenting to it, incur the censure or hatred of the crowned heads of Europe, it would be as unworthy of us, as it would be derogatory to the character of our forefathers, to inquire.

The objection to such a course is, that it would be a departure from the policy which Washington recommended, and to which we have strictly adhered, from the very commencement of the Government—enjoying peace, with a short interval, and unexampled prosperity, whilst Europe has groaned under the affliction of the most desolating wars. Yet, if the powers of Europe should attempt to aid Spain in the resubjugation of South America or Mexico, or to colonize any part of either, it would be difficult to satisfy me that it would not be a duty we owe to ourselves, upon the performance of which might depend the quietude, if not the safety of the United States, to take part in the contest, in aid of these Republics. In such a struggle, we could not, if we desired, remain neutral. We should be forced, if we did not voluntarily enter, into the vortex; and God forbid that we should ever raise our arms but in defence of justice and of liberty.

Although, in the language of the present Executive, as quoted by my colleague, the people of the United States do not go abroad in search of monsters to destroy; yet, if monsters declare a war of extermination against freedom, throughout the world, and should attempt to enforce their most abominable doctrines, in our very neighborhood, upon our sister Republics; I, for one, am not willing to see the United States stand and supinely look on as idle gazers, as if not conscious that they must, in their turn, be called upon to offer their liberty and independence as a sacrifice to those monsters. These, however, are but my opinions, which, as a member of the House of Representatives, will never be obtruded on the Executive and Senate as the basis of any negotiation. Let those judge whom the constitution calls on to judge. In speaking of the celebrated declaration of Mr. Monroe, in his message to Congress, the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. McLANE) says, "we ought to have acted on it in 1823; that it ought not to be permitted to stand, unless we intend to comply." What was that declaration? Let any one read it, and say of what he disapproves. It contains a pledge, we are told. To whom? Not to the Governments of South America: they do not understand it in that way. Mr. Salazar, in his letter to Mr. Clay, speaks of it as a bare declaration, or protest. It is very generally admitted, that salutary consequences have resulted from it; and we are now called upon to retract. The declaration, in my humble opinion, was dictated with great political foresight, and accorded with the feelings of the whole nation.

Had we acted upon it in 1823, was there a gentleman on this floor who, if he had considered it as his duty to speak at all on the subject, would have said less? Is there one who would now say less? If there is, he would not speak the language of this nation. Nothing ever was better said, or more appropriately timed; and yet, we are cautioned to consider well, whether we should be prepared to act accordingly, when the occasion is presented. Sir, we cannot, at this time, if we would, withdraw this declaration, without subjecting ourselves to the charge of the most manifest injustice, and unfeeling cruelty to those whom we call friends. Better, by far, that we had never opened our lips on the subject, than now to recant. It would be no very indirect invitation to the powers of Europe, who may have formed a coalition for that purpose, to attempt the execution of their nefarious project of the universal prostration of the principles of true liberty. It would add one other memorable example to the many, which the history of the world has furnished, that those who are the most clamorous in their protestations of friendship, are not the most to be relied on. Not that I insinuate that we labor under any obligation to any of the South American Governments, to comply with the declaration at any time. Of that we will determine, when it is meet to determine: this only I say, that all the obligations of honor, of friendship, of justice, demand that we should not now retract it. No principle of policy, no rule, of even the most timid caution, can justify such a disavowal, when it is not necessary to act upon it. Are we freemen, and shall we fear to speak our sentiments? No, sir; for the sake of humanity, of justice—for the honor of my country, I hope we shall not take back one word.

Let me add a word or two on the subject of the condition of the islands of Cuba and Porto Rico, in answer to the remarks of my colleague, and I shall occupy the attention of the committee no longer. The invasion of those islands by the United States of Mexico and Colombia, we are informed, is avowedly among the objects to be matured by the belligerent States at Panama. Should the project of invasion be carried into effect, it requires no great foresight to discover that the most alarming and calamitous consequences might result from it to the United States. Their importance to us, in a commercial point of view, is obvious. The character of a large portion of their population; their contiguity to our shores; the influence on a certain portion of the population of the United States, which the tragic scenes, the probable result of such an invasion might produce, are considerations of a most momentous nature. The probability, moreover, arising out of such an invasion, that they might fall into the hands of some European power, whose policy it might be to embarrass, as much as possible, our commerce, is, in my opinion, a matter which, connected with the other aspect of it, closes the door against all possible doubt of the propriety of our being ably represented at the Congress, and of endeavoring, if possible, to avert a catastrophe as terrible as it is certain, unless prevented by our timely exertions. Mr. Chairman, if the President of the United States had omitted to use his best exertions to prevent such evils, he would have deserved the execrations of his countrymen, as worse than a traitor.

Non-Alienation of Cuba to any European power.

Before the committee rose, Mr. MARKLEY read the following resolutions, which he intended to offer, should the present amendment not prevail:

Resolved, As the sense of this House, that the United States could not see, with indifference, the transfer of the island of Cuba from Spain to any other European power.

Resolved, That this House approves the course adopted by the President, as manifested by the official correspondence laid before the House, in endeavoring to dissuade the Governments of Colombia and Mexico from any attempt to conquer or take possession of said island.

Resolved, As the sense of this House, that, although the time has passed, when there existed any probability of a combination among the other powers of Europe to co-operate with Spain in attempts to conquer her former American colonies, now Independent States; yet, in the judgment of this House, the declaration of the late President of the United States, in relation to that subject, in his Message to both Houses of Congress, in December, 1823, was wise, seasonable, and patriotic; that it reserved to this Government an uncontrolled power of deciding or acting, in any crisis, as our interest and policy might require; that it had a tendency, in concurrence with other causes, to prevent such combination as above mentioned; and that the sentiments of that declaration, if circumstances should, hereafter, unhappily and unexpectedly arise, to make them again applicable, would be strictly conformable to the duty and true policy of the United States.

The committee then rose, and the House adjourned.

SATURDAY, April 7.

Massachusetts Militia Claims.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. BUCHANAN in the chair, on the bill "allowing compensation to the State of Massachusetts, for militia services, performed during the last war."

Mr. DWIGHT rose and said: The claim results, sir, from the reciprocal rights and duties conceded to the States, and guaranteed by the General Government, at the time of the adoption of the constitution.

By that compact, in her character of a sovereign and independent State, Massachusetts surrendered to you the purse and the sword; the fiscal and the physical energies of her dominion, to be used by you for the purposes of the general welfare.

Aware of the importance of these powers, and of the incompetency of the States to protect themselves, when you should have drawn out their revenues derived from the customs, you guaranteed to them, by the fourth section of the fourth article of the constitution, "protection," not only against foreign "invasion," but against "domestic violence." From domestic violence, God forbid that she should ever have occasion to ask your protection. The character of her citizens forbids such an apprehension. But from invasion she has been, and may again be, compelled to ask protection from those to whom she has surrendered the means by which she would otherwise have protected herself.

The principles of the social compact of Government itself, would justify the claim, independent of the special obligations which the United States have assumed as an equivalent for the privileges granted by the States. Under what Government of the earth, he would ask, would the expenditure necessarily incurred by the defence of an integral portion of the empire, be thrown exclusively upon the citizens of that particular territory? Where, but under colonial vassalage, could such a doctrine maintain? Even there, the colony would have an exemption, which a State has not, from the burthens incident to the defence of the General Government.

How much more strongly, sir, do such obligations rest upon the Government of the United States, by the fundamental law of the country—the constitution under which we live.

Independent of their revenues, which are justly termed the sinews of war, the States surrendered, as a means of defence, under certain specified emergencies, their militia to the United States.

By the constitution, article 1, section 8, it is provided that Congress shall have power to provide for calling forth the militia—

To execute the laws of the Union,

To suppress insurrections,

And to repel invasions.

And also to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States: reserving to the States respectively, the appointment of the officers, and the authority of training the militia, according to the discipline prescribed by Congress.

By these provisions, it is manifest, that, notwithstanding the laudable State jealousy which they evince, still the militia of the States are, to the General Government, the right arm of the national defence; and by the other clause, that of "raising and supporting armies and maintaining navies," the General Government were provided with the means of carrying on their offensive operations against the common enemy, wherever a blow might be struck with effect.

For purposes, then, merely municipal, as it regards ourselves, and strictly defensive, as it regards the enemy, the militia of the States compose the force upon which the General Government may, and perhaps ought, exclusively to rely.

Beyond this he could never go, in the construction of the powers of the General Government over the militia, who are, in effect, the people of the States.

Can we suppose, for a moment, that, by the constitution, the freemen of this country can be called from their occupations, against their principles, their interests, and their wishes, to a war of conquest and aggrandizement, by some ambitious and unprincipled Administration that shall hereafter get into place?

To prosecute what war with effect? he would ask. An offensive war!!!—Will the people of the States for a moment tolerate the doctrine that the militia of Massachusetts may be marched to the conquest of Mexico, or those of Georgia to the conquest of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick?

Are the yeomen of sovereign States to be made liable to a conscription more indiscriminating and not less odious than that of Bonaparte?

Having shown that those errors of constitutional opinion might exist in men who were devoted to the interests and honor of the country, he would proceed to show, from the documents themselves, that a due regard to the security and protection of the country must have animated the Government, even at that time; and that, before any actual invasion in eighteen hundred and fourteen, the Government of Massachusetts had, practically, abandoned the offensive constitutional doctrines.

Indeed, the militia were, in several instances, to the number of three thousand, voluntarily submitted to the command and direction of General Dearborn, during the Summer and Fall of 1814, and that command accepted by him. This could not have been done unless the Governor had himself revised, or, at least, doubted the opinion of the Supreme Court, sanctioned by him in 1812; for no invasion actually existed, and the President himself was not there in person to assume the command.

It may, to be sure, be said, that, as late as September, 1814, the Governor refused to put the troops detached for the defence of Boston, under the command of an officer of the United States. I am not aware that any specific request was made to him for that purpose, but, if there were, it is quite apparent that the decision of 1812 was not made the ground of refusal. Indeed, during that month, eleven or twelve hundred troops were actually placed in the forts of Boston harbor, under the command of General Dearborn, but more immediately commanded by his son, then a Brigadier General in the Massachusetts militia. To show the intentions and sentiments of the Government of Massachusetts, it may be well to refer to the order of events, from the breaking out of the war down to the period just alluded to.

By reference to the order of July, 1812, in pursuance of the requisition of the General Government for the Massachusetts quota of 100,000 men, it will be seen that the militia were called upon by every consideration which could rouse their spirits as men, or their loyalty as patriots, to hold themselves in readiness to march at a moment's warning for the defence of the State. No remarks, sir, can do justice to the spirit and sentiments of this order. He would, therefore, take leave to quote from it some of those sentiments, which he considered as triumphantly repelling the charge of an attempt to thwart the views of the General Government in regard to the defence of the country.

"War having been declared, the Commander-in-Chief calls upon the militia of Massachusetts duly to notice the solemn and interesting crisis, and exhorts them to meet the occasion with constancy and firmness. When war is commenced, no human foresight can discern the time of its termination, or the course of events that may follow in its train—but the path of duty is the path of safety. Providence seldom abandons to ruin those, who, to a just reliance upon the superintending influence of Heaven, add their own strenuous exertions to preserve themselves."

He then goes on to recommend a close and persevering attention to the duties of their several stations; that the men may be perfectly armed, equipped, and disciplined; that the officers may thoroughly understand their duty; and that they all may be ready with "alacrity and effect to defend their country, their constitutional rights and their liberties, which are not only our birthrights, but which, at the expense of so much blood and treasure, were purchased in the late Revolution."

"The Commander-in-Chief further orders and directs that the Generals and other officers of the militia of Massachusetts, bearing in mind the possibility of a sudden invasion, hold themselves, and the corps under their command, in constant readiness to assemble and march to the defence of any part or parts of the Commonwealth, pursuant to the orders to be given by him, but without waiting for such orders in case of actual invasion, or such imminent danger thereof as will not admit of delay."

If this be thwarting the views of the General Government, sir, it would follow that those views were hostile to a patriotic defence of the territory of Massachusetts, which he hoped no man would be willing to impute to the Government of the United States.

This was the order under which the militia of Massachusetts were to move throughout the war: wherever invasion threatened there they were to march. Is this, sir, throwing obstacles in the way of the General Government? True, sir, there was, at that time, in the Government of Massachusetts, an opposition, a constitutional one, to the men in power; and who is there that would dare to call upon the people of any State to surrender its right to judge what class of men are most competent to wield the power of the nation? But, this right of opinion was not exercised in a manner calculated to obstruct the measures of the General Government. In the letter of the Governor to the Secretary of War, of the 5th August, 1812, he says: the companies to be marched to Passamaquoddy and Eastport will be stationed there "until the President shall otherwise direct," and, in conclusion, he remarks, that he is fully disposed to afford all the aid to the measures of the National Government which the constitution requires of him; but, he presumes, it will not be expected or desired that he should fail in the duty he owed to the people of the State, who had confided their interest to his care.

This letter, sir, is an argument to show, that the mode of calling out the militia proposed by General Dearborn, would invite the aggressions of the enemy, and diminish the power which Massachusetts then had of resistance.

And, what was the mode subsequently proposed by Gen. Dearborn? It will be remembered that the militia of Massachusetts were organized into companies of sixty-four, according to the laws of the United States, and his requisition was, for the militia, in companies of one hundred each, according to the organization of the regular army, and contrary to the existing law of the United States in regard to the organization of the militia. No argument need be made to show the practical inconvenience which would result from such a call, nor its tendency to defeat the constitutional provision, which was reserved to the States, of appointing their officers and training the militia, according to discipline prescribed by Congress.

In July, 1818, the regular troops were removed from the State of Massachusetts, to carry on the war upon the northern frontier. The course taken by Massachusetts, therefore, did not diminish the power of the General Government to prosecute the war with effect, wherever the enemy could be met.

Ann, 1826.]

Massachusetts Militia Claims.

[H. OF R.]

In July, 1814, a requisition was made by Gen. Dearborn upon the Governor, for eleven hundred men, and notwithstanding the strong objection which resulted from the organization into companies of one hundred, as proposed by that call, they were placed under his command, for the three months required.

At the same time, Gen. King was authorized to call out the militia of his division, in Maine, and place them in the forts along that seaboard, should the officers of the United States require it.

The Major-Generals of the fifth division, including the counties of Plymouth, Bristol, and Barnstable; of the second division, in the county of Essex; of the sixth and twelfth divisions, comprising the counties of York and Cumberland—all of which bordered upon the seacoast, were directed to keep guards at the points of danger, and have the militia in constant readiness to march, at the shortest notice, for the defence of any place that might be attacked.

The alarm had, during this Summer, become almost universal along the seacoast, of six hundred miles, from Rhode Island to the eastern extremity of Maine, which Massachusetts had to defend, without the aid of any of the regular troops.

British ships of war were hovering on our coast. Every place was exposed. Every thing was in danger from an effective force of the enemy of eight or ten thousand men, enabled by the fleet to which they were attached, to make a descent upon any point of this long-extended line of seacoast.

Boston was considered the object of the enemy. The British Admiral threatened the towns on the seaboard generally, with destruction. But the United States naval depot at Charlestown, and the wealth of our capital, at once excited the avarice and the love of glory of the enemy. Apprehension became universal, and the danger of invasion was so imminent, that the Government issued new orders for the whole militia of the Commonwealth to be in readiness. Five regiments of infantry, two battalions of artillery, and several independent and rifle companies—the flower of Massachusetts—were marched from the centre and extremity of the Commonwealth for the defence of the capital—and remained encamped in the vicinity for several weeks, until the apprehension had subsided, or at least the danger had gone by. As one of that corps, he could himself bear testimony to the alacrity with which the troops came out, and the unfeigned joy with which they were received as the defenders of the capital. To any one acquainted with the occurrences of that period, and the threats of the enemy, it would be superfluous to say, that these measures averted the calamities which would have followed the threatened attacks of the enemy. Twenty-five hundred men were marched from the county of Norfolk, after a notice of twenty-four hours, for the defence of Boston; and eleven hundred and sixty men were placed, in September of this year, under the command of the United States officer, and stationed in the forts of Boston harbor.

A regiment was stationed also at Cambridgeport, and, at the request of General Dearborn, all the militia within twenty miles of Boston, were kept in constant preparation to be called out.

It is true, that the troops ordered out at this period, with the exception of those alluded to in the forts of Boston harbor, were not placed under the command of the officers of the United States. They were ordered out, in companies of sixty-four, according to their habitual organization, under the laws of the United States, and not according to the requisition of the officers of the General Government. It is believed that such new and illegal organization would, if not resisted by the militia themselves, at least have thwarted the patriotic purposes for which they were summoned to the field.

Indeed, the Governor, at this period, announced to the Secretary of War, that he had not placed them under the superintendence of the chief of that military district, because such inconveniences and objections had arisen from having done so before, that he could not repeat the measure.

The cotemporaneous opinion of the officers of the Navy, show how justly these measures were appreciated, and how they estimated the alacrity of the troops in coming to the defence of the naval depot.

Commodore Bainbridge, in his letter of April 6, 1814, expresses to General Welles "the gratification he received in witnessing the ready disposition of General Brooks, of himself, and the military under their command, in affording aid in defence of the frigate Constitution." And Captain Jones, in his letter to the same militia officer, says, that the proofs "of zeal and alacrity to repel meditated attacks of the enemy, evinced in the correspondence, are extremely gratifying, and ensured the safety of the flourishing town of Charlestown and the naval property which the enemy is so desirous to destroy."

The President, himself, in his Message of February, 1824, speaking of the services of the fifth division, the accounts in regard to which had been audited at the War Department, says, that the services rendered by it were spontaneous, patriotic, and proper; necessary for self-defence, to repel, in some instances, actual invasion, and in others to meet, by adequate preparation, invasions that were menaced.

Never, says he, in the same communication, was there a moment when the confidence of the Government in the great body of our fellow-citizens of Massachusetts, was impaired, nor is there a doubt that they were at all times willing to support their rights, and to repel an invasion by the enemy. He goes on to say, that essential service was rendered in the late war by the militia of Massachusetts, and from the most patriotic motives. It seems just, therefore, says he, that they should be compensated in like manner with the militia of the other States.

Even the remonstrance of the Portland officers against being placed under the command of officers of the United States, contains a sentiment of lofty patriotism, which, he thought, might well indicate the general feeling which animated the citizens of his State. They were ready to defend their country from invasion, and had courage to preserve it unpolluted by any hostile foot.

When the little town of Brewster was laid under contribution, (a common calamity of war,) and was obliged to pay money to preserve its valuable salt works—which Captain Baggott threatened to destroy—the committee of the adjoining town of Orleans declare, that they are doubtful whether the paying such a tribute be consistent with our duty to our country, or our adherence to the constitution. And they very justly remark, that the money so paid, will enable the enemy to prosecute the war against other towns with more vigor.

Those who are disposed to look into the detail of these alarms, and the measures taken to repel the enemy along the southern coast, will be enabled to form a just estimate of both, by looking into the orders published by the direction of Major-General Goodwin, of the fifth division.

He felt convinced that the time allotted to him, would not enable him to do that justice in the detail, to the militia of Massachusetts, which their patriotism and their services would require.

Forty-four thousand of the militia were called out in that State during the war.

He would go on now to consider, for a moment, the particular provisions of the bill upon the table, which proposes to place the claims of the State upon the same footing as the claims of the other States for similar services. It provides—

1st. That they shall be paid where the services were rendered in compliance with the requisition of an officer of the United States.

2d. Where they were called out to repel invasion, or under a well-founded apprehension of invasion. Provided the numbers were not in undue proportion to the exigency.

3d. Where the troops were not specifically withheld from an officer of the United States applying for the same to the Governor, under an authority so to do from the General Government.

Having shown, as he confidently believed, that the abstract constitutional questions had no effect upon the character, usefulness, or patriotism, of the services rendered, and, indeed, that the constitutional question was practically abandoned before the important services were rendered, he might ask, who could feel opposed to the provisions of a bill which proposed to put those claims upon the same footing of all other claims for similar services?

Mr. SPRAGUE, of Maine, addressed the committee as follows:

Mr. Chairman: I am in favor of the bill; and I am induced to offer my reasons for being so, because I cannot entirely coincide in opinion with either of the gentlemen from Massachusetts (Mr. DAVIS and Mr. DWIGHT) who have addressed you; and because the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. Housron) has been pleased to say, that no one who was in the minority of Massachusetts during the late war, can support the bill, or receive money under it, without a violation of consistency—without, indeed, an abandonment of principle. Sir, the State which I have the honor in part to represent, and all her Representatives upon this floor, were in that minority. She will receive a portion of the money provided for by the bill, and I am unwilling, by silence, to admit that imputations can rest upon that character for political consistency, which we have so hardly earned and so long maintained.

It is first asked, why should the claim of Massachusetts be allowed? I answer, because it is just in itself, and because similar claims have been allowed to other States.

It is just in itself. The several States have conceded the General Government the power of peace and war, and the revenues by which war is to be prosecuted and aggression repelled; and it is the duty of the General Government to protect each State against invasion. This duty is not left to inference, but is imposed, in express terms, in the fourth section of the fourth article of the constitution. This high obligation, thus assumed by the fundamental compact, is brought into most vigorous exercise when the United States declared war: for then an enemy is created without the consent of the State; the time and circumstances of the declaration are selected by the General Government; and, most assuredly, it ought to defend the citizens from the attacks which it has thus deliberately challenged. If it do not, but leaves a State to exhaust its own resources in repelling the enemy, the United States are bound to repay the sums which shall have been thus expended.

This proposition is so clear that it hardly admits of argument or illustration. It rests upon those eternal principles of justice and good faith by which every judicial tribunal proceeds in enforcing engagements between man and man. Principles, which are fundamental in the jurisprudence of every enlightened country; which the United States have recognized and enforced; and, in obedience to which, Congress have acted, in granting claims, ever since the organization of the Government.

This very subject of militia services has presented itself, and the United States have paid large sums to several States, for expenses incurred in defending themselves during the late war, without any previous request or assent on the part of the General Government. Such were the claims of Maryland and New York. This principle has not only been acted upon in particular cases, but established as a general rule. In a letter from Mr. Calhoun, Secretary of War, to the Third Auditor, written on the 14th of February, 1818, in reference to the claims of the State of Maryland, he says: "You will admit all the expenditures by the State that are of the usual character in such cases, and properly vouched, where the militia have been called out on actual or well-founded fear of invasion." And, in a letter of 30th of March, 1818, the same officer, in reference to the claims of New York, says: "In the settlement of similar accounts, it has been established by this Department as a principle, that the United States are liable for all the disbursements made by the State on account of militia called out by authority of the United States; provided such disbursements were for the usual military supplies, and such as are authorized by law for the militia. The same principle applies where the militia have been called out by the State authority, and afterwards recognized by the President, or where they have been called out on a sudden invasion, or well-founded fear of invasion."

The bill before us is founded upon these principles and these precedents. It proposes to pay to Massachusetts the sum which she necessarily expended in protecting herself from invasion, during a war declared by the United States. It is to extend to her the same measure of justice which has been meted out to the other members of the Confederacy, and which has been withheld from her, and her only. Such being the character of the bill, I cannot doubt that every gentleman who hears me would wish to give it his support, and repay to Massachusetts the sums which she has paid in discharging the obligations of the General Government, unless there be some insuperable objection, involving a violation of principle.

What, then, are the objections which have been urged against it? The speech of the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. Houston,) rests solely upon certain doctrines and conduct of Massachusetts during the war. His objection, reduced to distinct form, is, that you cannot pass this bill without giving your sanction to those doctrines and that conduct. This, indeed, comprises all that has been urged, here or elsewhere, which is entitled to be considered as an objection. Those doctrines were—first, that to the State Executive belongs the right to judge of the existence of the exigencies upon which the militia are to be called forth into the service of the United States; and, secondly, that, when called forth, the militia cannot be lawfully commanded by any officer of the United States, except by the President in person. These doctrines were, unquestionably, erroneous. I thought so then—I think so still—I have never had a doubt of it. I have resisted them from the first moment of their promulgation; and far be it from me now to say, or do, or assent to any thing which would establish them as true. The claim of Massachusetts is not, for a moment, to be put in competition with a sound construction of the constitution—it is but as the dust in the balance, in the comparison.

By passing the bill, you undoubtedly approve of the militia services for which it makes payment. But you do not thereby sanction the opinions and conduct which have been mentioned, unless they were so connected with the services that you cannot countenance the one without opposing the other. Were they so connected? At first view, it would seem difficult to perceive how services, actually performed, should be considered as growing out of a refusal to render service. But, without relying upon this, I ask your attention to the transactions of the period when these expenses were incurred. Let us see what was done, and not merely what was said.

The act of 10th of April, 1812, authorized a detachment from the militia of 100,000 men, of which each State was to furnish its quota; and the President was authorized to call them into actual service, in all the exigencies provided for by the constitution. In the same month of April, 1812, the Secretary of War requested the Governors of the several States to hold their respective quotas of said detachment in readiness; and, on the 22d of June following, four days after the declaration of war, General Dearborn requested the Governor of Massachusetts to call into actual service forty-one companies as a part of the Massachusetts quota of said detachment, under the act of April, 1812. This requisition was sanctioned by the President, and enforced by a letter from the Secretary of War to the Governor of Massachusetts, written on the 21st of July, 1812. The Executive of Massachusetts then consulted the Judges of the Supreme Court of that State, and thereupon advanced those erroneous doctrines respecting the constitutional power over the militia, which have been so much and so justly censured; and Governor Strong then refused to comply with the requisition which had been made. What was the extent of that refusal? The most obvious answer is, that it was co-extensive with the request, which was confined, in express terms, to a part of the detachment authorized by the law of 1812, and for six months only. But gentlemen may, perhaps, contend that, a part having been called for and withheld, the refusal, if unretracted, is to be considered as operating so long as the detachment and the law of 1812 existed. This is its utmost latitude. It surely could have no effect when the subject matter, upon which it was to act, was gone. When the law ceases to exist, disobedience of it is necessarily at an end. Now, sir, the law of 1812 expired, by its own limitation, on the 10th of April, 1814, and all the expenses for which remuneration is asked, excepting a small fraction, an hundredth part, perhaps, accrued after that period. If, then, the requisition made under the act of 1812 had been fully complied with—nay, sir, if the whole detachment created by that law had been in actual service during the whole term of its existence—it would not have precluded the necessity of the services rendered in the Summer and Autumn of 1814, when the enemy was waging war with his utmost vigor upon our seacoast. The provision for defence, by the law of 1812, was contemplated to extend only to April, 1814, when the law and detachment expired together. So far, then, there was no connection whatever between those erroneous opinions, or refusal, and the militia services subsequently performed.

In April, 1814, commenced a new era. The only act of Congress bearing upon this subject, then remaining in force, was the law of 28th February, 1795. By the first section of that act, it is provided, that, in case of invasion, or imminent danger of invasion, "it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to call forth such number of the militia of the State or States most convenient to the place of danger, or scene of action, as he may judge necessary to repel such invasion, and to issue his orders for that purpose to such officer or officers of the militia as he shall think proper." I cannot agree in the opinion, respecting this law, which has just been expressed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. DWIGHT,) but will endeavor to present my own views of it.

It is to be remembered that, by the constitution, the President has no power to call forth the militia, in any event whatever. He is to be the Commander-in-Chief of the militia, when in actual service. But to Congress, and Congress alone, belongs the power to provide for calling them forth. The law then might as well have vested this authority in any other tribunal or individual as in the President. Suppose that it had declared that the Supreme Court of the United States should judge of the existence and extent of the constitutional exigencies upon which the militia are to be required, and, upon such judgment, should issue their mandate to a militia officer; would it be contended that that court could have constituted an inferior tribunal to form that judgment in their stead, and to issue that mandate? Under this law, the President was only an agent, with defined and delegated powers. And if the principle, that delegated power cannot be again delegated, is ever to be applied, it must be to a case like this, where it was to be exerted upon future contingencies, and a judgment to be formed by the agent upon knowledge to be acquired. It involved the exercise of a most important and delicate discretion. It was strictly fiduciary. The President, then, could not impart this power to others. He could not parcel out the exercise of his discretion, and the forming of his judgment, among a number of inferior officers, and authorize each to judge and to call forth the militia at pleasure. If he could, then the persons so authorized might delegate this power to their inferiors, and these again to others, and so on, without limitation, until the whole militia of the United States might be at the command of the meanest subaltern in the Army.

Will it be said that I am encroaching upon the powers of the General Government over the militia? I am not. I hold that the power of Congress to provide for calling forth the militia is a complete power; they may exercise it at pleasure. But no officer can call for the militia in any other manner than that which has been provided by law; and, if he attempt to do so, he encroaches upon the powers of Congress, and his call is utterly nugatory. Will it be said that General Dearborn was only the medium, a mere conduit, through which the President acted, and that the requisition was the order of the President, issued upon his own judgment, and not dependent upon any discretion in General Dearborn? Sir, all the documents before us, and the whole history of the proceedings of the United States officers in Massachusetts, show that it was otherwise. The nature of the authority intended to be conferred upon that officer, is clearly shown by the letter from the Secretary of War to the Governor of Massachusetts, dated 12th of June, 1812. It is in these words:

"SIR: I am directed by the President to request your Excellency to order into the service of the United States, on the requisition of Major-General Dearborn, such part of the quota of the militia of Massachusetts, detached conformably to the act of 10th April, 1812, as he may deem necessary for the defence of the seacoast."

This is no present order for the militia, but wholly prospective, and makes the calling for them to depend entirely upon the discretion of the officer, and not upon the judgment of the President. It was written before the war existed, while we were at peace with all the world. It does not, indeed, directly appear, that the President attempted to confer authority on General Dearborn, under the law of 1795; although, perhaps, it may be gathered from the tenor of the documents, that it was contemplated that he should exercise the same general discretionary power under this law as under that of 1812. But, as such a power could not be delegated, General Dearborn could possess no authority to call forth the militia.

Another difficulty has presented itself. The gentleman from Tennessee has told us that no officer of the militia is to be commanded by an inferior officer of the Army of the United States. So says Mr. Monroe, in his letter to a committee of the Senate; so say the rules and articles of war, and every other authority upon the subject. I should like, then, to be informed how the commander-in-chief of the militia of a State is bound to obey the orders or commands of a Major-General of the Army of the United States, issued at the will and pleasure of such officer? I put it to the gentleman to answer me. Will he say that such commander-in-chief, with seventy thousand bayonets at his command, and thirteen major-generals under him, is not superior in grade to a General in the Army? No one will pretend it. Will he say that the requisition upon the Governor was to be an order to him as a militia officer? Then it was a mere nullity. The only mode provided by Congress was by an order to an officer of the militia. And a request for troops, so far as relates to its legal efficacy, might as well be addressed to the priest of a parish, or a proctor in a college, as to the Governor of a State, if it be not an order to him as a militia officer.

Sir, the President never issued his order for the militia of Massachusetts, under the act of 1795; and no constitutional provision was made for her defence by the General Government, after April, 1814. She was compelled to defend herself. After the peace in Europe, the enemy was enabled to bring an immense force upon her extended coast, and she was left to exhaust her own resources in repelling the enemy, and protecting the territory of the United States from invasion. These expenditures are wholly disconnected from all censurable acts and erroneous opinions, and we are solemnly bound to make remuneration for them, as we have done for all similar services in other States.

The gentleman from Tennessee has spoken at large of the conduct of Massachusetts during the war; but, after all his laborious researches, he has found but one instance in which, even by his own construction, there was any want of promptitude in repelling the enemy; and that was the case of the little town of Brewster. He spoke somewhat sneeringly of the contribution levied upon that place; and told us, rather significantly, that if he had been there, he would have met the enemy at the point of the bayonet. Yes, sir, if he had lived in a little village of thirty or forty houses, upon a sandy cape, where three British 74s could, within point blank shot, have poured in their whole batteries, and demolish it at once, he would have stood upon the naked beach and met those 74s at the point of the bayonet! It would have been a most gallant action! The gentleman spoke of that which he did not understand. Had he known the hardy Cape Cod men as well as I do, he would have known that there is not upon this earth a set of men that meet an enemy more fearlessly than they do. Such were the men who achieved your victories upon the Lakes, and upon the Ocean, and suffered in the prisons of Dartmoor; and I envy not the man who can speak of their misfortunes with a sneer.

I am not an apologist for the conduct of Massachusetts during the war. There was much of it which I never did, and never can approve. But I would not be indiscriminate in my censure.

I would not be drawn aside from the subject of the militia, which is now more immediately before us, and of which, for the present, I am content to speak. I have before remarked, that General Dearborn had no power to make any authoritative requisitions for the militia after the year 1812. But that brave and faithful officer was anxious that the territory and property within his district should be defended, and, for that purpose, he, at different times, requested that troops should be called forth; and, notwithstanding what has been said by the gentleman from Tennessee, every request made upon the Governor of Massachusetts by General Dearborn, or any other officer of the United States, for the purpose of defence, was substantially complied with after 1812. I do not mean that they were answered in form, and the troops always placed under the officers of the United States, but, that the measures desired were actually adopted. There was concert and arrangement between the officers of the General and State Governments in their exertions to defend the soil.

The first requisition made by General Dearborn, after 1812, was on the 8th of July, 1814, and was for eleven hundred men to be called into service, with suitable officers. On the twelfth of the same July, the Governor of Massachusetts ordered his Adjutant-General to comply with that request, which was done, and the troops placed under the command of an officer of the United States.

The next request was on the 12th of August of the same year, when he desired that small detachments should be turned out, as occasion should require, for the defence of the seacoast. This measure was adopted.

On the 5th of September, 1814, General Dearborn requested about four thousand seven hundred men to be called out, and on the 6th of the same September, he suggested the propriety of having all the militia within twenty or thirty miles of the seacoast on the alert, and ready to march at a moment's warning. On the same 6th of September, the Governor called into service more than four thousand seven hundred troops, and ordered the whole militia of the State to be in constant readiness for an instant march.

On the 17th of the same September, General Dearborn made a requisition for twelve hundred men, which was complied with, and the troops placed under his command, in the forts of the United States.

On the 20th September, 1814, pursuant to previous arrangement, eleven hundred men were ordered by the Executive of Massachusetts, to be placed under the command of an officer of the United States, but difficulties arising from the militia, and not from the Government, prevented this arrangement being carried into effect.

On the 22d of the same September, three hundred men were placed under the command of Col. Walbach, of the United States Army, for the defence of Portsmouth, in New Hampshire.

As early as August, 1812, at the request of General Dearborn, three companies were placed under the command of General Boyd, a United States officer, at Eastport.

In the Spring and Summer of 1814 Commodore Bainbridge, then commander of the United States Navy Yard at Charlestown, made several requests for preparations and aid from the militia, for the defence of the frigate Constitution, and the Navy Yard, and for the erection of forts, all which were with such alacrity complied with as to cause expressions of gratification, not only from the Commodore, but from the Secretary of the Navy himself.

On the 1st of July, 1814, the Governor of Massachusetts gave orders to Major-General King, that, whenever application should be made by an authorized officer of the United States, commanding any of the forts of the United States, for aid to defend them against the approach of an enemy, he should comply with the request, and furnish the number of men desired.

I have thus far confined myself to the transactions of the war, and the circumstances attendant upon the services for which compensation is claimed. Since that time, the Government of Massachusetts have unequivocally renounced those erroneous doctrines which are now urged as so formidable an objection to this bill. Here I wish not to be misunderstood. I do not contend that this renunciation gives any new merits to the claim. It must make its way by its own original strength. But the disavowal removes an obstruction presented to the progress of the claim. It is objected, that you will jeopardize the sound construction of the constitution. But those erroneous expositions having been expressly renounced by the State which advanced them, if you allow the claim after and upon such renunciation, you thereby sanction the disavowal, and repudiate those doctrines. The objection is thus effectually obviated.

The principles of this bill are most safe for the National Treasury: for, however great may have been the expenditures of Massachusetts, no more can be paid to her than it must have cost the United States to have provided for her defence. On the other hand, if her measures were more economical than those of the United States, you derive the whole benefit of that economy; and, in point of fact, if the forty-one companies, called for by General Dearborn, had been in service during the two years that the law of 1812 continued in force, it would have cost the United States hundreds of thousands of dollars, and probably more than the whole existing claim. The citizens of Massachusetts and Maine may have suffered by that refusal; but their defence not being adequately provided for; but it will be an immense benefit to the National Treasury, even when the whole demand of Massachusetts, with interest, shall be allowed.

I am constrained, sir, to acknowledge that I came to this inquiry with prepossessions against the claim; but careful investigation has convinced me of its justice; and I cannot doubt, that every gentleman who will give to the subject a thorough examination, will come to the same result. This conviction is strengthened by the fact, that every committee to whom it has been referred, and there have been not less than three, have reported in favor of the claim; and the late President of the United States, who, of all men in the National Government, had the best means of understanding it, and certainly had no reason to be unduly biassed in its favor, acknowledged its justice, and, by repeated messages to Congress, strongly recommended its payment. I hope, then, that it will not be thought indecorous in me to request gentlemen to come to the consideration of this subject unbiassed, and to discard whatever of prejudice the excitement of past times may have produced: for, prejudice silently and secretly winds its subtle and tenuous web around the mind, until the rays of truth are utterly excluded.

All the errors of Massachusetts have been portrayed in sombre colors, while her merits have been passed by in silence. Even her early sufferings, without which some of those who are now ready to reproach her, would never have breathed the air or lisped the accents of freedom, seems to be almost forgotten. It is not for me to delineate her character; it belongs to other hands. But since all who were citizens of Massachusetts, during the late war, have been visited by indiscriminate denunciations, I trust I may be indulged in saying a few words for that part which now constitutes my own State.

Maine, sir, under all her sufferings, has been, at all times, the firm and undeviating supporter of the cause of our country. Although a great portion of her citizens were dependent upon commerce for their very subsistence, yet, during embargo, restrictions, and war, she beheld her commerce annihilated, her wharves and her shores desolate; her ships, her produce, and her storehouses rotting together, her merchants ruined, her mechanics and sailors reduced from competence to beggary, and misery and want spread through her land—and all without a murmur! She never faltered for a moment; but remained the fearless and unwavering friend of the National Government.

During the war, bordering for more than three hundred miles upon the territories of the enemy, and with nearly the same extent of maritime frontier, indented with innumerable bays and inlets, studded with towns and villages, with millions of shipping in her harbors, when the enemy after the pacification in Europe, was enabled to bring his immense forces upon her shores, and was waging a barbarous warfare, ravaging and making incursions into her territory, when dismay went before him, and desolation followed in his train, she was compelled to meet and stay the enemy alone and unassisted. You sent not a soldier to her relief: nay, her own hardy sons, who had volunteered into your service, were not permitted to remain to defend their own homes and their families, but marched away to the frontiers of New York, to fight the battles of Chippewa and Niagara. Yes, sir, the battles of Chippewa and Niagara! Who composed the ninth regiment, which had just been mentioned by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. DWIGHT,) and which there fought successfully against twice their numbers of British veterans, whilst one-half of their own number had fallen on the field? That regiment was unequalled except by the twenty-first. Yes, the twenty-first! in which fought those, whom Ripley first led from the stubborn soil of Maine; which, when the fate of the battle of Niagara stood suspended, or rather, when it was almost decided against you, turned the tide of war, by a movement so desperate, that the commanding general had not even thought of proposing it to any. But Ripley knew his men, and by his order, under the gallant Miller, they ascended an eminence commanded by all the enemy's artillery, and in the full blaze of their cannon, continued to advance, until they cut down the artillerists at their pieces, and drove the infantry from the position. The British commander, stung to madness by this unexpected defeat, brought, in three successive charges, fresh and redoubled forces, to retake the ground. The conflict was man to man, and bayonet to bayonet—the combatants were commingled—the enemy was beaten. It was a contest which, for obstinate and desperate valor, was unequalled, upon land, during the whole war; and the twenty-first regiment stands unrivalled. And what return has Maine received? Neglect then, and contumely now. At the close of the war, almost all the officers and soldiers from Maine and Massachusetts were coldly turned out of your service. Those who had been "first in the fight" found no room "at the feast." While clouds lowered around us, and the tempest raged, you called upon them to protect you from its fury; but when peace had returned, and all was fair, and calm, and safe, their stern and warlike virtues could be dispensed with. Others found more favor in your eyes; perhaps of more supple form and gayer plumage. I could proceed further in this course of remark, but I am unwilling to do so. It is grating to my feelings to be compelled to speak of my own State; and I should not have done so, had not indiscriminate censure been poured forth upon a people whose fidelity and patriotism have been always conspicuous, in spite of privation, and danger, and neglect, and injury. Maine has done her duty to the utmost; but she has not, like some others, trumpeted her merits. She seeks no rewards. She asks no favors. She demands only equal and impartial justice. And I am confident that justice will not be withheld. Its exercise is enjoined upon you by every consideration of moral right and political expediency. Whilst despots are laboring and combining to prop up their iron thrones, it is our high duty to strengthen and perpetuate our own institutions, as the best service we can render to ourselves and to mankind. To this end, we must on all occasions seek to cement our Union, to bind together all the parts in the bonds of mutual interest, mutual confidence, and mutual affection. One deliberate act of palpable injustice to a State, may chill the warm current of patriotism, and engender distrust and resentment. To adopt the principles which have been advanced in this debate; to punish, stigmatize, and degrade a State, for errors of opinion, must be felt not only as an injury, but as an insult. The wounded spirit will rankle from generation to generation. If you compel the fathers to eat sour grapes, the children's teeth will be set on edge. Reject, then, this novel, this alarming doctrine. Plant not a root of bitterness, which may spring up, and rise, and expand, until it covers and darkens all this fair land.

MONDAY, April 10.

Relief to Florida Indians.

On motion of Mr. COCKE, the orders of the day were postponed, in order to take up the bill for the relief of the Florida Indians, and the House went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pa., in the chair, on that bill.

Mr. COCKE (Chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs) said, that before the House proceeded to the subject of the Panama Mission, (which, he presumed, would be taken up presently,) he would ask that the bill for the relief of the Florida Indians might be considered—it would occupy but a short time, and the necessity for passing it was pressing. A part of these Indians being in a state of actual starvation, and committing, from the pressure of want, depredations on the white population in all directions around them; if any thing was to be done for their relief, humanity dictated that it should be done with as little delay as possible.

Mr. DWIGHT said he understood the object of the bill, as avowed by the committee that reported it, to be, to afford immediate relief to the Seminole Indians now on the Peninsula of Florida, who are represented as in a starving condition. He was not aware that it had ever been the policy of this Government to support those tribes of Indians who, by indolence or carelessness, were reduced to distress; but this is a different case; these Indians have been removed, under treaty stipulations, from the good lands in Florida to the barren lands of the peninsula, and left there to famish. By the treaty, if the lands on the peninsula shall prove to be bad and insufficient to sustain these people, we are to set apart other lands in Florida, sufficient for that purpose. He said we are bound, by every principle of humanity and justice, to furnish supplies to them, until we ascertain what land is to be set apart to them according to our contract. He was willing to appropriate money sufficient for that purpose: but he was not prepared to go further. The bill proposed an appropriation for that purpose, and also to pay the expense of removing the Indians west of the Mississippi. He knew of no treaty stipulations to remove these Indians west of the Mississippi, nor of their consenting to such removal, nor could he perceive the necessary connection between such removal and their present subsistence. The committee had not explained the connection. The question of colonizing the Indians in the Western country, he said, was one of great importance, and was before the House in a distinct shape. He wished to act on that subject directly; it would excite discussion, and be warmly opposed: for himself, he avowed his opposition to the whole scheme. He was unwilling to legislate indirectly upon so important a question, to commit the House, but he thought they should be kept separate—they were improperly blended together. He hoped the amendment proposed by his colleague would prevail.

Mr. HAYDEN wished the sum in the bill to be reduced from fifty thousand dollars to twenty-five thousand dollars; when, on motion of Mr. McLEAN, of Ohio, the bill was laid on the table—ayes 86.

Mission to Panama.

The House having again resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Foreign Relations, approving the Mission to Panama, with the amendments proposing a qualification to the general expression of approbation thereof, Mr. HAMILTON addressed the committee as follows:

I undertake to affirm, and to prove as well as affirm, that, if there has been any unreasonable delay in the decision of this measure before the Senate, it is chargeable to the course pursued by the Executive himself; and, if there has been any party excitement, it has been both first felt and provoked by the Administration and its friends. These positions will be best sustained by a brief narrative, ad oco, of the circumstances incident to this measure, from the moment the invitation was tendered to this Government to send Ministers or Representatives to Panama, (call them what you will,) down to the period when the President thought fit to transmit his memorable Message to this House, asking for an appropriation to carry the purposes of the mission into effect.

I shall, in this narrative, appeal to no other source than to the facts disclosed by the documents published by the authority of the Senate, which have been laid on our tables, and, therefore, are now a part of the res gesta of this whole subject.

It will be recollected, that, although verbal conferences were held by the Secretary of State with the Ministers of Colombia and Mexico, at the Department of State, during the last Spring, it was on the 2d of November that Mr. Salazar and Mr. Obregon, the Plenipotentiaries from these powers, gave a written invitation to our Government to unite in the deliberations at the Isthmus. It was on the 30th of November, nearly one month after, before this invitation was accepted, notwithstanding the precious and exigent relation which it is alleged to bear to our interests. This was about six days prior to the meeting of Congress, when the President informs the South American Ministers "that, should the Senate of the United States, now expected to assemble in a few days, give their advice and consent that commissioners would be sent," &c. Now here was delay, and something worse. If the President had sincerely desired to avail himself of the advice, and be influenced by the consent of the Senate, as it was to assemble in five or six days, would he have embarrassed this body by a preliminary acceptance, however qualified? Would he not have presented the measure, as his predecessor did the question of the recognition of the independence of the South American Republics, free from all commitment whatsoever? But for the present, let this pass.

On the meeting of Congress, the only notice which the Executive thought proper to take of this mission, was very unceremoniously to inform us, that the invitation given to this Government to become parties to the Congress had been accepted, and that Ministers "would be commissioned to take part in those deliberations." There was something even here so extraordinary in the phraseology employed, that this part of the Message was the fruitful occasion of much verbal criticism, and curious speculation, as to the amount of constitutional power which the President seemed disposed to assert for himself. Nor was the import of this doubtful assumption fully explained, until the President's confidential Message of the 26th of December, to the Senate, revealed the astounding fact, that the power of sending Ministers to this Congress, without the intervention or sanction of the Senate, was declared to be "within the constitutional competency of the Executive."

Mr. HAMILTON said he would not break the continuity of his narrative by stopping to argue this unexpected and untenable dogma. He would content himself by remarking, that the President, in the abstract extension of his powers, seemed to have overlooked entirely the distinction between Ministers or Plenipotentiaries under the constitution, endowed with the exercise of certain prerogatives, and mere agents appointed to collect information. It is sufficient for present purposes, however, to say, that it is by no means improbable, that, from the 6th to the 26th December, it was one of the points of political casuistry and constitutional doctrine, most anxiously mooted in the cabinet, to decide whether any appeal was at all necessary to an assembly likely to prove so stubborn and so disloyal as the Senate of the United States. But so it is, that, for twenty days, this measure was delayed by the Executive in his own hands; and, at length, on the 26th, his Message was transmitted to the Senate, accompanied, literally, by no authentic information, satisfactorily defining the character, specifying the objects, and unfolding the advantages likely to ensue from our uniting in the deliberations of this South American Congress.

All the documents which accompanied this Message at that time, were the letters of the Ministers of Colombia, Mexico, and Central America, giving the invitation, and these not in any degree satisfying those preliminary conditions which the President himself had alleged were necessary to its acceptance.

[H. OF R.]

On the 4th of January, immediately on the termination of the holidays, the Senate took the subject up, with every apparent desire to give it a prompt consideration. Accordingly, it would seem from their journals, that, on that day, a resolution was passed, calling on the Executive for copies of the conventions concluded between Mexico and the different South American Republics, with each other, in relation to the proposed assembly at the Isthmus, and, likewise, for such other information as might be in the possession of the President, tending to show the character and object of the Congress.

To this call the President did not respond until the 9th of January; he then sent the conventions required, and a series of letters from Mr. Clay to Mr. Middleton, from the latter to the former, and a correspondence between the Department of State and Mr. Poinsett, with sundry letters from Mr. Poinsett to the Mexican, as well as to his own Government.

The committee will bear in mind, that the conventions which were then, for the first time, communicated, contain the only authentic exposition of the understanding of the real parties, of the objects of the contemplated Congress. Yet the President wished sincerely, freely, and fully, to consult with the Senate!

But this is not all. In the series of letters communicated, those to and from Mr. Middleton were calculated to produce an impression on the Senate, that a pacification between Spain and her once American colonies was a probable event. No impression was certainly better calculated to remove all objections to the mission than this, because our neutrality, in such a contingency, could not, in any degree, be implicated or involved, by being parties to the Congress. The Senate was permitted to remain under this impression until the 30th of January, when a resolution was offered in that body, calling on the President for the correspondence between our Minister in Spain (Mr. Everett) with his own and that Government. This call extracted the letter of Mr. Everett, which contained the direct and positive information that there existed no probability of the King of Spain's acknowledging the independence of his former American dominions; and that, without any other resources than those of hope and religious faith, he stood immovably on his right.

Here, to use the mildest term, was kept back, until extorted by an explicit call, information of the most material character. The fact itself was well fitted to produce not only delay, but distrust on the part of the Senate.

It was at this time the friends of the Administration, both here and in their faithful prints at a distance, opened in the loudest note of denunciation against a factious delay on the part of that body. It will be recollected that the Senate were seemingly even threatened with an appeal to this House, by the triumphant passage of a resolution which I had laid on the table, which was applied to a purpose different indeed from the object for which it was originally designed. Immediately after this measure, which was zealously pressed by the friends of the Administration, the Senate, desirous, as we may infer, as a strict matter of right, should the President make his "factious" appeal to the people, through this House, that their own justification might accompany it, passed the following resolve on the 15th February:

"Resolved, That the President be respectfully requested to inform the Senate whether such objection exists to the publication of the documents communicated by the Executive, or any portion of them; and, if so, to specify the parts, the publication of which would, for that reason, be objectionable."

To this respectful application they received the caustic rebuke contained in the President's reply of the 17th, in which he says—

"Believing that the established usage of free confidential communications between the Executive and the Senate ought, for the public interest, to be preserved unimpaired, I deem it my indispensable duty to leave to the Senate itself the decision of a question, involving a departure, hitherto, so far as I am informed, without example, from that usage, and upon the motives for which, not being informed of them, I do not feel myself competent to decide."

Now, mark the sequel. When the mission was finally passed in the Senate, by a slender majority of five votes, the President transmitted with his Message of the 17th March, to this House—to his faithful Commons—documents of the very same import, the publication of which he had prohibited to that disloyal body, which had presumed to question the wisdom of his measure. From this fact but one inference is to be deduced: that this party manœuvre of the Executive was for the purpose of obtaining the first word with the people, through the medium of an imposing appeal heralded by this House, whilst those whom he had assailed should be quietly locked up "under the established usage of free and confidential communications between the Executive and the Senate."

Let these facts, then, determine on whom the charge of unreasonable delay and party effort, in relation to this mission, most properly belongs.

The next proposition, which the President labors with a zeal not indeed disproportioned to the difficulty of his task, is to prove that our uniting in the deliberations of the Congress at Panama, does not necessarily import an alliance with the powers there to be assembled. He was fully aware that the language held by the Secretary of State to Ministers, went the whole length of establishing such an alliance, (existing now, in point of fact, as far as the power and faith of the Executive can give it authority and sanction,) and that, therefore, this was a point on which all the ingenuity of the special pleading of diplomacy was required. I said, an alliance now exists, in point of fact. Yes, sir, I aver it. That is to say, if the Executive of the country has the constitutional power to conclude such a convention, without the sanction of the Congress of the United States. But, thank God, he has not. The fact, nevertheless, shows how dangerously he has pawned the good faith of the country, to redeem or sanction which, depend upon it, forms the primary motive with the Administration, that our assent should be obtained to this extraordinary mission. Now for the fact. The declaration of Mr. Monroe, in his Message of December, 1823, is made the basis of this quoad alliance, in virtue of which the President, on his own authority, has thought proper to make certain declaratory engagements with the South American powers, to give to which the forms of a solemn league is, without doubt, the chief inducements with those States, that we should go into the Congress at Panama. This declaration of Mr. Monroe (which has been most unjustifiably termed by the Administration a pledge, and, by their subsequent commentaries on it, converted into one) is the mere avowal of an opinion—neither importing, towards others, an obligation, nor even to ourselves. What is it? Why, sir, a declaration that “we owe it to candor, and to the amicable relations subsisting between the United States and those powers (European) to declare, that we should consider any attempt to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere, as dangerous to our peace, our safety.” On this affirmation of an opinion, the present Administration have not only made it the basis of our negotiations with the South American Republics, but as a leading consideration by which valuable treaty equivalents and concessions are to be obtained. The construction they put on this declaration in these negotiations, is, that, if any European power should attempt a colonization of any portion of the continent of America, or take part with Spain in the contest between her and her former colonies—in that event, we are to become their allies, and bear the brunt of the contest. Need I appeal to the authority which was given to Mr. Poinsett to hold this language, by its subsequent entire sanction by the Administration, to show, conclusively, that this alliance, quoad, does exist, as far as the President has authority to make it? Need I refer to the documents to demonstrate, that, as a legitimate consequence of this declaration, expressly quoted, the President has also entered into a conventional alliance with the South American States, to prevent the transfer or conquest of Cuba and Porto Rico to any European power? But, sir, when the Senate, by the accumulation of all these alarming circumstances, were able to establish the fact, in their discussions, that the only purpose for which we were wanted at Panama, by the South American States, was, under the plea “of making effectual the memorable pledge of the late President,” to induce us to give the parchment and wax to this league, offensive and defensive; the President, convinced of this deplorable commitment, and aware of this dilemma, in making his appearance in our House on this topic, made such a qualification of the whole matter, as suited the exigency of the argument, but which, at the same time, was in direct opposition to the solemn engagements he had authorized our Minister to make. And, after (as the documents disclose) he has authorized his Minister to use Mr. Monroe's declaration as a pledge, amounting to the essence of a treaty of alliance, offensive and defensive, he says to us, that “should it be deemed advisable to contract any conventional engagement on this topic, our views would extend no further than to a mutual pledge of the parties to the compact, to maintain the principle in application to its own territory, and to permit no colonial lodgements or establishment of European jurisdiction upon its own soil; and, with respect to the obtrusive interference from abroad, if its future character may be inferred from that which has been, and, perhaps, still is, exercised in more than one of the new States, a joint declaration of its character, and exposure of it to the world, may be, probably, all that the occasion would require.”

From this language, it now appears, that we are to go to Panama, for the purpose of making a declaration, that, “in application to our own territory, we will permit no colonization, on the part of any foreign power.” To what contempt will this miserable retreat, after our blustering, subject us, not only in the opinion of the South American Republics, but in the eyes of all Europe! to say nothing of the humiliating aspect which it presents of our entering into “a joint declaration” with other States, that our territory shall not be violated, our rights assailed, or honor invaded, by a foreign power. This, sir, is equally honorable, and precisely analogous, to a man's entering into a joint bond, with good and sufficient securities, not to be cuffed and kicked with impunity.

The next topics which claim the notice of the President, in his Message to this House, are those which must excite an especial interest with such of us, Mr. Chairman, as represent a certain portion of our common Union on this floor—a section with which I am content and proud to sink or swim. I allude, sir, to what he is pleased to say in regard to the slave trade; our relations, present or prospective, with Hayti; and our policy in regard to the islands of Cuba and Porto Rico. On the first of these subjects he informs us:

“A concert of measures, having reference to the more effectual abolition of the African slave trade, and the consideration of the light in which the political condition of the island of Hayti is to be regarded, are also among the subjects mentioned by the Minister from the Republic of Colombia, as believed to be suitable for deliberation at the Congress.”

APRIL, 1836.]

Mission to Panama.

[H. OF R.]

In reference to the first point, what I have to say shall be included in a single sentence. That the President has been a very unadvised, or a very uninstructed spectator of the events passing under his own official agency, if he does not know that, on the subject of the slave trade, the position which the United States has taken, is the result of full consideration and advisement. Public opinion, sustained by legislative sanctions, has declared that we will not permit our own laws, affecting our own citizens, to be executed by an alien power; and, under no modification, will we concede the right of search. On these principles, we have nailed our colors to the mast. Then why enter into a "concert of measures," when, as far as we are concerned, we have discharged all the obligations which belong to a civilized nation, in abolishing this traffic—in which we have practically done more than all the rest of the world put together. That the topic is unsuitable "for deliberation," the President might, we suppose, have learnt, from the fate of the articles in the treaties he concluded with Great Britain and Colombia, the rejection of which only subjected us to suspicion and reproach. It is entirely obvious, that, on this subject, we have no interest which invokes us to Panama.

But what, sir, does he say, on the other portentous theme? As tedious as the reading of these documents may be, my anxieties are too keenly excited to allow me to omit bringing to your view the strange and equivocal language which the Executive holds on this subject, after having previously declared that "the light in which the political"—mark you, political—"condition of Hayti is to be regarded," will be a suitable subject for deliberation, in reference to a concert of measures between the Spanish American Republics and ourselves. Hear what he says:

"Whether the political condition of the island of Hayti shall be brought at all into discussion at the meeting, may be a question for preliminary advisement. There are in the political constitution of Government, of that people, circumstances which have hitherto forbidden the acknowledgment of them, by the Government of the United States, as sovereign and independent. Additional reasons for withholding that acknowledgment, have recently been seen, in their acceptance of a nominal sovereignty, by the grant of a foreign Prince, under conditions equivalent to the concession by them, of exclusive commercial advantages to one nation, adapted altogether to the state of colonial vassalage, and retaining little of independence but the name. Our Plenipotentiaries will be instructed to present these views to the assembly at Panama; and should they not be concurred in, to decline acceding to any arrangement which may be proposed upon different principles."

The President has, no doubt, thrown the subject, in the form in which he has thus presented it to this House, after the mysticism in which it was veiled to the Senate, to quiet the feelings of the South, which have been sensibly excited, by the fact of this proposition, and by the language the Colombian Minister has employed in relation to it. But I object, in limine, to the grounds on which the President puts our eventual acquiescence in any consultations on this topic, as founded in radical and pernicious error.

In the first place, our policy may be considered as fixed, in regard to our relations with the island of Hayti. Such portions of the Union as have an interest in commercial intercourse with it, may enjoy these benefits; but the point I consider as settled, is, that we have no political or diplomatic relations with its Government; and that, in no shape whatsoever, should we acknowledge its independence. This last is a point of such eminent policy, in relation to the peace and safety of a large number of the States of this Union, that it excites no small misgivings, to find that the President is willing to go into a foreign Congress, to treat on this vital and alarming question to our security and repose, even as a matter of "preliminary advisement."

Now, let us see by what guards the President proposes to protect our interests. He says: "Whether the political condition of Hayti shall be brought at all into discussion at the meeting, may be a question for preliminary advisement." Now, what does Mr. Salazar say? "That this question will be determined at the isthmus." The President says, "that additional reasons for withholding the acknowledgment of their independence, have been recently seen, in their acceptance of a nominal sovereignty, by the grant of a foreign prince." Whereas, Mr. Salazar says: "The descendants of this portion of the globe (the people of Hayti) have succeeded in founding an independent republic, whose Government is now recognized by its ancient metropolis."

So far, the Colombian Minister, in disclosing the objects for which we should go into the Congress of Panama, in regard to this subject, is at points with our Executive.

The President, however, declares that our Plenipotentiaries will be instructed to present these views to the Assembly at Panama; and should they not be concurred in, to decline acceding to any arrangement which may be proposed, on different principles. What views? Why, not a solemn protest against our concurring in any plan of recognition whatsoever; but that, as Hayti is not sufficiently potent and formidable, from an entire and unequivocal recognition of its independence, on the part of France, this recognition should be temporarily withheld by us. Now, sir, the very contingency which is implied from the President's own words, as the condition necessary for our concurrence in any arrangement for recognition, is the one most alarming to the interests of the people of the South. If this Republic is not in a state of colonial vassalage, its next best condition, for our safety, is one of "nominal sovereignty, even by the grant of a foreign prince." But the Colombian Minister invites us into the Congress, expressly to establish "a uniform rule of conduct," in regard to this island.

Thus it is, that we, who have a settled and exclusive policy, in regard to this island, are to unite in the deliberations of an assembly composed of the deputies of Republics which have collegued with all colors and complexions, in the consummation of their revolution; on a subject, too, in which their interest is at variance with our own, and in which they can hold no common sympathies with ourselves. Short-sighted, indeed, must be the policy, or mischievous the design, of this project: for, if we assent, in the Congress of Panama, to a recognition, however qualified, it shakes the South to its centre; and if we reject the proposition for the establishment of this uniform rule, involving this recognition, we only excite the hostility of Hayti, and the jealousy and distrust of those with whom we are acting.

The next advantage on which the President dwells, as having furnished an urgent consideration for his acceptance of the invitation to Panama, is the probability that our councils may be beneficially exercised in that assembly, in securing in peace and tranquillity the existing state of things in the islands of Cuba and Porto Rico.

Sir, this is a matter of grave moment, deeply interesting to the people of this Union—particularly so to the southern portion of it. But what will the country say, when the documents accompanying the President's Message, in which he assures us that, at the Congress in question, "all our efforts will be to preserve the existing state of things in tranquillity, at Cuba and Porto Rico," clearly prove that the Government of this country has, by the contradictions and entanglements of their diplomacy, relinquished every pretext for interference, by surrendering to the South American Republics the whole argument, by which alone our right to interfere could be sustained? Here I wish to rely upon facts, not upon inferences. The committee must, therefore, excuse my troubling them with certain highly important selections from the documents. And, lest I should do the President injustice, let me give you what he says, in his own words:

"The condition of the islands of Cuba and Porto Rico is of deeper import, and of more immediate bearing, upon the present interests and future prospects of our Union. The correspondence herewith transmitted, will show how earnestly it has engaged the attention of this Government. The invasion of both those islands, by the united forces of Mexico and Colombia, is avowedly among the objects to be matured by the belligerent States, at Panama. The convulsions to which, from the peculiar composition of their population, they would be liable, in the event of such an invasion, and the danger therefrom resulting, of their falling, ultimately, into the hands of some European power other than Spain, will not admit of our looking at the consequences to which the Congress at Panama may lead, with indifference. It is unnecessary to enlarge upon this topic; to say more, than that all our efforts, in reference to this interest, will be to preserve the existing state of things, the tranquillity of the islands, and the peace and security of their inhabitants."

The conclusion would very naturally follow, from these declarations, that all the measures of the Administration had been directed to prevent these islands from falling into the possession of Mexico or Colombia, or both; that a firm protest had been made to their Ministers here, and that our Ministers at these Republics had been instructed to deliver an equally unequivocal remonstrance against their touching the soil of these islands; that a squadron had been ordered and detached, to watch the movements of these powers, in regard to these objects; and, whilst our language had been firm and candid, our measures had been consistent and provident.

But, alas! how stands the argument? In what posture are we placed? Why, the Secretary of State, under the authority of the President, as recently as the 28th of December, in his letter to Mr. Middleton, surrenders this whole subject at discretion, by holding this extraordinary language, and by making this extraordinary concession. He says:

"For ourselves, we desire no change in the possession of Cuba, as has been heretofore stated. We cannot allow a transfer of the island to any European power. But, if Spain should refuse to conclude a peace, and obstinately resolve on continuing the war, although we do not desire that either Colombia or Mexico should acquire the island of Cuba, the President cannot see any justifiable ground on which we can forcibly interfere. Upon the hypothesis of an unnecessary protraction of the war, imputable to Spain, it is evident that Cuba will be her only point d'appui, in this hemisphere. How can we interpose, on that supposition, against the party clearly having right on his side, in order to restrain or defeat a lawful operation of war?"

And, by anticipation, lest the validity of this concession might be drawn in question, our Government seems to have sought the humiliating office of asking one of the South American Ministers to write home to his Government, to induce it to suspend, for a limited time, the sailing of the expedition against Cuba or Porto Rico, "until the result of the mediation of Russia (which we had solicited) with Spain, to procure from her a recognition of the independence of her former colonies, should be known." In proof of this fact, I refer to Mr. Clay's letter, of the 20th December, to Mr. Salazar. By the form and limitation of this very request, it would thus seem, we had admitted that, as soon as the fact was ascertained that the mediation of Russia was either refused or of no effect, then Mexico and Colombia might take Cuba, as "we should have no justifiable ground on which we can forcibly interfere against a party clearly having the right on his side." These facts form the best commentary on the declaration of the President, "of how earnestly it has engaged the attention of this Government" that these islands should remain in their existing situation.

Mission to Panama.

Is it not, therefore, a mockery, for the Administration to avow, that they send deputies to the Congress of Panama to prevent the Republics of Colombia and Mexico from invading the islands of Cuba and Porto Rico, when they have surrendered, in the face of the whole world, all right to pretext for such interference? If our Representatives should have the hardihood to say one syllable on this subject, might not the authority of the President be quoted against ourselves? But the most extraordinary feature in the whole transaction is, that, whilst we have placed ourselves in a situation by which the President, on the faith of his own words, is forbid to interfere to prevent the invasion of these islands by the Mexican and South American Republics, he has made a solemn declaration to Europe, and entered into a formal stipulation with Mexico, not to allow the occupation of Cuba and Porto Rico "by any European power other than Spain, in any contingency whatever."

The declaration is explicit. Let us see if I can have mistaken its import. Mr. Clay, in his letter to our Minister at Paris, (Mr. Brown,) authorizes him to declare to the French Government, "in the same spirit, and with the same hope of guarding, beforehand, against any possible difficulties on that subject, that may arise, you will now add, that we could not consent to the occupation of those islands by any other European power than Spain, under any contingency whatever." This contract to go to war, in this contingency, had a further sanction and binding efficacy given to it, as will appear from Mr. Clay's letter to Mr. Poinsett, of the 9th of November, in which he observes: "No longer than about three months ago, when an invasion by France, of the island of Cuba, was believed at Mexico, the United Mexican Government promptly called upon the Government of the United States, through you, to fulfil the memorable pledge of the President of the United States, in his Message to Congress, of December, 1823. What they would have done, had the contingency happened, may be inferred from a despatch to the American Minister at Paris, a copy of which is herewith sent, which you are authorized to read to the Plenipotentiaries of the United Mexican States." This stipulation, it will be recollected, was to be urged as an effective consideration, by which valuable commercial equivalents were to be obtained.

I will not stop here to inquire into the right, according to the spirit of the constitution, of the President to make contracts in futuro with any power to go to war; because the doctrine is too absurd and mischievous to deserve a moment's notice. My object is a different one: to show that this Administration, in its anxiety to preserve the existing state of things in Cuba and Porto Rico, has given up the right to interfere in the only contingency of probable and enormous danger that is likely to occur, and undertaken, by a strong guarantee, to go to war in a contingency of infinitely less danger, to wit: to prevent the transfer of these islands to "any European power whatever."

Now, sir, let us consider for a moment the first contingency, in which we have abandoned all right or pretext of interference, to wit: to prevent the South American powers from invading Cuba and Porto Rico. The invasion of these islands by these powers, involves such an amount of peril to the interests of this country, that it appears to me this is the only condition of things in regard to which it would, under the law of a supreme necessity, justify our interference to prevent it. I speak this, sir, in reference to the safety of three or four slaveholding States, on the borders or contiguous to the Gulf of Mexico. The invasion of Cuba, by the South American States, would at once lead to a revolution, followed by a servile revolt in that island. Marching under the banners of universal emancipation, as these South American Republics do, the first means of success would be an appeal to the slaves themselves, which in producing an internal concussion in that island, would inflict on our southern country an example of the darkest and most perilous aspect; to say nothing of the great danger to our commerce and naval power, of permitting a youthful and ambitious Republic permanently to possess that Gibraltar of the Gulf of Mexico. These circumstances make up an aggregate of peril and evil, to avert which would justify "our right forcibly to interfere," whilst it fixes on the Government a sacred obligation to a portion of our common country, to prevent the shocking and successful example of a revolt, purchased through blood, havoc, and desolation, in their most atrocious forms, from being enacted almost within sight of our shores.

Now, sir, whilst I freely admit that the possession of Cuba and Porto Rico, by any European power other than Spain, is very much to be deprecated, and ought to be prevented by every effort of diplomacy, yet I am far from regarding such a contingency as involving that degree of danger, which, upon the principle of the se defendendo among nations, would authorize our going to war to avert. I do not know on what principle, either of violent or overwhelming danger, we could place the right to interfere; or rather, on what principle we could deny to Spain the right of transferring, for a valuable consideration, a part and parcel of her own domain. Suppose, sir, in payment for the vast, incalculable services of the British army, in the Peninsula war, she were to cede Cuba to England, with what face could we gainsay this exercise of right on the part of Spain, when, in payment of less obligatory claims, she sold Florida to us? But, suppose such an event consummated, does any man believe that the people of this country, as inconvenient as might be the occupation of Cuba by England, would go to war with that power to make her surrender this cession? Do you believe that we should go into this bootless contest, in which we would spend, in a four years' war, more than the fee simple of Cuba would be worth, and "more blood than would turn the wheel of a common grist mill for a twelve-month," to prevent what, after all, we should be as far from attaining as when we began the struggle?

Mission to Panama.

No, sir, the sobriety and good sense of this people would revolt at the redemption of such an inconsiderate pledge, made in a case involving far less evil to the country than in the one in which all right to go to war has been abandoned. I say, boldly, far less evil; because, although the possession of Cuba, by Great Britain or France, is much to be deprecated, as I have said before, yet, if this island was transferred to either of them, it would be attended with no violent concussion—there would start up no sanguinary and hideous anarchy, under the prostituted name of a Republic, to annoy and keep in perpetual alarm that portion of this Union most vitally interested in this question. Either European power would have the naval and military means to coerce the brigands and blacks into peace and submission. On the other hand, in the contingency (according to the views of the Administration) where we cannot justifiably interfere to prevent the invasion of the island by the South American powers—revolution or servile revolt would be the means of rendering that invasion successful; and, in the end, we should have either a second Carthage at our door, in the possession of Mexico or Colombia, or a second Hayti, to cast the shadow of its ominous gloom over our shores.

Thus has our sagacious Cabinet negotiated—so fatally, that, in the event of this portentous calamity, we are precluded by the position they have taken, of urging, except by the most flagrant inconsistency, those arguments which a nation may deduce from an eminent necessity, and urge, by force of arms, if all other appeals should fail.

The conclusion to which I arrive is, that, as we cannot go into the Congress at Panama, and take that ground which our safety and interests require, without an abandonment of the repeated declarations which we have made, we had better stay away, and act independently of the deliberations of the Congress, as our interests may dictate.

The missionary spirit of the age has indeed broken out in a new place. We have hitherto been content with the easy labors of turning the Asiatic from his superstition, and the African from his false idols; but it seems, under the auspices of the President, we are to embark in a much more practicable enterprise—to roll back the light of the Gospel to the children of those who watched its early and beacon fires, and to these vigils for their preservation these descendants yet lay claim. The President seems to have read to little purpose the inimitable satire on such dreams as this, the Tale of a Tub; of which it is not the least of its praises to say, that its large fund of common sense is equal to its wit. In a word, sir, instead of going to Panama to read our Catholic friends a homily on religion, had we not better stay at home and practise its precepts?

Now, sir, I ask you whether the President "has been mindful of the advice of Washington?" Has not a political connection, in relation to the abused and misquoted declaration of Mr. Monroe, been made the basis of an attempted or projected alliance—between foreign nations and ourselves—on the subject of the colonization of any portion of the territory of this continent? Has not the President perverted the spirit and meaning of the advice of Washington, by making that advice entirely applicable to Europe? Have not the Spanish American Republics "primary interests, which to us have none, or a very remote relation?" "And is not this very contest they are carrying on with the mother country of this character?" Are we not, in going into the Congress, hazarding our neutrality? Are we not about to "forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation?" Are we not about "to stand on foreign ground?" And when Washington referred to European alliances, was it not to illustrate the principles of our foreign relations, rather than to limit them to the powers of Europe? Do not his maxims, in reference to this policy, stand broadly and distinctly applicable to the whole world? Does not "our detached and distant situation" to a majority of these Republics, leave us free to elect our course? Sir, said Mr. H., (holding up the address,) from this book I defy contradiction. But mark the mode by which the President arrives at his conclusion! He asserts, "that the period which Washington predicted as then not far off, has arrived," and that America has a set of primary interests of her own. General Washington makes no such prediction in regard to America, in the sense in which the President uses this term, comprehending, as he does, within it, the different powers inhabiting this continent. No, sir, Washington expressly refers to ourselves—to these United States—that, from our growth as one people, under an efficient Government, we may defy external annoyance, and cause our neutrality to be respected. He nowhere implies that when we do become thus strong, we may go abroad and form foreign alliances, and reverse all those maxims of policy which it was the purpose of the address so strongly to inculcate.

It is thus, Mr. Chairman, that the President, perfectly aware of the radical unsoundness of this mission to Panama, has, by the most violent and contortious efforts, endeavored to sustain himself, by resorting to the authority of others; and hence it is, he informs us that the policy of the mission is not only conformable "to the counsel of Washington," but "to the views of my immediate predecessor, as declared in his annual Message to Congress, in 1823." I will not repeat this declaration of Mr. Monroe, because it is entirely familiar to the mind of every one who hears me; but if, from any part of it, an intimation can be deduced, favorable to this specific measure, I can only say, our vernacular must be read with a very different meaning, and in a very different sense, from that in which we are in the habit of using it. To test the justness of this deduction of the President, let it be remembered, that the declaration of Mr. Monroe was made at a time when the Holy Alliance was supposed to be engaged in concerting combined operations to aid Spain in the recovery of her colonies. At this period of probable and imminent danger, (to what, in the cant of the day, is called the "American system,") did Mr. Monroe propose that we should unite in the deliberations of a Congress, or of our forming an alliance to resist this peril? No; he contented himself with declaring, that "we should consider any attempt on the part of the European powers to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere, as dangerous to our peace and safety"—which does not contain a solitary obligation towards other powers, or even to ourselves; it is the mere expression of a sentiment which could have left us free to act, when the contingency happened, as would best comport with the interests of the country. But mark the difference in the course pursued by Mr. Adams. At a moment when it is conceded on all hands that the Holy Alliance has abandoned all intention to aid Spain in resubjugating South America, he, nevertheless, accepts this invitation to participate in the counsels of a belligerent Congress, and deduces it as a legitimate consequence from this much-abused declaration!

Mission to Panama.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. Monroe, sir, has gone into retirement, and has carried with him the sympathy and gratitude of his country. This effort to throw on him a portion of the responsibility of this weak and indefensible measure, and the embarrassments into which our foreign negotiations are now involved, betrays a want of magnanimity equal to the poor thriftless fallacy with which the position has been attempted to be sustained.

Sir, this whole scheme of quitting "our own, to stand on foreign ground," is opposed to the settled policy of the country, from the time of General Washington, as indicated by his firmness in resisting those obligations which were attempted to be raised out of an indiscreet treaty of alliance and friendship with France, down to the last moments of the last Administration—except in an effort made by the senior Mr. Adams, in 1798, to indulge in foreign negotiations, having ultimate tendencies to entangling alliances. This scheme was then met by the Republicans of that day, as the Republicans of this time have felt it their duty to oppose this deviation from the Washington policy. It is to the research of a gentleman from New York, in the other House, (Mr. VAN BUREN,) we are indebted for this precious discovery, who, with admirable perspicacity, has perceived the remarkable coincidence between the two measures, and the verisimilitude in the arguments by which both were recommended by the father and son, and both resisted by nearly analogous reasons by the Republicans of that day, as well as those of this—by those who were destined to be the pillars of the Democratic party of this country. The Senator from New York has not only achieved a signal benefit to those of us who yet belong to the Jeffersonian faith, by this discovery, but made it subservient to the purposes of one of the most triumphant arguments I have ever read. The moral is pregnant with instruction; the omen replete with hope.

The policy of Washington was the policy of Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe—a policy in which Mr. Adams concurred during the whole period of his service, in the Cabinet of the latter, in the Department of State. He never seemed to permit so weak a thing as sympathy to interfere with his cautious maxims as a statesman. We all know how resolutely he sustained the gallant assaults of his present Secretary of State, in this House, in behalf of South American independence. He was not to be moved by the pathos or the sarcasms of the Western orator; but he stood with the coldness of the effigy of Justice, weighing in a pair of scales the exact quantum of danger to a hair, attending this recognition; and it was not until he got this danger down to a feather, that he would listen to the measure. Even on a more recent occasion, we have seen that all the associations of the literature and taste of antiquity betrayed him into no warmth in favor of the Greeks—not even under the eloquent appeal of the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. WEBSTER,)—for Mr. Adams, in reply to the letter of Luriotis, the Greek Agent, was as cold as a personification, in alabaster, of the Genius of Discretion itself. But, suddenly, (since an election produced by the memorable coalition, which has put him on the throne,) he has become inoculated with "this Spanish American fever," as it has been justly called, and he is already far gone in the delirium of that enthusiasm which belongs to the ascendant genius of his Cabinet. Yes, sir, he has started from a caution as cold as marble, into the vernal fervors of love, at first sight, for the South Americans, without allowing sufficient time for the change, except by the intervention of a miracle. And with this mutation, what a reversal has there been in the whole foreign policy of the country! Let the documents on your table speak to this fact. I will venture to assert, that, from the 4th day of March, 1825, (I mean the fatal ides of March,) there has been a greater interference in the concerns of other nations—a more studious search for the occasion of perilous distinction—greater commitments of the national safety and honor—than have characterized any anterior period of our history, from the adoption of the Federal Constitution down to the present time. We have become, at the exclusive will of the President, the arbitrator of the New World, and, in that character, have sent bullying protests to the old. The Cabinet has, in our name, made two solemn contracts, to go to war in two contingencies, without, “as a matter of preliminary advisement,” even condescending to consult us; and we find, in the first eight months of the halcyon days of a new and confederate dynasty, the sober policy of our fathers, which was “a lamp to our feet,” has gone out, and a blustering officiousness in the concerns of others, substituted in its stead.

TUESDAY, April 11.

Supply of Provisions to Florida Indians.

On motion of Mr. McLEAN, of Ohio, the House proceeded to consider the bill for the relief of the Florida Indians, (as amended, so as to be confined to their relief merely, and not extended to their removal.)

Mr. McLEAN moved to amend the bill by striking out $50,000 and inserting $20,000.

In support of this motion, Mr. McLEAN stated that he had consulted the Secretary of War, who informed him that this sum would be sufficient to relieve the present exigencies of these Indians.

After some explanations by Mr. COOK, the amendment was adopted.

Mr. VINTON, after some opposition, moved to lay the bill on the table, but withdrew his motion; and the debate of yesterday was renewed, and continued for about an hour, on the same general grounds. The bill was advocated by Messrs. McLEAN, COOK, WHITE, and LIVINGSTON; and opposed by Messrs. VINTON and STEWART.

Mr. STEWART said he felt as much as any gentleman could feel, for the destitute and suffering condition of these Indians. Provision, however, he thought, might be made for them out of the Indian contingent fund of $95,000, without this special act for their relief. He had several objections to this bill. The first was on account of the precedent which it would establish. If we thus admit the right of all the Indians who may be in a destitute and suffering condition, to call upon Congress for relief, our treasury will be inadequate to the demand. The poor and needy of all the States and Territories of this Union had certainly as strong a claim upon our charity and sympathies as the Indians, (and God knows we have enough such,) and should they also come, can we reject their applications, while we deal out from their treasury with a liberal hand, to strangers and Indians? The amount in the bill was nothing. It was the precedent to which he objected. All the Indians had equal claims. All had been alike deprived of their land, and by like means, and of course their claims were alike well-founded. So much for the precedent.

But he had another objection. It was, that this policy would have an injurious effect upon the habits of the Indians themselves. If being poor and destitute is a sufficient reason for applying to Congress for relief, they will all soon become poor and destitute. They have ingenuity enough to make a plausible story, and if they have not, they can easily procure the aid of those who have, and should that fail, they will abandon all efforts to provide for themselves, and thus soon bring themselves within the rule.

But a still more serious objection to this measure than its effect upon the treasury, or its effect upon the Indians, was, that the constitution had given Congress no power to make the treasury a charity-box. If we wish to indulge our feelings of charity or kindness to Indians, or anybody else, we must look to our own pockets, we must go to our own “corn cribs,” and not to the treasury; that belonged to the people, who filled it by their contributions, and not to us, except to carry into effect the objects and powers indicated in the constitution itself. The rule which regulated the power of appropriation was a plain and simple one. The constitution had vested certain powers in Congress, with the means “necessary and proper” to carry them into effect. The only inquiry, then, is, are the means proposed to be employed, or the appropriation to be made, “necessary and proper” to attain any of the ends indicated by the constitution? If it be, you have a constitutional right to make the appropriation, but not otherwise. This he conceived to be the only sound rule, and it was the one by which he always had been, and always would be, governed. Then, he would ask, where was the power granted to Congress which this appropriation was intended to carry into effect? There was none, he contended, to which it could, by any possibility, be made to appertain; he defied ingenuity to point it out. If Congress can appropriate money for the relief of suffering Indians in Florida, they have the same right to appropriate money for the suffering inhabitants of any other portion of the globe—in suffering Africa, or in suffering Spain. If you may give to the suffering Indians of Florida, surely, by the same rule, you may give to the suffering citizens of Florida; yet such an application would be scouted out of the House.

The motion to lay the bill on the table was negatived, and, after considerable discussion, it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mission to Panama.

The House having again resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of

APRIL, 1826.]

Mission to Panama.

[H. or R.]

Foreign Relations, approving the Mission to Panama, with the amendments proposing a qualification to the general expression of approbation thereof—

Mr. BUCHANAN addressed the committee as follows:

I shall proceed to discuss the subject under the various aspects in which it has presented itself to my mind.

I know there are several gentlemen on this floor, who approve of the policy of the amendments proposed, and wish to express an opinion in their favor; and who yet feel reluctant to vote for them, because it is their intention finally to support the appropriation bill. They think, if the amendments should be rejected, consistency would require them to refuse any grant of money to carry this mission into effect. I shall, therefore, ask the attention of the committee, whilst I endeavor to prove that there would not, in any event, be the slightest inconsistency in this course.

I assert it to be a position susceptible of the clearest proof, that the House of Representatives is morally bound, unless in extreme cases, to vote the salaries of Ministers who have been constitutionally created by the President and Senate. The expediency of establishing the mission was one question, which has already been decided by the competent authority: when the appropriation bill shall come before us, we will be called upon to decide another and a very different question. Richard O. Anderson and John Sergeant have been regularly nominated by the United States, to be Envoys Extraordinary and Ministers Plenipotentiary "to the Assembly of American nations at Panama." The Senate, after long and solemn deliberation, have advised and consented to their appointment. These Ministers have then been created—they have been called into existence under the authority of the Constitution of the United States. That venerated instrument declares, that the President "shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur: and he shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint, Ambassadors, other public Ministers, and Consuls, Judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law." What then will be the question upon the appropriation bill? In order to enable our Ministers to proceed upon their mission, the President has asked us to grant the necessary appropriation. Shall we incur the responsibility of refusing? Shall we thus defeat the mission which has already been established by the only competent constitutional authorities? This House have, without doubt, the physical power to refuse the appropriation, and they possess the same power to withhold his salary from the President of the United States. The true question is, what is the true nature of our constitutional obligation? Are we not morally bound to pay the salaries given by existing laws to every officer of the Government? By the act of the first May, 1810, the outfit and the salary to be allowed by the President to Foreign Ministers are established. Such Ministers have been regularly appointed to attend the Congress at Panama. What right, then, have we to refuse to appropriate the salaries which they have a right to receive, under the existing laws of the land?

I admit there may be extreme cases, in which this House would be justified in withholding such an appropriation. "The safety of the people is the supreme law." If, therefore, we should believe any mission to be dangerous, either to the existence or to the liberties of this country, necessity would justify us in breaking the letter to preserve the spirit of the constitution. The same necessity would equally justify us in refusing to grant to the President his salary, in certain extreme cases, which might easily be imagined.

But how far would your utmost power extend? Can you re-judge the determination of the President and Senate, and destroy the officers which they have created? Might not the President immediately send these Ministers to Panama? and if he did, would not their acts be valid? It is certain, if they should go, they run the risk of never receiving a salary; but still they might act as Plenipotentiaries. By withholding the salary of the President, you cannot withhold from him the power; neither can you, by refusing to appropriate for this mission, deprive the Ministers of their authority. It is beyond your control to make them cease to be Ministers.

The constitutional obligation to provide for a Minister, is equally strong as that to carry into effect a treaty. It is true, the evils which may flow from your refusal may be greater in one case than in the other. If you refuse to appropriate for a treaty, you violate the faith of the country to a foreign nation. You do no more, however, than omit to provide for the execution of an instrument which is declared by the constitution to be the supreme law of the land. In the case which will be presented to you by the appropriation bill, is the nature of your obligation different? I think not. The power to create the Minister is contained in the same clause of the constitution with that to make the treaty. They are powers of the same nature. The one is absolutely necessary to carry the other into effect. You cannot negotiate treaties without Ministers. They are the means by which the treaty-making power is brought into action. You are, therefore, under the same moral obligation to appropriate money to discharge the salary of a Minister, that you would be to carry a treaty into effect.

If you ask me for authority to establish these principles, I can refer you to the opinion of the first President of the United States—the immortal Father of his Country—who, in my humble judgment, possessed more practical wisdom, more political foresight, and more useful constitutional knowledge, than all his successors.

I have thus, I think, established the position, that gentlemen who vote for the amendments now before the committee, even if they should not prevail, may, without inconsistency, give their support to the appropriation bill.

I now come to a question of great importance in this discussion. Does the information before the House justify the proposed amendments, and render them necessary? or, are they mere abstract propositions, in no manner connected with the subject? I have never been more mistaken, if I shall not be able to demonstrate, that, from the uniform course of policy which has been pursued by the present Administration, they are already committed to such an extent, that it will be exceedingly difficult for them to retrace their steps and extricate themselves without giving just cause of offence to the Southern Republics. In my opinion, a crisis has now arrived, in which it is the duty of this House to take a firm stand in favor of the ancient and the approved policy of the country. We should proclaim to the world, that it is our determination "to preserve peace, commerce, and friendship, with all nations, and to form entangling alliances with none."

It will here be necessary to take a short historical view of our relations with the Southern Republics. Within the last few years, we have seen in this hemisphere, seven new Republics emerging from the chaos of Spanish colonial despotism. The whole American people beheld this cheering spectacle with heartfelt satisfaction. We watched their progress with the most intense anxiety, and, marching in the van of nations, we first declared them to be free, sovereign, and independent. This declaration now is, and will forever continue to be, one of the most glorious events in our annals. It was made on the fourth of May, 1822, and all hailed it with pride and with pleasure. In the Summer of 1823, the Holy Alliance, at the request of Spain, were called upon to assist in subjugating, what she was pleased to call her revolted colonies. The most serious apprehensions were then entertained, that an unholy crusade was to be proclaimed against the cause of liberty and Republican Government, wherever they existed over the whole earth. In this alarming posture of affairs, did we give any pledge to foreign nations? Did we commit the faith of the country to all, or any of the Southern Republics? Certainly not. We maintained the same independent position which we had always occupied in our relations with foreign nations. The celebrated Message of Mr. Monroe, of December 2d, 1823, announced to the Holy Alliance, and to the world, that we could not view with indifference the hostile interposition of any European power against the independence of the Southern Republics; but would consider such an attempt as dangerous to our own peace and safety. This declaration was re-echoed by millions of freemen. It was received with enthusiasm in every part of the Union. It answered the purpose for which it was intended, and the danger which then threatened the Southern Republics has since passed away.

This declaration contained no pledge to any foreign Government. It left us perfectly free: but it has since been converted into such a pledge by the present Administration; and although they have not framed formal alliances with the Southern Republics, yet they have committed the country in honor to an alarming extent.

The present Secretary of State has always been an enthusiast in favor of the Southern Republics. He has gone to such extremities in their cause, that, in this particular, prudent men would feel disposed to compliment his heart at the expense of his understanding. I have no doubt his conduct has proceeded from the ardor of his nature in the cause of liberty; and, therefore, I shall be the last man to visit it with censure.

From the date of the Message of Mr. Monroe, until the present Administration came into power, we have never heard that any attempt was made to convert it into a pledge to any of the Southern Republics. No sooner had the present Secretary taken possession of the chair of State, than our policy was changed. Mr. Poinsett was sent as Minister to Mexico, to obtain a commercial treaty from that Government. In his instructions, which bear date on the 25th of March, 1825, and which were never communicated either to the Senate or to this House, until the 30th of March, he was directed to impress the principles of Mr. Monroe's Message upon the Government of the United Mexican States. He was also instructed to urge upon that Government, "the utility and expediency of asserting the same principles on all proper occasions." Was not this a direct departure from the course which the former Administration had pursued? Are not these instructions substantially to this effect? We wish to enter into a treaty of commerce with you: we have determined that no European power shall interfere between any of the Southern Republics and Spain, in their war for independence; nor shall they attempt to colonize any part of this continent: we, therefore, urge to you to act in concert with us in asserting the same principles. The truth is, the Secretary evidently considered it as a pledge, and sent it forth as such to foreign nations. How was it understood by Mexico? During the last Summer, it was apprehended by that Government, that France was about to invade the island of Cuba. We were then instantly called upon to redeem our pledge, and to protect that island against the fleet and army of France. On this occasion did the Secretary attempt, either directly or indirectly, to deny the existence of such a pledge to Mexico? On the contrary, in his letter to Mr. Poinsett, of the 9th of November last, he expressly recognizes our obligation, and leaves the Mexican Government to infer what we would have done had the contingency happened, from a despatch which he had sent to the American Minister at Paris. This despatch contained an express declaration that the Government of the United States could not consent to the occupation of the islands of Cuba and Porto Rico by any other European power than Spain, under any contingency. Was not this a formal recognition of the pledge, on the part of our Executive? But is this all? No; very far from it. It is unnecessary again to repeat the strong language of Mr. Poinsett to the Ministers of Mexico upon this subject, which has been so often repeated on this floor. It is so clear and conclusive a pledge that, with respect to it, there can be no mistake or misapprehensions. This language was communicated to Mr. Olaj, in the letter of the 28th of September. That gentleman, when called upon by this House for his answer, informed us that none had been transmitted. He has since discovered that he was mistaken, and has transmitted us the answer to Mr. Poinsett's letter, which had been accidentally overlooked. Does this letter of Mr. Olaj disapprove the declaration of Mr. Poinsett to the Mexican Government? We know that it does not. An implied assent is as strong as an express assent. Mr. Poinsett, from his instructions, and from the whole correspondence, stands completely justified before his country for the declarations he has made. In this manner our country, so far as it can be committed by the Administration, has been pledged to Mexico to pursue the course of policy which I have endeavored to delineate.

How shall we extricate ourselves from these obligations to Mexico? Shall we say to them: true it is, we have attempted to obtain from you the same commercial privileges which you are willing to grant to the other Republics of this continent, by declaring to you that we form a part of what is called the great American system, and that we are pledged to maintain your independence by war, if that should become necessary, "and to bear the brunt of the contest." True it is we know in what manner you understood our declarations, and we have expressly recognized your construction, by declaring our determination to carry it into effect against France, if she should attempt to invade the island of Cuba. True it is, that when the nature of the pledge was distinctly brought home to our Government by Mr. Poinsett, we never whispered a word against its binding force. But yet you were entirely mistaken in its nature. Mr. Clay, whilst the House of Representatives had the subject under debate, has declared, that it was a pledge, not to you, but to ourselves and our posterity. You have, therefore, no interest whatever in this pledge, and we can release ourselves from it as soon as we shall think proper.

I ask if any man of honor, after he had committed himself to his neighbor in this manner, and had thus attempted to obtain an advantage from him, could afterwards say, without forfeiting his character, I merely pledged myself to myself. I can, and will, redeem myself from my pledge; and you must suffer the loss and the disappointment.

In my opinion, the friends of the Administration on this floor ought to be most anxious that these amendments should prevail. They would be the best justification of the President at Panama. He could then say, with propriety, that, whatever might have been his own inclination in relation to this pledge, the House of Representatives had declared it should never have their sanction.

I think, sir, I have already shown, that the documents upon our table contain sufficient reasons for the adoption of these amendments. But I shall not rest here. I will proceed to another most important branch of the subject. In the first place, however, it will be necessary to present before the committee a view of the precise character of the Congress of Panama. It is certainly not difficult to understand its nature; but, in my judgment, it has not been correctly explained. If you would look for its true character you must examine the treaties to which it owes its existence. They form a perpetual alliance, offensive and defensive, in peace, and in war, between those Republics who are parties to them. They create, to use their own language, "a perpetual union, league, and confederation." The Congress of Panama will be composed of Plenipotentiaries from all the Southern Republics, "for the purpose of establishing on a more solid basis, the intimate relations which should exist between them all individually and collectively, and that it may serve as a council in great events, as a point of union in common danger, as a faithful interpreter of public treaties when difficulties may arise, and as an arbitrator and conciliator in their disputes and differences." It appears, then, that the first object intended to be accomplished by the Congress of Panama is, to establish a strict and intimate alliance and union between all and each of the seven Republics which have freed themselves from the yoke of Spain. Should this be accomplished, to the extent which they intend, I shall look upon the day of its consummation as the darkest which this country will ever have beheld. We shall then be compelled either to become a member of the Confederacy, or stand alone upon this continent against seven independent and powerful nations. If, for the preservation of the honor, or the interest of the American people, we shall be compelled to go to war with one of these Republics, the whole continent of America south of our own territory, will be marshalled in hostile array against us. War with one must be war with all. Such an alliance may not be so dangerous to our liberties as a league between monarchs; but the calm of despotism, however dreadful it may be to the subjects of the despot, does not present to foreign nations the same terrors that would be presented by a confederation of young, and vigorous, and ambitious Republics. I trust in God, that the Ministers who may be sent to Panama will be instructed to use their best exertions to break up this Congress. With whatever favor it may now be regarded by the American people, the time will come, ere long, when it will be looked upon as an object of jealousy and apprehension. If this Congress should accomplish the purpose for which it has been convened, our hope must then be, that it will share the fate of nearly all the Confederacies which have ever existed. Our Ministers should warn them by the examples of history, by the precepts of Washington, to avoid entangling alliances with each other. They should admonish them of the danger of jealousy and civil war. They should tell them that such a league, instead of being their protection, might become their ruin.

It is clear to my mind, from the documents in our possession, that the President, in balancing the difficulties of our situation, thought it better this country should incur the danger of becoming eventually a party to this alliance, than stand alone. He must have foreseen, and it is evident he did foresee, that this Government, whatever might be its intention by sending Ministers to the Congress of Panama, would be insensibly drawn into the confederation; that the Congress, from the nature of the objects to which its attention will be directed, must be perpetual. After the alliance shall have been completely formed, it will remain as the council in great events, and the point of union in common danger for the Confederacy. I am free to admit, that, in my opinion, it will not be an assembly of sovereign States, like our old confederation. Its powers, however, are more than merely diplomatic. It possesses judicial authority to fix the construction and decide upon the true meaning of public treaties between members of the Confederacy. It will also be the arbitrator in all disputes and difficulties which may arise. Whether it will possess the power of carrying its decrees into effect, I cannot determine, as the treaties are silent upon that subject. The President, when he accepted the invitation given to this country to be represented by the Ministers in that Congress, knew that their very attendance there might produce a strong sympathy between us and the confederates. That, whatever instructions might be given in the beginning, we should, probably, in the end, be drawn into an alliance. This is a view of the subject entirely distinct from any question which has arisen, either respecting our neutrality in the war between Spain and her former colonies, or our pledge to maintain their independence and form of Government. It looks beyond both. The President, in his Message to the House, has met this question fairly. I shall quote his own language: He says, "among the inquiries which were thought entitled to consideration, before the determination was taken to accept the invitation, was that, whether the measure might not have a tendency to change the policy, hitherto invariably pursued by the United States, of avoiding all entangling alliances and all unnecessary foreign connections."

Does the President deprecate this event, which his sagacity had foreseen? Does he declare that this shall never be our policy, and that he will take the necessary means to prevent it? On the contrary, knowing that the American people considered an adherence to the Farewell Address of the man who was first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen, to be the palladium of their safety, he has, by a long and ingenious argument, attempted to destroy its force. He has endeavored to prove that its principles did not apply to the Southern Republics, and that General Washington himself, under existing circumstances, would have entered into close alliance with them. And has it come to this? Was it not enough to have abandoned the principles of that immortal man, without attempting, by ingenuity, to turn them in direct opposition to their plain and palpable meaning? I do not wish to cast any reflections upon the character of the present President. I believe him to be a great statesman, and perhaps, as well versed in the theory of diplomacy as any man now living. I must, however, be permitted to say, that he has attempted to explain away the principles of the Farewell Address. No man who reads his Message can entertain a doubt on the subject. And, yet, his friends in this House say there is no cause for alarm; there is no necessity for adopting the amendments—if we did, they would show a want of proper confidence in the Executive. I should have been glad if my friend from Massachusetts (Mr. EVERETT) had given us any explanation of this part of his Message in his report. He has not thought proper to do so, but has ingeniously passed it over without comment. Is it not, then, necessary to adopt these amendments, for the purpose of declaring that, in our opinion, the policy of Washington should still prevail?

The President, in his Message to the Senate, has declared that he deemed it to be within the constitutional competence of the Executive to send Ministers to Panama. He applied to the Senate, not because he thought their sanction necessary, not because he believed he could act without it, but because he wished to evince a proper degree of deference for their opinion.

This, it appears to me, is an assumption of power on the part of the Executive, unknown to the constitution. That instrument makes it his duty "to give Congress, from time to time, information of the state of the Union." From this duty results his power of sending agents abroad, merely for the purpose of obtaining information. This power has been often exercised. But, by what authority the President could claim the right of sending Plenipotentiaries to Panama, without the consent of the Senate, I am utterly at a loss to determine.

Mission to Panama.

There is another reason which has shaken my confidence in the Executive, so far as respects this mission. The Senate were anxious to discuss this measure with open doors. They, therefore, requested the President to inform them, whether the publication of the documents necessary to be referred to in debate, would be prejudicial to existing negotiations. He, however, fixed the seal of confidence upon the proceedings, and held them bound to secrecy, fast as the grasp of death. But no sooner had the Senate decided the question, than he himself published to the world these very documents, and accompanied them by a Message, which is, in fact, but an answer to the report of the Committee of Foreign Relations to the Senate. The reply is thus made to precede the argument. And thus it was expected first to seize upon the feelings of the people of the United States, and get them committed against the Senate. It is not for me to say this conduct was wrong; but I know, if I were a Senator, I should feel it most sensibly. In this reply, whenever the argument of the Committee of Foreign Relations was unanswerable, the President changed his ground, and presented the matter to the House in an aspect entirely different. I shall present an example before the committee, to illustrate this position.

The President, in his Message to the Senate, distinctly stated, that one object which he had in view in accepting the invitation, was to influence the southern nations to change their political constitutions in regard to their established religion, and to introduce universal toleration. From the state of public opinion in those countries, an attempt of this nature would spread one universal flame over the whole southern continent. With whatever justice the enemies of the Catholic religion may say it has been a scourge to liberty in other countries, it has certainly been a blessing to the southern Republics. Its Ministers, so far from having set themselves in array against the principles of liberty, took a leading, and an efficient part in accomplishing the Revolution. This assertion is true, in its utmost extent, in relation to Mexico. The President, having discovered the danger of such an interference, at the present time, very prudently changed his attitude in his Message to this House, and now only intends to ask, at Panama, what I feel confident all the nations will grant, without the least difficulty—the liberty to our own citizens, while they reside within any of the Republics, of worshipping their God according to the dictates of their own conscience.

I come, now, to speak of a subject deeply interesting to my own constituents, and to the State which I have the honor, in part, to represent, as well as the rest of the Union. We have often been told, as an argument against these amendments, that they imply a want of confidence in the Executive. Judging from their conduct in relation to the island of Cuba, I am justified in declaring, that my confidence in them is shaken, in every thing which regards the southern Republics. England and France have been warned by our Government, in the most solemn and formal manner, that we could not consent to the occupation of that island by any other European power than Spain, under any contingency whatever. Ought not the same course to have been pursued towards the South American Republics? The reasons for adopting this policy, as I shall presently show, are at least as strong in the one case as in the other; but, yet, the documents prove that the Cabinet had arrived at a different conclusion. From them, it is evident, that our Government did not intend to interfere for the purpose of preventing an invasion of that island by Mexico and Colombia. Mr. Clay, in his letter of December last, to the Ministers of these two nations, requested, only, that their invasion of Cuba might be suspended until the result of our interference in their favor with the European powers should be ascertained. In his letter to Mr. Middleton, our Minister at St. Petersburg, dated in May last, which he read to the Ministers of Mexico and Colombia, he entered into a long argument to justify an invasion of that island by those Republics, in case Spain should prove obstinate, and not recognize their independence. I will not trouble the committee by reading this despatch to them, as it is in the hands of every member.

The vast importance of the island of Cuba to the people of the United States, may not be generally known. The commerce of this island is of immense value, particularly to the agricultural and navigating interests of the country. Its importance has been rapidly increasing for a number of years. To the middle or grain-growing States, this commerce is almost indispensable. The aggregate value of goods, wares, and merchandise, the growth, produce, and manufacture, of the United States, exported annually to that island, now exceeds three million and a half of dollars. Of this amount, more than the one-third consists of the two articles of pork and flour. The chief of the other products of domestic origin are fish, fish-oil, spermaceti candles, timber, beef, butter, and cheese, rice, tallow candles, and soap. Our principal imports from that island are, coffee, sugar, and molasses, articles which may almost be considered necessities of life. The whole amount of our exports to it, foreign and domestic, is nearly six millions, and our imports nearly eight millions of dollars. The articles which constitute the medium of this commerce, are both bulky and ponderous, and their transportation employs a large portion of our foreign tonnage. More than the one-seventh of the whole tonnage, engaged in foreign trade, which entered the ports of the United States, during the year ending the last day of September, 1824, came from Cuba; and but little less than that proportion of the tonnage employed in our export trade, sailed for that island. Its commerce is, at present, more valuable to the United States than that of all the southern Republics united. How, then, can the American people ever agree that this island shall be invaded by Colombia and Mexico, and pass under their dominion? Ought we not to avert its impending fate, if possible? The vast and fertile regions of Mexico and Colombia will produce, in abundance, nearly all the articles with which we now supply Cuba. If it should be revolutionized and become an integral part of either of these Republics, the fate of this portion of our trade would at once be sealed. Disguise the fact as we may, Mexico is destined to become our rival. She already feels it and knows it. She already looks to war between us and the southern Republics. When our Minister told her Plenipotentiaries that the power she desired to preserve of granting privileges to the southern Republics which she wished to deny to us, would be useless to her on account of our existing treaties with them, they hastily remarked, that war would dissolve all treaties. Shall we, then, stand with our arms folded, and see this island pass into her possession? Shall we rest contented with having advised a simple suspension of its invasion merely with a view to the benefit of those Republics?

Important as this island may be to us in a commercial, it is still more important in a political view. From its position, it commands the entrance of the Gulf, both of Mexico and Florida. The report of our Committee of Foreign Relations truly says, "that the Moro may be regarded as a fortress at the mouth of the Mississippi." Any power in possession of this island, even with a small naval force, could hermetically seal the mouth of the Mississippi. Thus, the vast agricultural productions of that valley, which is drained by the father of rivers, might be deprived of the channel which nature intended for their passage. A large portion of the people of the State, one of whose Representatives I am, find their way to market by the Mississippi. For this reason I feel particularly interested in this part of the subject. The great law of self-preservation, which is equally binding on individuals and nations, commands us, if we cannot obtain possession of this island ourselves, not to suffer it to pass from Spain, under whose dominion it will be harmless. And yet our Government have never even protested against its invasion by Mexico and Colombia.

There is still another view of the subject in relation to this island, which demands particular attention. Let us, for a moment, look at the spectacle which it will probably present, in case Mexico and Colombia should attempt to revolutionize it. Have they not always marched under the standard of universal emancipa-tion? Have they not always conquered by proclaiming liberty to the slave? In the present condition of this island what will be the probable consequence? A servile war, which, in every age, has been the most barbarous and destructive; and which spares neither age nor sex. Revenge, urged on by cruelty and ignorance, would desolate the land. The dreadful scenes of St. Domingo would again be presented to our view, and would again be acted almost within sight of our own shores. Cuba would be a vast magazine in the vicinity of the southern States, whose explosion would be dangerous to their tranquillity and peace.

Permit me here, Mr. Chairman, for a moment, to speak upon a subject, to which I have never before adverted to upon this floor, and to which, I trust, I may never again have occasion to advert. I mean the subject of slavery. I believe it to be a great political and a great moral evil. I thank God, my lot has been cast in a State where it does not exist. But while I entertain these opinions, I know it is an evil at present without a remedy. It has been a curse entailed upon us by that nation which now makes it a subject of reproach to our institutions. It is, however, one of those moral evils, from which it is impossible for us to escape, without the introduction of evils infinitely greater. There are portions of this Union, in which, if you emancipate your slaves, they will become masters. There can be no middle course. Is there any man in this Union, who could, for one moment, indulge the horrid idea of abolishing slavery, by the massacre of the high-minded and the chivalrous race of men in the South? I trust there is not one. For my own part, I would, without hesitation, buckle on my knapsack, and march in company with my friend from Massachusetts (Mr. EVERTS) in defence of their cause.

I am willing to consider slavery as a question entirely domestic, and leave it to those States in which it exists. The Constitution of the United States shall be my rule of conduct upon this subject. I have good reason to believe, that the honest, but mistaken attempts of philanthropists, have done much injury to the slaves themselves. These attempts generally reach the ears of the slave, and whilst they inspire him with false hopes of liberty, and thus make him disobedient, and discontented with his condition, they compel the master to use more severity than would otherwise have been necessary.

I think I have shown we are deeply interested in every thing which regards the fate of Cuba. I do, therefore, most sincerely rejoice that the President has recently changed his policy concerning that island. He has, at length, come forward like a statesman, and with true magnanimity has corrected those errors into which he had previously fallen. In his late Message to the House, we hear no more of requesting Colombia and Mexico to suspend their invasion, till the pleasure of Spain can be known; but he has told us distinctly, that, at the Congress of Panama, "all our efforts in reference to this interest will be to preserve the existing state of things, the tranquillity of the islands, and the peace and security of their inhabitants." This declaration is the strongest argument that could be urged, to my mind, in favor of the mission.

Mission to Panama.

Mr. WURR said: I can say, Mr. Chairman, in perfect sincerity and singleness of heart, that I have given to this subject all that reflection which its grave and important character demands: the more so, indeed, as there are those, whose judgment and forecast I hold in the highest respect, found in opposition to the measure. But after listening most attentively to all that has been said, and after weighing most deliberately in my mind all the reasons for and against it, I can arrive at no other conclusion than that this country should be represented in the proposed conferences at Panama.

It has frequently and justly been remarked, in the course of the debate, that this question has excited a deep and lively interest, not only here, where it is to be decided, but throughout the nation, whose attention is fixed upon it. It would indeed be extraordinary, had it been regarded in any other light than as a proposition of high importance to the welfare of this country, and as intimately connected with the preservation and extension of the principles on which our political institutions are founded. The prosperity and power which this great Confederate Republic has attained, has demonstrated to the world, that a free Government, emanating directly from the people, and having for its object their peace, happiness, and security alone, is not an ideal scheme of visionary enthusiasts. It is here shown to be a sober reality—a substantial permanent good, enjoyed and acknowledged by every one within the sphere of its operation, and the moral and political influence of which has extended far beyond our borders.

Stimulated by the practical example which this Government of equal rights and equal laws furnishes to the nations of the earth, the people of the southern portion of our hemisphere have broken the chains which bound them to the car of a despot, and, like the immortal founders of our own Republic, throwing off a state of colonial vassalage, by their joint councils, arms, and efforts, fighting side by side, through a long and bloody war, they have achieved their general liberty and independence. This second revolution upon the American Continent has brought into existence eight sovereign and independent States. The fierceness of the struggle which has given them "their separate and equal station among the nations of the earth" being over, their attention is now anxiously directed to the object of securing and expanding, by international stipulations and conventions, the inestimable blessings for which they have so freely expended their blood and treasure. For this purpose their diplomatic agents are even now assembled in council—and in these important deliberations we are invited to participate, as a people of kindred interests and feelings who have sympathized with them in adversity, rejoiced in prosperity, promptly acknowledged the independence which they have established, and from whom are derived their notions of political and civil liberty. Shall we accept or shall we reject an invitation, growing out of such events, having for its object the attainment of such ends, and given in a spirit of frankness and friendship?—is now the question to be decided. And what, sir, are the objections urged against it?

It is said that the objects of this Congress are imperfectly known, and its powers indistinctly defined. To this I answer, that enough is known of the objects for which it is held, to show, or at any rate to satisfy me, that, in many of them, we have a direct and deep interest, and that it is highly important for us to be there by our Representatives. As to its powers, it cannot be material for us to know more than has already been spread before us, on that head. We know that those by whom we are invited will have power to confer and adjust with us matters of mutual interest. Beyond that, it is unnecessary to extend our inquiries: for, however comprehensive may be the powers of those who are to represent the Republics of the Southern Continent, we know that the powers of those who represent us, must depend upon the peculiar structure and organization of our own Government. They can be nothing more than diplomatic agents.

But it is said that it may violate or endanger our neutrality. To this I answer, that the mere act of sending diplomatic agents there, is no more a violation of our neutrality, than the sending them to any belligerent power—and the risk of its being violated by any acts done by our agents in this Congress, is the same, and no greater, than that it will be violated through the medium of our Ministers now resident at those South American Governments. In addition to this, we know that those who invite us do not expect us to participate in the discussion of any measure that might affect our neutrality, and the Executive expressly disavows any idea of doing so.

But, it is said that, by means of this mission, an alliance, offensive and defensive, may be concluded between us and some one, or all, of these Confederate Republics; and it is upon this danger that my colleague has dwelt with peculiar emphasis.

I answer, as before, that there is no greater risk of such a step being taken through the medium of this mission, than through the medium of our Ministers already in South America. The mission is not necessary to enable the Executive to accomplish that object, if he be desirous of doing it. The power is already in his hands, and has been ever since we recognized the independence of those Governments, and by our appropriations concurred with the Executive and the Senate, in sending Envoys Extraordinary and Ministers Plenipotentiary to them. Against the consummation of such a policy, if we suppose the disposition to pursue it exists on the part of the Executive, we must in this, as in every other case, rely upon the check which the constitution has provided, in the sober views and ripe councils of the Senate; or, failing in our confidence there also, we must retain the power entirely in our own hands, by refusing the appropriation. But, what reason is there to apprehend that the Executive will attempt such a measure? Does he not know the feelings and the views of the people on such questions, and that it is with them a principle almost as well established as any article in our constitution, that, while we maintain "peace, commerce, and honest friendship, with all nations," we will have "entangling alliances with none?" Does he not know that he would not be sustained in a different course by the general voice of the public councils of this nation? If I were his bitterest enemy I could not wish him to take a step more suicidal as regards his public career.

It is alleged, however, that even this kind of confidence is not to be reposed, because the Executive intimates an opinion that it may be desirable to have a mutual stipulation between this country and the Republics of South America, inhibiting the colonization of either continent by European powers; and because the celebrated declaration in the Executive message in 1823, in relation to an interference in the struggle between Spain and her colonies, by any European Government, is now recognized as a pledge to defend them in such an event. Upon the first point I apprehend no danger: the importance of such a stipulation from those Governments, gentlemen will estimate for themselves. I deem it of minor consideration, as compared with other matters; but it may have a value beyond what, on slight examination, we are disposed to give to it. It could produce no evil, however, if confined within the limit indicated by the Executive Message, namely, for each party to maintain the principle in application to its own territory. But this, the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. WICKLIFFE) regarded as a degradation to ourselves. What! stipulate, he asks, with foreign powers, that we will preserve the integrity of our own soil? Sir, this is not treating the question fairly. It is not proposed to go abroad to gather strength, or create inducements to defend our own soil. The colonization of any part of the continent of North America, within our territorial limits, by any Government, never will be permitted, so long as this Republic retains the power to prevent it. The stipulation, therefore, would bind us to no course other than that to which our feelings and our policy would prompt us, independent of it. But it would be the means by which we should obtain the security, so far as international stipulations can give it, that no part of the territorial dominion of the southern Republics should pass, by cession or otherwise, to European powers, who might prove to be troublesome and mischievous neighbors to both of us. In relation to the celebrated declaration contained in the Message of Mr. Monroe, I have but a single remark to make: I say, with the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. JOHNSON,) who addressed us a few days since on this point, that I am not willing to retrace our steps, or to take one particle from the just weight and consideration that was given to it, both by this House and this nation at the time it was made. It has accomplished its purpose; the danger which induced, or which might be considered as incident to the assumption and promulgation of that principle on the part of this Government, has passed away. It bound us not, as we all know, by any treaty stipulation, to the Republics of South America, to take up arms in their cause. It was in the face of the world an assertion of our own great interests, which, however, could not but operate beneficially for them. It was a position to be maintained by us in the best manner we could, consistently with other great and leading considerations in the policy of the country. From it we cannot, and ought not to recede; and whilst I concur with gentlemen in saying that I would not enter into any compact or stipulation with these Republics, which would change our present position as free agents in this matter, still, I maintain that, should the despotic Governments of Europe assume the attitude against which this protest of this nation was made, (of which, however, there is now, happily, no fear,) it would be a most grave and solemn question what our own interests and our duty would require of us in such a crusade against free Representative Government. Every man in this nation would feel that an enemy to its peace and its liberty was at our very door, waging war upon us, by forcibly assailing the principles which lie at the foundation of our political institutions.

I have, then, sir, noticed the objections which have been urged against the mission—with what effect the committee will judge. It would be unpardonable in me to detain the committee by passing seriatim through the several considerations which have been, or may be urged in favor of it: because they are distinctly set forth in the Executive papers on our table, and are again brought perspicuously in review before us by the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs; all of which, I doubt not, have been read by every member of this committee, under the impulse of that intense interest which the subject has excited. There is one point to which, however, I must call the attention of the committee for a few minutes: it is the fate of the island of Cuba, as connected with this question.

I listened, Mr. Chairman, with the most profound attention to the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. HAMILTON,) to ascertain, if possible, what his views really are as to the policy to be pursued by this Government in relation to this island. But I was not able to infer from his remarks, what measures he would pursue, if the whole power of the Government, in this particular, were vested in him. It is apparent, however, that neither he nor my colleague is satisfied with the steps which, from the documents before us, it appears that the Government has taken, or with those which it yet proposes to take. They are dissatisfied with and condemn things as they now find them—that we could all gather from their remarks; but they do not come forward and tell us what they think would place us in a better situation. Whilst they abstain from doing so, they will both be candid enough to admit that the question is one of extreme delicacy and difficulty. We should not form and express a hasty opinion upon the subject, as presented by the documents upon our table, for it is very possible that they may give us but a partial view of the ground. There may be negotiations pending at this moment in relation to Cuba, about which we know nothing—about which the Executive, under the qualified call made upon him has deemed it incompatible with the public interest to communicate with us, and about which we ought not to seek to be informed, since it might be the means of defeating the very object for which such negotiations may have been instituted. Take, for example, the case of a proposed cession of the island of Cuba, by Spain, to some other European power. Such an event would arouse the vigilance of the Government, and, undoubtedly, lead to important diplomatic communications with Spain, and, perhaps, with other European Courts also. Such an emergency may have happened, and in consequence of it, the Executive may have taken such measures, or assumed such language and attitude, as, if disclosed, would meet our approbation; but at the same time, the publicity of them might be the most effectual method of preventing all the beneficial results otherwise to be attained by them. So, also, to the Republics of South America, our language may have been of a much stronger and more decided character than that which has met the public eye in these documents.

Mission to Panama.

I agree with my colleague, (Mr. BUCHANAN,) that the ultimate destiny of Cuba is of vast importance to us, in more respects than one. It commands the only outlet of the Western States to the Ocean, lies in the track of our commerce on the seaboard, and, in the hands of any European State possessing a more powerful marine than Spain, might be the means of exercising a controlling and pernicious influence upon the industry of our country in all its branches. How far we ought to go to prevent such an evil, is another most grave and solemn question, which, however, we are not now called upon to decide. If we were, I, for one, should be prepared to say, that this nation ought not to see that island pass from the dominion of Spain to that of any European Government whatever.

Vol. IX.—10

But, aside from commercial considerations, its intimate connection with our interests in another point of view, should carry us to Panama.

There are interests, sir, in this Union, south of a certain line, often mentioned in this House, in relation to which I shall make it a rule not to speak, unless when they be pressed upon me by those more intimately connected with them than I am. I am willing to leave them with those who, from their locality, must understand them better, and feel the pressure of them more strongly than I do. But, if they would be guided by my counsel, they would avoid the mention, or, at any rate, the public discussion of them, unless when the most imperious necessity may require it. If there be an evil so fearful and appalling as they represent, in the bosom of the Southern States of this Union, it is much more likely to be aggravated and hastened to a crisis, than alleviated and checked, by frequent recurrence to it in this House.

It is admitted on all hands, however, that the invasion of Cuba by the Republican armies of South America, under the banner of universal emancipation, might be productive of the most deplorable consequences by its influence and operation on those interests. If so, I cannot but express my surprise, that any gentleman from the South should be arrayed against the mission. Nevertheless, the gentleman from South Carolina has told us, that Cuba is the stalking horse on which this mission was to ride through this House.

Sir, who was it that first, in this House, connected Cuba with the mission? Was it not a gentleman from Virginia? (Mr. FLORID,) who, I am sorry to hear, is now detained from it by indisposition. Did he not warn us, and have not other gentlemen south of the line to which I have alluded, warned us, of the desolation and horrors of a servile war? And, if there be this danger, shall we sit down in apathy, fold our arms, and wait till the whirlwind has overtaken us? Or, shall we be up and doing, while opportunity is left to us? Shall we meet this danger, look it full in the face, as becomes us, and provide against it as we best can? Surely, sir, there is no reason to pause, and hesitate in our course. On the contrary, there is every motive for prompt action. If the invasion of this island, by the southern Republics, be a matter of such all-speaking importance to us, shall we absent ourselves from the spot where we can most effectually interpose to prevent it? Shall we not go where the effort is to be made, or shall we not make the effort at all? Hitherto we have succeeded in arresting the measure by timely intercession. But affairs are now drawing to a crisis. Spain is driven from the continent; but she still chooses war rather than peace. The new Republics will not maintain fleets and armies in idleness. They will seek their enemy where he is to be found; and the very council to which they have invited us, is to decide upon the fate of this island, so momentous in its consequences to us. Yet we hesitate whether we shall once more interpose, at the only place, and in the only manner, in which it can be done, to prevent the consummation so much dreaded. Assuredly, sir, if gentlemen apprehend the consequences which have been predicted, they should hail this mission as the best, if not the only means, of preventing them.

The House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, April 12.

Florida Indians.

An engrossed bill for the relief of the Florida Indians was read a third time, in the following words:

"A bill for the relief of the Florida Indians.

"Be it enacted, &c. That the sum of twenty thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the directions of the President, in affording sustenance to the suffering Florida Indians."

Mr. STEWART said, though he might stand alone, he rose to ask the yeas and nays on the passage of this bill. Upon mature reflection, he was satisfied that this bill not only involved an important constitutional question, but would establish an important precedent. If Congress can appropriate money for this object, they can appropriate for any object whatever. There remained no constitutional limitation on this power. Though his views were thought to be too liberal on this subject, yet he was not prepared to go the extent of this bill. From the vote yesterday it was quite evident that the bill would pass almost unanimously, yet he wished the vote recorded, and the question settled; and, therefore, asked for the yeas and nays.

The House sustained the call, and the yeas and nays being taken, were—yeas, 140; nays, 7.

So the bill was passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

Mission to Panama.

The House having again resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Foreign Relations, approving the mission to Panama, with the amendments proposing a qualification to the general expression of approbation thereof—

Mr. LIVINGSTON addressed the committee as follows:

The first object for discussion that presents itself, is the constitutional power of the House to grant or refuse the appropriation. This part of the subject was pressed upon my consideration about 80 years ago, when I first had the honor of a seat in this House. I then formed opinions which have been confirmed by subsequent reflection, and which establish distinctions in the right to the exercise of this power; an inattention to which, has caused much of the confusion and difference of opinion that has since occurred. These distinctions are clearly marked, in my comprehension; and, if I can succeed in impressing them on the minds of others, as definitely as they are marked on my own, I think our course of conduct, on this occasion, will be free from constitutional difficulties. In ordinary cases, such as providing the salaries for offices previously created by law, and for carrying on the usual and necessary operations of Government, although the House has the power to refuse appropriations, yet it is a power that can be properly exercised in extreme cases only; and, therefore, it can be provided for by no rules, and can scarcely be admitted in argument among the legal powers of the House. Yet, a case may be imagined, in which it might become necessary to stop the progress of the Government, in its Executive branches; but this remedy would amount to a temporary dissolution of the Government, by the derangement of its parts. In the ordinary cases, then, which I have described, I think we may safely come to this conclusion: that it is the duty of the House of Representatives, in the exercise of their share of legislative functions, provide for the payment of all officers, legally appointed, and other expenses previously authorized, or necessary for carrying on the usual operations of Government; of which necessity, when not previously authorized, they are the proper judges. To exemplify this part of the rule—where an army has been raised, and the pay of the officers and men fixed by law, there is a duty to appropriate the money required to pay them; yet, if that army entertained projects injurious to the peace or liberty of the country, which could be defeated by withholding the pay, the case of necessity would have arisen, and the power might and ought to be exercised. Again, if the army do their duty, and expenses are incurred, in the course of their operation, not provided for by law, the House may appropriate or not, as they think the expenses proper or extravagant. Here their discretion is subject only to the obligation of its just and equitable exercise, and they are not bound (as in the case of the provision for a salary previously fixed by law) to appropriate, without consideration whether the salary were extravagant.

In the relation of this power of appropriation to the treaty-making power, there is another distinction. With respect to treaties already made, a wider range is given to our discretion. Should a treaty contain any stipulation requiring the exercise of any of those powers expressly vested in this House, such as the regulation of commerce; any agreement affecting our neutrality, and leading directly to a necessity of changing it into a state of war; the raising a subsidy; the taking off or imposing a duty; in any of these cases, the question of expediency presents itself to the House, unfettered by any other consideration than the inconvenience that would result from the measure. It is an open question, on which they must decide according to their own judgment; and no nation making any such stipulation, would have a right to complain if it were not carried into effect; because, by reading our constitution, they would see that all those subjects are completely under the control of the House. When no stipulation of this kind is contained in the treaty, it is a law, independent of any act of the House. I do not mean to say, even in the first case, of a stipulation on any of the subjects of which the regulation is given to Congress, that the circumstance of the compact having been made, and executed, or relied upon in good faith by the other contracting party, ought not to have its weight in determining the question of expediency. It undoubtedly ought; and, therefore, the reasons for refusal ought, in such case, to be cogent, before the power is exercised; but it creates no duty, such as exists in the case of appropriation for ordinary salaries, and treaties not touching the subjects expressly submitted to the discretion of the House. In these last cases, there is certainly a power of withholding the supply; but a power which should be exercised only in cases of extreme danger, not of mere convenience: whether the danger be such as to justify it, must be left to the prudence and wisdom of the House; and no other rule can, from the nature of the case, be laid down for its exercise.

APRIL, 1826.]

Mission to Panama.

The case now before the House, although it affects our foreign relations, does not come within the description of those which I have last spoken of. No treaty is made, and we cannot say, therefore, whether any will be made: or if made, whether it will contain stipulations on any of the subjects I have enumerated. The constitutional call for the exercise of our discretion, cannot yet be made. It is not, therefore, the case of a demand on us for the execution of a treaty, nor is it precisely (although I think it ought to be governed by the same rules) that of an ordinary appropriation for the payment of the salaries of pre-existent officers. It resembles it in this—that the office, although not created by law, is created by the law of nations, and recognized by the constitution, and that the appointment to fill it, has already been constitutionally made; and, as was well remarked by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. BUCHANAN,) whether we make the appropriation or not, the gentlemen who are named are Ministers, and the treaties they may make, when ratified by the Senate, will be law, in all points that do not require the agency of the House to carry them into effect. It differs only in these features—that the appropriation is asked for to pay the agent, before the duty is performed, and that the motives for the appointment have been detailed to us.

I proceed to consider, which I promise to do very briefly, what are those good effects.

The first, in the order of the Message—and certainly not the least in importance, although it has been deemed proper to treat it with levity—is the cultivation of a spirit of amity and good feeling between us and neighbors with whom we must necessarily be on good or bad terms. Our relative situations forbid the existence of that cold calculating jealousy which has been recommended: we must be good friends, or troublesome neighbors. Our interest, as well as political policy, prescribe the former relation to them; and nothing would ensure the latter so effectually as a refusal (couched in what terms you will) of an invitation the most flattering to national pride, that exists in the annals of diplomacy.

He who does not feel, with patriotic exultation, the proud, the dignified place that we shall occupy on this occasion, can never be convinced by argument. We are invited, not to preside in the council—that would be a vain distinction—but to “fix with our neighbors the great principles of international law,” in which it is “presumed”—I quote from one of the invitations—“that we possess more light upon the subject than the other States of this hemisphere;” and in which it is added, that, although “other parties may propose their views, yet the voice of the United States will be heard with deference and respect.” For my own part, I feel an additional pride in being the citizen of a Republic thus distinguished; thus appealed to; not for the exercise of its force, or the aid of its subsidy; but for the participation of a more precious treasure—its experience, its knowledge, its science in government, and in national law—a treasure, of which we may be profuse without extravagance, and the employment of which will bring us the interest of honor abroad and self-esteem at home.

And who are they, sir, who have given this invitation? Who are they that gentlemen wish us to disgust by coldly, or proudly, or suspiciously, declining it? They are those, sir, who have a right to our advice. Our example gave them the great lesson of independence; our struggles taught them perseverance; our success animated, and our prosperity has encouraged and inspired them; they have copied our political institutions, and the characters of our statesmen and heroes are the objects of their emulation and respect; and, if our Revolution had never taken place, they would still have been poor oppressed colonies, crouching under the rod of a European master. With all these reasons for national attachment to us, shall we have none for them; and, wrapping ourselves in a cold-hearted policy, shall we deny them the common courtesies of civilized national intercourse? Sir, in this part of my argument, I am not advocating any alliance, (I am sick of the eternal repetition of the epithet “entangling”) or other political connection that may involve us in war or other difficulty; a kind feeling, a free intercourse, the exchange of good offices; the friendship arising from a similarity of institutions: all those things, better felt than described, which produce national as well as individual friendships, and which lead to planations of misunderstandings, that would, if fomented by the opposite feelings, break out into quarrels and war. These are all I recommend, and these are certainly effects that may reasonably be expected from the mission.

Instead of this, what are we told? Guard against this national attachment—forget that they are struggling for that inestimable blessing which you have obtained; forget that you first set the example which they follow; forget that you were the first to cheer and encourage and salute them by a recognition of their title to a place among the nations of the earth; throw away the advantages resulting from their neighborhood—convert it into a curse by jealousy of their motives; tell them that you consider their glorious independence as not so advantageous to you as the former state of vassalage in which they were held; call them ambitious military Republics, and guard yourselves particularly against any connection with them: for they are your NATURAL ENEMIES.

Peace with Great Britain, as with all the world!—free intercourse!—the most friendly feelings!—gratitude, if you will, for the institutions we derive from her; but no alliance; no standing with her against the whole, or any part of the world. Yet, sir, we are not without our sympathies. Since my friend will have them, I could enumerate a string of them, almost as long, and quite as applicable, as Falstaff's, as thus: John Bull loves money—so does Jonathan: "there's sympathy for you." John Bull loves trade—so does Jonathan: "there's more sympathy." John boasts of his valor and liberty—so does Jonathan. "Go to, then, would you desire better sympathy." John has a quick sense of his political and commercial interests; and, wherever they are discussed, his most able diplomatic agents are, invited or uninvited, to be found. Here, sir, my parallel ends. So does not Jonathan. He will not accept the most respectful invitation; he closes his lips, he stops his ears, and, in continual dread of entangling alliances, he neglects his interests and disgusts his friends.

Next to the advantage to be derived from a general friendly understanding, is that which we promise to ourselves and to the world from the discussion of liberal principles of international law. Those which are intended to ascertain the rights of neutrals, in time of war, are of the utmost importance to our interest, under the pacific policy, which, I trust, we shall always maintain, when it can be done with honor. Those which go to regulate the conduct of belligerents towards each other, in carrying on the unprofitable contest, will serve the cause of humanity, and redound to the endless glory of that nation whose enlightened policy first suggested, and whose persevering efforts shall have established them in the code of nations, as they have always been established in that comprehensive, enlightened self-interest, which should be the basis of all law.

Among the most important of those which regard neutral rights, are the restriction of blockades, and a reduction and proper designation of the list of articles forming contraband of war, and the establishment of the principle that free ships make free goods.

But the object of a general nature to be discussed at this meeting, on which my friend dwells with the most pleasure, is the protection of private property on the ocean from seizure and pillage; by which I mean, not only the abolition of privateering, but a complete exemption from capture, whether by public or private ships: placing private property and private industry on the sea, upon the same footing upon which the humane principles of modern warfare have placed it upon the land; making it as disgraceful for an Admiral to enrich himself by the capture of a trader, as for a General to pillage the cottage of a peasant.

I now approach the subject which has excited all the fears, called forth all the prejudices, and employed all the talent and eloquence of those who oppose the measure—the discussions that may arise on the declaration made by Mr. Monroe, that we could not see with indifference the interference of any foreign powers in the dispute between Spain and her colonies. This has been called a pledge, and so I consider it—a pledge, not to ourselves or our posterity, which I should consider a subterfuge unworthy a great nation, as well as a solecism in language—but a pledge to the world, that we would interfere, according to our means, to resist such interference. And it is one which, although made by one branch of the Government, was ratified by the sentiments of all, and would have been redeemed by the spirit of the people. But that pledge related only to the state of things that then existed. It was made when all the great powers of Europe, except Great Britain, were confederated for the avowed purpose of putting down all representative government in Europe; when the object of the Confederation had been effected in Naples, and was in full operation against Spain, and when the extension of the same principles to America, then not only a probable event, but one known to be the subject of deliberation, would have endangered our own political institutions. The declaration of the President was, at the time, understood to have been made with the concurrence of Great Britain, and together with the interference and remonstrances of that power, to have produced the abandonment of the design. This pledge, however, is now represented as being intended for the foundation of an alliance with Spanish America, to resist any interference whatever in their war with Spain—and I confess that the generality of the terms appears to have produced this impression on some of those Republics—and that they may be fully undeceived; that the true import of the declaration may be satisfactorily explained; is one of the reasons why I advocate the mission: while, on the other hand, I cannot agree to the amendment which forbids discussion on the subject. The circumstances under which the declaration was made, have passed away; they are not likely again to recur; but, I should wish all Europe to understand, that if they should, our conduct would redeem the pledge our Executive then made. How our neutral relations are to be affected by this subject, I cannot conceive. As far as it applies to the island of Cuba, it has been repeated and enforced, and most frankly avowed to the only parties it could affect; and, far from producing any hostile feeling in them, or any expression of dissatisfaction, even its propriety was acknowledged and acquiesced in. The only two powers to either of which Cuba could be transferred, to our detriment, are France and Great Britain; and both of those nations have heard our declarations on that subject, with the express acknowledgment that they were proper. Does any gentleman doubt this, let him refer to Mr. Brown's note to the Baron Damas, of the 2d of January last. In repeating to that Minister the conversation he had held with him, he says: "In the conference with which your Excellency honored me this day, I repeated the same assurances (that 'the United States could not see with indifference Porto Rico and Cuba passing from Spain to any other power,') and added, with a view of guarding beforehand against any possible difficulties that might arise, that my Government could not consent to the occupation of those islands by any other European power than Spain, under any contingency whatever."

Now, sir, what did the Baron de Damas say to this explicit declaration? Did he complain of it, as gentlemen do here, as a breach of our neutral duties, as an interference with the concerns of other nations? Did he warn us that it would draw down the ire of the Holy Alliance, or of any of its members? No, sir; Mr. Brown tells his Excellency that he understood him to say, "that the policy and views of the United States corresponded with those of his Majesty's Government;" and his Excellency does not correct the statement. Thus much for France. Great Britain has gone further: for her agent in Mexico identifies himself with Mr. Poinsett in the communications received and made on the appearance of a French fleet in those seas. Our views on the whole subject are made known to the Russian Government, on Mr. Middleton's application to Count Nesselrode; and by him communicated to all the courts of Europe, including Spain; and yet, we hear nowhere but in our Legislature, the slightest complaint of those views, or any intimation that they are not acknowledged to be just. Here, on the contrary, the most fatal effects are anticipated. Entangling alliances! War! with all its horrors, are to be the immediate and inevitable result of a declaration received without complaint by all the world, and with express approbation by those whom it will most affect.

I come now, sir, to the subject which I consider as of the most vital importance of all those that are contemplated by this mission—the condition of Cuba. Any change must be one that we cannot regard without the liveliest interest. Its transfer to a foreign European power has been already, in some measure, considered; our right to interfere to prevent this has been shown to have been acknowledged and acquiesced in. It is a right arising not only from the danger of vicinity, but from the command which the power holding that island would have over the commercial intercourse of all the Western States, with our own country, and the rest of the world. New Orleans, as a port of export, is now the second in the Union, and soon will be the first. It employs more shipping belonging to other States than any other port does. It cannot be suffered, then, that any foreign power should be placed in a situation which would enable it to interrupt this commerce; the first of all laws, that of self-preservation, justifies our interference, and no decorous language can be too strong to express a determination not to suffer it. But this is not the worst state of things that may grow out of events relating to this island: an evil of more appalling magnitude threatens us from this quarter, and more immediately hangs over my constituents, and the people of other States, who, like them, have a number of slaves; and it is this danger which I hope may be avoided by negotiation: that is my principal inducement for favoring this measure. All the other objects are of sufficient magnitude to justify, but this renders it, in my judgment, imperatively necessary. All this made me look with anxiety to the objections drawn from the nature of the assembly, which, it was said, ought to prevent our being represented at it. From a close attention to all the documents, I could see in it nothing but a deliberate diplomatic meeting, in the consultations of which, the part which we were to take would be determined by the powers and instructions of our own Ministers; and as I could not but believe the solemn official declaration of the President, as to the nature of the power and instructions he intended to give, this objection, and others of a minor nature, with the refutation of which I will not detain the committee, yielded to my sense of duty in giving effect to a measure that may avert from the State I represent, one of the most dreadful scourges which Divine Providence has ever permitted to fall on a nation. It is known, sir, that the invasion of Cuba has been projected for some time past by the united powers of Colombia and Mexico. That invasion, if made with a force insufficient to repress the slaves—if it should depend for its success on their insurrection—or, if their emancipation should be proclaimed, as a consequence of the conquest; in either of these events the result would be such as cannot be regarded without apprehension. In the Northern and Middle States they are not considered as they ought to be; not from any disregard to the fate of their southern neighbors—I do not impute to them such criminal indifference—but not being themselves exposed to it, they have never considered, never calculated the danger. They know Cuba as a place of mercantile resort—as an excellent market for their merchandise—and its vicinity to us has only been thought of in relation to the length of the voyage, and the rate of insurance. But they have had no occasion to reflect, that a few hours, in an open boat, may bring its inhabitants to Florida, and a voyage of little more difficulty, to Louisiana, Alabama, Georgia, and Carolina. Nor have they considered the consequences of such a neighborhood to the citizens of those States—consequences which I shall not endeavor to depict—certain consequences to the miserable masters of the island itself, which must be the scene of their operations: scarcely less certain to the States I have named. A temporary absence alone prevented my being an eye-witness to the devastation of insurgent slaves in my own State, to the shocking but necessary severity which attended its suppression, and to the increased rigor which the abortive attempt of the guilty brought on the unoffending. My nearest connections were among the few survivors who escaped from the smoking and bloody ruins of that fair island, once the seat of commerce, wealth, ease, hospitality, and happiness, where the indulgent master ruled with a paternal hand the contented slave, until a fatal revolution, such as is now perhaps preparing for Cuba, suddenly covered it with carnage and desolation, and, in the struggle, severity and revenge produced atrocities at which human nature shudders, and which no good, promised by a false philanthropy, can ever compensate. Every one who lives in a country where slavery has been established, must ponder seriously on those scenes, and the recital of what has happened; the danger of its recurrence, and the means of avoiding it, must naturally make a more serious impression on his mind, than on that of one more remote from the dangers. To me, from the circumstances I have named, they come home with redoubled force; and when I reflect that, in voting for the measure proposed, I may possibly avert those evils from my constituents; when I think on the consequences of a false judgment, in a matter of this moment, I feel the responsibility of my station, to my conscience, my country, and my God.

Mr. REED next rose, and spoke to the following effect:

Mr. Chairman: I consider the proposed mission to Panama as highly important to the United States. I also consider the amendments offered by the gentlemen from Delaware (Mr. McLANE) and Virginia (Mr. RIVES) to the resolution now before us, as deeply affecting the principles of our Government. These subjects demand our deliberate consideration. I will ask the indulgence of the committee to state, in a plain and concise manner, my views upon both propositions.

The main question presented for the deliberation of the committee is, Shall we make the appropriation necessary to defray the expense of a mission to Panama? The question now more immediately under consideration, is the amendments of the gentlemen from Delaware and Virginia to the resolution of the Committee of Foreign Affairs, resolving that it is expedient to appropriate the funds necessary to enable the President of the United States to send Ministers to the Congress at Panama.

I shall first consider the amendments above referred to. These amendments appear to me to deserve much consideration: for, in my judgment, they are hostile to the spirit of the constitution, and at variance with the uniform usage of this House since the first organization of the Government. These amendments have been termed "the expression of an opinion." They unquestionably are the expression of an opinion: but are they the expression of an opinion proper for us to give? Are we authorized by the constitution to express such opinions, and in such manner?

The amendments, in my judgment, are unauthorized by the constitution, and of dangerous tendency. If unauthorized by the constitution, it must be dangerous for the House of Representatives, directly or indirectly, to assume the power and corresponding responsibility of the Executive branch of the Government. The amendments referred to are no more nor less than instructions to the President and Ministers. We have no power to instruct. It is therefore an assumption of power, unauthorized by the constitution.

Some embarrassment has been felt from the manner in which the subject has been presented to us. The Message of the President, requesting an appropriation, was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. The Message of the President, in answer to our call for information respecting the Panama mission, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. Both committees have reported to the House. The one, that the proposed mission to Panama is expedient—the other have reported a bill granting the money necessary to defray the expense of the mission. We treat the report and bill as distinct subjects. I consider the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs as an able one, but the appropriation bill is the real subject, and the only one, upon which we are called to act in relation to the Panama mission. The appropriation involves the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, or so much of it as proves the expediency of making the appropriation.

The report and bill refer to one and the same subject-matter. The one is the reasoning—the other the result. The close of the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, is, "Resolved, That it is expedient to appropriate the funds necessary to enable the President of the United States to send Ministers to Panama."

Mission to Panama.

The Committee of Ways and Means, because it is expedient, adopting the report of the Committee of Foreign Affairs, for its result, bring in a bill to appropriate $40,000 for that purpose. In one word, the money is to be appropriated because it is expedient, and this assumes the substance of the report. But gentlemen insist upon amending the report, by adding conditions. The money shall be appropriated because it is expedient, and it is expedient, provided certain amendments referred to (now before us) be adopted; which amendments are nothing more nor less than instructions to the Executive and our Ministers. I refer to the amendments, which I will not trouble the committee to read. We then make the appropriation conditionally. We have no authority to annex a condition to our appropriation, nor do we attempt it in the appropriation bill. But we attempt it in the report of the Committee of Foreign Affairs, which lays down the principle on which the appropriation rests. To illustrate the subject farther, it is the usual course in this House for a committee to make a report setting forth the reasons why money should be granted, with a bill making the appropriation. Suppose this had been the mode in the present case. Suppose the Committee of Foreign Affairs had made a report that it was expedient to appropriate the money to defray the expenses of the mission, with a bill making the appropriation. All this might well be united. Add the amendments proposed, which are the conditions—the instructions. If these instructions were incorporated in the act, would such an act pass the House or Senate? I presume not. Yet, in fact, by the amendments proposed, the same thing would be effected, so far as to declare and publish the opinion of this House. I contend that the amendments proposed do go to express the opinion of the House of Representatives as to what should be the instructions; that they express an opinion that the appropriation should be conditional. It is an unwarrantable assumption of power. We have no constitutional right to instruct or annex conditions to an appropriation of the present character. As we have no constitutional authority in the case, we have no right to attempt to reach the object indirectly. I am aware that, as we have no power or control over our ambassadors, and cannot annex a condition to an act making an appropriation for their support, our instructions and opinions as to the condition of the grant, are not obligatory. Still, it is intended that these amendments, expressing such opinion and instructions, placed in alliance and near connection with the appropriation bill, shall have an influence. In my opinion, as far as they may have an influence upon the Executive, or elsewhere, it will be of evil tendency.

But the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. McLane) has informed us that he would not have proposed his amendment, if our opinion had not been requested by the Executive. How has our opinion been requested? "The President, in his Message to this House, observed, that 'the concurrence of the House to the measure, by the appropriations necessary for carrying it into effect, is alike subject to its free determination, and indispensable to the fulfilment of the intention.'"

The Executive asks no opinion, but the opinion which we can constitutionally express, by granting or withholding the appropriation. He could ask no other opinion. The power and responsibility of giving instructions to Ministers and Ambassadors is intrusted alone with the Executive. The constitution has wisely placed it there. There let it remain. But suppose it possible that the Executive should so far forget himself as to request the opinion of this House in relation to the instructions which it might be proper to give our Ministers? Would gentlemen be prepared to grant such a request? Would they be ready to assume the power and the responsibility necessarily connected with it? I trust not. I am not prepared to assume Executive power or Executive responsibility.

I will now make some remarks in favor of the proposed mission to Panama, and of the appropriation necessary to effectuate that object.

The President of the United States, in his Message to both Houses of Congress, informed us "that the Governments of Colombia, of Mexico, and Central America, had severally invited the Government of the United States to be represented at the Congress of Panama, to deliberate upon objects of peculiar concernment to this hemisphere."

The President has given us the letters of invitation from these foreign powers—presenting generally their views of the objects and business of the proposed Congress. He has also given us the answers, on the part of the Executive, to those invitations. They have been so often adverted to in this debate, that I forbear to trouble the committee by referring to any particular part.

The President has nominated two distinguished men as Envoys Extraordinary and Ministers Plenipotentiary. He has, in a communication to the Senate, and, also, in a communication to this House, both of which are before us, stated explicitly his views in relation to the mission. His views have given evidence of talent, and wisdom, and benevolence, which demand, and will, in some day, receive, the tribute of the admiration and love of all the American nations, north and south, and of the world. The Senate of the United States, after due deliberation, have approved of the nomination. The President has now submitted the "propriety of making an appropriation to our candid consideration and enlightened patriotism." We are called upon to give our sanction to the mission, by making the necessary appropriation.

The objects of the mission are various. They unite duty and interest—our own good and the good of nations. But some gentlemen are alarmed. They apprehend evil. If we meet in Congress at Panama, they insist that we must engage in all the deliberations which may come under their consideration, and be finally bound by the result. This view is, in my humble opinion, entirely erroneous—contrary to the opinions expressed in the invitation of those nations; contrary to the opinion expressed in reply to their invitation; and contrary to the express declarations of the President in his communications to us. I will not trouble the committee by reading extracts from these documents, as they are before us, and contradict the above opinions and apprehensions. Those nations do, indeed, solicit us to afford them the light of our knowledge and experience, where we may have no direct interest but the hope of doing good. They will meet in Congress for various purposes; but they do not invite or desire us to join them, further than interest and duty require union. Is there a man in this committee who believes our Ministers will be bound to take a share in discussions upon subjects in which we have no interest? Is there a man in this committee who believes our Ministers will be bound by a majority of the Congress without their own consent? If, peradventure, any stipulations should be agreed upon which the President and Senate did not approve, would they not be rejected? Is there a man in this committee who does not believe that the President will give instructions conformably to his communications made to this House? Is not the Executive bound, by every consideration of honor and duty, to be cautious in giving his instructions? There can be no danger. Some gentlemen seem strangely and unnecessarily alarmed. Beside, whether there be danger or not, the President must decide, and the people of the United States will hold him responsible for his decision, if we do not wrongfully interfere.

Some object on account of the novelty of the mission; others, because they apprehend we are pledged to a particular policy: for, at any rate, they have found the word pledge in the correspondence of one of our Ministers, (Mr. Poinsett.) These objections, and, as it seems to me, timid and unfounded alarms, are excited by a few expressions of foreign Ministers, and our own, perhaps not sufficiently guarded. These detached expressions seem, in the estimation of such gentlemen, to outweigh the whole current of the correspondence of our own Government, and of foreign Governments, and the express declaration of the Executive as to the policy he shall pursue. But Mr. Poinsett gave an informal account of a conversation between himself and the Mexican Government, in which he mentions the word pledge. It yet remains very doubtful whether the word was ever used.

Other gentlemen complain that it is a departure from former usage. The history of the South American Governments is an anomaly in the history of the world. Seven or eight nations have been emancipated, as it were, in a day. They desire to meet with us; shall we refuse, because such an event never has, and, probably, never will again occur? It is no departure from principle. Our Ministers will have no greater power than has been given to all former Plenipotentiaries. If it be unusual, let it be remembered that it corresponds with an unusual and wonderful event in the history of Divine Providence. There will be no departure from the straight and narrow path of duty; no departure from our dearest rights and purest principles. I accuse no man of misrepresentation, in garbling extracts from the communications so liberally given us, but appeal to the whole communications.

The President has fully disclosed his views of the mission; of the restrictions and limitations of the power of our Ambassadors; that it is merely consultative. Yet all this does not seem to afford some gentlemen any satisfaction.

The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RIVES) has given us the history of the origin of the recognition of the Republics of South America, and has quoted from several eloquent speeches of Mr. Clay. I do not perceive his object. Does the gentleman mean to censure the vote of this House upon that subject? It will be remembered it was a very extraordinary vote. According to my recollection, there was but one solitary No. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RIVES) warns us not to be influenced by sympathy. I admit that even sympathy should be subjected to the wholesome discipline of the understanding; but I trust that such pure and heavenly affection may be not only safely indulged, but encouraged. At the same time, while the gentleman warns us to beware of sympathy, he calls to his aid passions of a more unworthy character—passions which need no excitement—fear, anger, jealousy. He would have us take counsel of fear: for the mission may produce, said he, war with England; and he would excite our anger and jealousy, by complaining that Mexico has treated England with more attention and respect than she has treated us.

Much has been said in the course of this debate respecting the islands of Cuba and Porto Rico. They unquestionably present to this nation objects of great difficulty and vast importance. I do not propose to state my views. The subject has been ably examined by others. I could but notice some remarks of gentlemen opposed to the mission.

One gentleman has informed us of the great value of our trade with Cuba, and the great amount of our tonnage employed in that trade, and, in a tone of censure and complaint, suggests that our interests in relation to that island had not been sufficiently regarded by the Executive. Another gentleman severely recriminates the Executive, because he suggests the importance of the mission to Panama in a commercial view. This suggestion is denominated a lure held out to the cupidity of merchants and mercenary men. One gentleman is afraid of entangling alliances, fearing that they may result in war. Another gentleman denounces the Executive with severe censure for the moderate and persuasive language which has been held towards Colombia and Mexico, respecting their taking possession of Cuba. He would have it made known that the United States would declare war immediately if those nations should take the island. Thus the Executive is accused of neglecting our mercantile interests; of being too much alive to and concerned for those interests; of pursuing a course too daring and hazardous; of wanting spirit and energy. Yet all these agree in denouncing his conduct as dangerous and wrong. They all agree that he has done either too much or too little.

These various and contradictory opinions prevailing in this House, clearly prove our incompetency to discharge the Executive functions.

On motion of Mr. HEMPHILL, the committee rose, and

The House adjourned.

THURSDAY, April 13.

Mission to Panama.

The House having again resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Foreign Relations, approving the Mission of Panama, with the amendments proposing a qualification to the general expression of approbation thereof—

Mr. HEMPHILL rose, and addressed the committee as follows:

The resolution which has been offered by the Committee on Foreign Relations, in this unprecedented case, is unconnected with the bill for the appropriation; it is an abstract resolution, at the conclusion of an able report of the committee, setting forth their reasons at large, in favor of the mission. It concurs in the expediency of the measure: for it will not be said, that it means nothing more than that we are constitutionally bound to vote for the appropriation. If we agree to this resolution, we acquiesce in the expediency of the measure, in its unlimited character, which is a very different thing from voting simply in favor of the appropriation bill, as I intend to do.

Although the reasoning of the committee is not considered as bearing on the treaty-making power, the amendment is opposed, as an infringement of that power, and as giving instructions and conditions to our Ministers. But what is the fact? The amendment is the mere expression of the will of this House, on a question of great national concern; and it is immaterial how the opinion of this House reaches the ears of the President, whether by the speeches of members, or the general approbation, or disapprobation, of a particular measure.

The fact being ascertained to his satisfaction, it ought, and doubtless would, have the same influence on him, as a formal resolution: for a resolution in form is nothing more: it only reduces to a certainty the opinion of the House, which cannot as well be ascertained in any other way; and its object is to apprise the Executive of the sentiments of the Representatives of the people. But it does not amount to instructions; the House has no constitutional authority to give instructions: it is not so intended, nor will it be so received—the Executive, with the advantage of this information, will act as he pleases, and take the responsibility. It is acknowledged that the House has a right to express an abstract opinion on great national concerns; and this is nothing more. The appropriation bill stands by itself, and if the adoption of this resolution is not desired to produce some effect on the public opinion, I should be glad to know why we are called upon to act on it. Pass the appropriation bill, and that will be sufficient.

I will here be allowed to call the attention of the committee to the Message and documents from whence we derive our information on the subject; and I will, in their order, advert to the letters of invitation, and the answers to them; and to the manner in which they have been received and treated, by the Executive branch of the Government. The letter of Salazar, under the date of the second of November, 1825, to the Secretary of State, mentions that the honorable Secretary having intimated, in the name of his Government, that the United States, if formally invited by Mexico and Colombia, and apprised of the subjects to be discussed, would, on their part, appoint a person to represent them, if the subject should be approved of by the United States; the undersigned is accordingly authorized, by his Government, to address this invitation; which he now makes, in all due form. The subjects of discussion he puts in two classes:

First. Matters peculiarly and exclusively concerning the belligerents.

Second. Matters between the belligerents and neutrals.

The United States, he said, will not take part in the discussion of the first description; and he confined himself to the latter. He then observed, that an opportunity would be afforded to fix some principles of international law. The manner in which all colonizations of European powers, on the American continent, shall be resisted, and their interference in the present contest between Spain and her former colonies prevented, are other points of great interest. Were it proper, an eventual alliance, in case these events should occur, which is within the range of possibilities, and the treaty, of which no use should be made, until the casus fœderis should happen, to remain secret; or, if this should seem premature, a convention so anticipated would be a different means to secure the same end, of preventing foreign influence: this is a matter of immediate utility to the American States that are at war with Spain, and is in accordance with the repeated declarations and protests of the Cabinet at Washington. The conferences held on this subject being confidential, would increase mutual friendship, and promote the respective interests of the parties. The African slave trade, and the relations of Hayti, are mentioned as other topics.

Obregon's letter is, in substance, the same. After observing that, being informed of the concurrence of this Government in the idea of discussing the first point in a Congress, as was desired, and that it would send representatives to it under condition that the neutrality in which it stood with Spain should not be violated, one of the subjects he mentioned which would occupy the attention of the Congress, would be the resistance or opposition to the interference of any neutral nation, in the question and war of independence between the new powers of the continent and Spain.

After these two principal subjects, the Representatives of the United States of America may be occupied upon others, to which the existence of the new States may give rise. The United States of America may send their Representatives to take part in those questions, which, long since, they were the first in declaring to the world they regarded as of transcendent importance to the interests of all America; and in others, to which the formation of the new States will give rise; the concurrence in which will, moreover, accomplish the object so much desired by the respective Governments, of manifesting, by deeds, the disposition and facility which the powers of this continent possess, to act in concert in the common cause.

The objects to be discussed are, first, exclusively concerning the belligerents—and, secondly, between the belligerents and neutrals. What is the plain meaning of all this? The first class will not be permitted to be discussed; and the reason is, because we will come to no conclusion with the new States upon them: and it would be useless, and beyond the range of diplomacy, to enter into the discussions of subjects, not intended by either party to be acted upon. But the means of making effectual the assertion of the principle of colonization, and of resisting interference from abroad with the domestic concerns of the American Governments, are to be among the subjects of consultation at Panama, by alliances, and mutual pledges, if terms can be agreed upon to the satisfaction of each party. In regard to the interference from abroad it is said that a joint declaration of its character, and exposure of it to the world, may be probably all that the occasion would require; and, whether the United States should or not be parties to such a declaration, may justly form a part of the deliberations; the means of resistance, it is allowed, are generally to be discussed; and it would be strange, and,

I presume, without example, if the President should instruct our Ministers to take a part in the consultation of the means of resistance, if it was his intention to abstain entirely from any agreement on the subject. He has conveyed no such idea; he merely says, it would obviously be premature, at this time, to anticipate that which is offered merely as matter for consultation. With regard to the principle of colonization, it is said, that if it be deemed advisable to contract any conventional engagement on this topic, our views would extend no further than to a mutual pledge of the parties to the compact to maintain the principle, in application to its own territory, and to permit no colonial lodgements or establishment of European jurisdiction upon its own soil. In the Message to the Senate the words are, "Each will guard by its own means." If these mutual pledges would not impose beneficial obligations, it would be nugatory to enter into them; the object is, to make effectual the assertion of the principle. The United States does not require any pledge to protect its own soil; and can it be imagined that any pledge will be made, if the southern Republics are to receive no advantage from it? They are to use their own means; I presume the meaning of that is, if assistance is received, it is some time to be remunerated. The Executive views on the subject cannot be confined to a voluntary permission of European colonization: for no means then would be necessary, as no resistance would be required. The views of Salazar and Obregon are explicit on the subject; and they are nowhere treated otherwise by the President. An alliance of such a mysterious character as the Message exhibits, would, of all others, be the most likely to entangle us. The Republic would expect some advantage, and, when baffled, it would produce irritation and cold feelings. The President is too much of a statesman to enter into a convention which would impose no obligations on either of the parties. And the reasons why he is not more particular, are, because it would be premature, as the subjects are to be under consultation, and it would be impolitic in him to disclose his whole views. There is enough that he is willing to act on these subjects; but, to use his own language, to concur in nothing that will import hostility to Europe, or justly excite resentment in any of the States. This seems to satisfy many gentlemen. I will not collect all the phrases which have been employed, on this point, by the Ministers of the Republics of South America, and the heads of our Government; they are in substance the same, but dressed in different language. I will take those expressed by the President and the Secretary of State.

The amendment does not preclude the treaty-making power from arguing and convincing the Governments of South America of the impropriety of any attempt to liberate from Spain the islands of Porto Rico and Cuba. The treaty-making power is left free to discuss and to divert them from this subject, if it lies in their power—and even to enter into any stipulation on the subject, which will not involve us in any alliance, offensive or defensive. Of all the subjects that can be acted upon in the Congress, this is the most interesting and delicate one to us. Still, according to our policy we cannot, and ought not, to bind ourselves, but be left at liberty to act according to circumstances, when any serious apprehensions may arise, that any European power except Spain meditates the design of possessing the sovereignty of these islands. *If the Republic of Mexico, or the United South American States, will persist in possessing themselves of the sovereignty of these islands, which will be as disadvantageous to us as if the same thing was effected by a European Government, our first power of resistance must be persuasion and advice; the next must depend upon the time and circumstances. Would Congress now pass a law authorizing the President to employ the forces of the nation against any European power who should attempt to take the sovereignty of these islands from Spain? No, they would not. It would be a daring policy; the people would not approve of it; they would not be willing to put this power into the hands of their own Executive, but would prefer to be free to act according to circumstances when the time arrives. And would it be more acceptable to them to see an alliance with the Southern Republics, either offensive or defensive, by which the peace of the nation would be taken partly out of our own hands and committed to others? The answer is irresistibly in the negative. I will not attempt to describe the importance of Cuba to this country. There has been enough said on this head by my colleague (Mr. BURCHAMAX) and others. But I think that our true and dignified policy ought to be the same with all nations; and that we ought to intimate to the new States that our dearest interests will not permit us to look on a change of sovereignty of those islands, by any nation, with indifference. The honorable gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. LIVINGSTON) has described the consequences which would flow from certain conditions of the island of Cuba, in a manner that not only excited his own feelings, but made similar impressions on all who heard him. Certain conditions of the island of Cuba might encourage the rising of the blacks in the South on their masters: for, although I do not consider the slaves of the South as property by divine right, they are so treated by necessity and the constitution; and the more I see and become acquainted with Southern gentlemen, the more I am convinced of the inutility of propositions from the non-slaveholding States on the subject of emancipation. They are only calculated to produce irritation, without the prospect of accomplishing any good. But the gentleman from Louisiana says, however, that the Administration would not permit the new States to carry on war against it in a savage and ferocious manner, by putting weapons into the hands of the blacks to massacre the white population. But, if we wait until these horrors are witnessed, I fear it will be too late for the cause of humanity, as the white population, in the meanwhile, will chiefly be put to death. Cuba belongs to Spain, and, whenever we interfere to support Spain in retaining it, or to prevent her from transferring it to another, we must break our neutrality; and that is an event which we should, at the least, continually hold in anticipation. But the honorable member says, that, on this subject, we will not be able to discuss or speak at the Congress at Panama. In this, according to my conception of the amendment, he is mistaken. It is the design of the amendment, if its principles should be adopted by the Executive, to leave every thing open to free and full discussion, except an alliance offensive or defensive. And, if there should be any doubt on this point, the words of the amendment can easily be enlarged. My colleague (Mr. WURTS) conjectures that the new States may have been informed by our Government that the relations of these islands shall not be changed, even by them. This, I think, would be altogether inconsistent with the request made to Mr. Salazar that the rumored expedition by them against these islands should be delayed for a limited time.

In adopting a system of southern politics, we should observe the most profound caution; every step we take is new and untried. Suppose that England should establish a colony somewhere near Cape Horn, would we send troops, or aid in money? But it may be said this is not within the meaning of the conventional agreement contemplated on this topic—it is only to maintain the principle in application, on the part of each, to its own territory. If this is really the meaning, it is the most judicious agreement that could be made between us—that is, do you protect your own soil, and we will protect ours, each with our own means; and let us enter into the best commercial arrangements in our power for the enjoyment of the geographical advantages of the two countries. We will suppose, again, that England would be inclined to favor the Government of Brazil in the existing war with Buenos Ayres, and should interfere to partition off a part of the country belonging to the latter, and annex it to the Government of Brazil. This would come within the meaning. I ask, in such an event, would the people of this country be willing to go to war with England? I think I may safely affirm that they would not. Then why should we keep up the idea of this pledge, after it had performed its office? It was wise and patriotic when made, and nobody wishes to detract from President Monroe the unfading honor which he acquired by announcing it to the world; but the end designed is now accomplished and over.

I shall make no effort to diminish the weight of the reasons given by the President, except the last: I cannot pass that over unnoticed, as I differ so essentially in opinion with him. General Washington, when living, was the fairest and purest model of prudence and firmness of any man on earth. When he first accepted the command of the army, every one will remember his cautious language: "But," said he, "lest some unlucky event should happen unfavorable to my character and to my reputation, I beg it may be remembered by every gentleman in this room, that I this day declare, with the utmost sincerity, that I do not think myself equal to the command I am honored with." And this was the cautious and prudent character he maintained from that day until the day of his death; he stood as the rock of our salvation in many a trying scene. And in 1793, when the wild principles of French liberty were fast disseminating themselves among the people, whose passions had been roused in favor of aiding the French who had fought for us; he remained at the helm of the Government unshaken, and issued his proclamation of neutrality, which put into practice the specific character of the country, by which the nation was saved from a war. And, on his retirement from his unprecedented public career, he left his principles of policy respecting other nations, as a legacy to his country. He warned us against the danger of entangling alliances; he spoke of Europe, of their primary interests, and of the distance; he could not do otherwise, these being facts. But it is not, in my apprehension, deducible from this, that he would have recommended entangling alliances with the new Republics on our borders, just after they had risen into existence. He warned us against alliances with the countries we then had intercourse with; and the danger would be as great, if not greater, to form alliances with countries adjoining us. I am exceedingly mistaken in the character of General Washington, if he would not, on such an occasion as this, have had an agent on the spot, to transmit information to be deliberated upon at home in the first instance, and to be made acquainted with the powers of this Congress and the mode of its organization, before he would have done any act—he would not have gone on speculation and experiments—I think he would have had an agent there before this time. Let the counsels of General Washington be our guide in this important crisis, and let us enter into no alliance, offensive or defensive, on any point, in time of peace, with any country. But the President's observations on the counsels of Washington prove conclusively what I have before affirmed, that there is a willingness on the part of the President to enter into these alliances. He says, I cannot overlook the reflection, that the counsel of Washington, in that instance, like all the counsels of wisdom, was founded on the circumstances, in which our country, and the world around us, were situated at the time when it was given. The President then compares our situation, and the circumstances of that time, with those of the present day, and then asked what, from the very words of Washington, would be his counsel to his countrymen now. Is not this the language of the President, that, under the circumstances of that day, Washington warned us against entangling alliances with the powers of Europe? But, under the circumstances of the present day, as respects the Republics of South America, his advice would be different now to his countrymen? If that is not the inference, and the undeniable inference, I should doubt my own existence: and it is in strict accordance with his acceptance of the invitation under the fetters of Salazar and Obregon, where they, without the least disguise, treated the alliances on the two points as not being inconsistent with the neutrality of this country, which every candid statesman must acknowledge to be the fact; and it is also coincident with the other part of his Message, which I have already had the honor of referring to; and it moreover appears to me that he has made no effort to conceal his sentiments. This is the position on which I stand, and the foundation of my argument, that there is a willingness on the part of the President to enter into alliances with the Republics of South America on the two points heretofore alluded to.

Is this the opinion of the people of this country? Is it the opinion of their Representatives on this floor? If it is, reject the amendment at once. But, if it is otherwise, I am persuaded that the committee will see the propriety of adopting it, to arrest this policy on its first appearance. It will not be binding on the Executive; but he will, doubtless, attend to it with the deepest respect. We should enter into no entangling alliances with these new Republics, but let them enjoy our hearty sympathies and the moral influence of our example. We will rejoice at their successes—they are our sister Republics, and our neighbors, and we must have immense dealings with them. Let them see us busy in the improvement of our own country, and in the encouragement of the various pursuits of man—let them see our march of mind in the arts and sciences, and our general activity and industry—let them learn that we do not waste our treasures in pomp and splendor, but expend them for the prosperity and happiness of the people—and let them know that our policy is peace, whenever it can be preserved with honor, and that we will not enter into entangling alliances with any nation—and let them be informed of the effect of our pacific policy; how it has converted our wilderness into cultivated fields, and caused the building of numerous and beautiful cities; and how rapidly, under the auspices of our free institutions, it has increased our population and national wealth. The influence of such examples will do more for these new Republics than all the swords that we can employ in their favor, and all the alliances that we can make with them, which, in the end, might prove dangerous to both countries.

Mission to Panama.

[H. or R.]

Mr. F. JOHNSON said: The true policy of our country is peace—our proper ground is neutrality—and I am as unwilling to depart from either, as any one here. I am opposed to all alliances, offensive or defensive, and to all entangling leagues whatever. I am for my country being left free, and to act according to circumstances, to preserve and maintain its rights and its interests.

Our institutions are Republican; the feelings, the habits, and manners, of the people of the United States are essentially Republican. It is human nature to be partial to ourselves, our families, and our friends; and it is according to the dictates of the same nature to feel a partiality for that country and that people, whose institutions assimilate nearest our own. It is human nature to feel and sympathize for those who have struggled against and overcome the difficulties and adversities which we ourselves have had to encounter; and hence, it is pardonable, and even praiseworthy, in the people of this country, to yield their best wishes to a people who, like our ancestors, have broken the chains of tyranny, and triumphantly achieved their liberties.

That part of the continent of America, conquered and colonized by Spain some centuries ago, has remained, until within a recent period, almost entirely concealed behind the veil of Spanish policy; its extent, its population, and its resources, were but partially known, and little understood by the rest of the world. All at once, as it were, thirty millions of people presented themselves, contending for their liberties against that monarchy which had so long held them in the most abject vassalage. They have shown, that they possessed bravery to obtain, and virtue to maintain their independence: instead of Spanish colonies, they present to the rest of the human family seven independent and sovereign Republics. And when gentlemen suppose we feel no sympathy for these Republics, their supposition is against nature, and against fact. These Republics look to our institutions as the model for their own; they look to us as impartial and disinterested friends, who desire their prosperity and independence, and as willing to yield them any advice or counsel which our experience may afford. If they cannot look to us as friends to their institutions, to whom can they look? To Spain, to France, or to the Allied Sovereigns, who are anxious to see them return to their colonial bondage? Where is the Republican Government on earth with which they can commune freely, except it is ours? Through all their struggles, they have been accompanied by our wishes for their success; they have shown the utmost friendship for, and confidence in, us; they have achieved their independence, and have agreed to hold a council to consult on, and to devise the best means to preserve and perpetuate the liberties they have so nobly won: to adjust important regulations of friendly and commercial intercourse among themselves and with other nations; and other matters, in which this country is also deeply interested, are to be discussed and settled there; and they have invited us to attend their deliberations, by our Ministers or agents. They are our neighbors; and who will imagine that we are not deeply interested in their fixing permanently and firmly their Governments on the model and principles of our own, and of laying a sure foundation of perpetual peace? And shall we refuse the friendly invitation, upon so momentous an occasion, in the final results of which our institutions, our peace, our commerce, and the principles of liberty, may be so essentially and vitally affected?

But, it is said we ought not to send Ministers, for fear of entangling alliances. What ground, I ask, is there for these fears? There is nothing of the kind to be found in the documents or correspondence. But the letter of Mr. Salazar has been referred to as conclusive, in which he says, "if it be proper, an eventual alliance may be formed." And in what spirit was this expression made? By an examination of the whole correspondence with the Republics on the subject, it will be found that those Republics, reposing in us the utmost confidence, have intimated a willingness to be guided, in a good degree, by our counsels, in drawing closer together the bonds of friendship. His expression is, "if it be not improper;" showing that he himself doubted the policy, but, at the same time, was willing to submit the subject to consideration.

In all the invitations to this meeting, including Mr. Salazar's, we are expressly told that it will not be expected that we shall take any step, or enter into any discussion or negotiation, which will have a tendency to interrupt our neutrality; that they desire our aid in discussing such topics, and settling such matters only as are of an interesting nature to us, and such as are of common interest to both countries.

Why should they desire an alliance, offensive or defensive, with us? The time when they needed our assistance is gone by. In the time of their struggles and conflicts, they might have imagined an alliance useful to them. But now, when not an enemy, not a Spanish bayonet, is to be found within their whole country; when the Allies of Europe have abandoned all designs against them; when England has become their friend—at least in commercial relations—what need have they for alliances, except among themselves? Spain is unable to renew the war; no war, in fact, exists—it is but in name. So weak and powerless is the Government of Spain, that it has had to renew its engagements to retain the French troops within its territories, to sustain Ferdinand on the throne.

The South American Republics need no alliances with us; they want none; and if they did I should be unwilling to agree to it. The President has expressly told us that none would be contracted, or entered into; and, before he would accept the invitation, he tells us that,

"among the inquiries which were thought entitled to consideration before the determination was taken to accept the invitation, was that, whether the measure might not have some tendency to change the policy hitherto invariably pursued by the United States, of avoiding all entangling alliances, and all unnecessary foreign connections." Could any man have acted with more caution than the President has, before he would accept the invitation, to ascertain whether our acceptance, and sending Ministers, "might not have a tendency to change our policy?" And yet some gentlemen contend that there is reason to fear that the President intends to form alliances. Sir, the gentlemen in the opposition have placed themselves on difficult ground to be maintained, of arguing against facts. And, if the facts were not so glaring against them, yet, in support of their amendments, they would be bound at least to show, that the Republics of South America wished to enter into such alliance, and that the President intends it; they ought to show both; they can show neither: their argument stands without proof—opposed by the interests and true policy of both countries, and to the declaration of the President.

It is alleged, that one language has been held on the other side of the water, and another on this side, in regard to Cuba; and, by the way, I suppose, of adding weight to the charge, it is also said the letter of the Secretary of State to Mr. Middleton, which contains what was said over the water, was sent to the Senate and not to this House. Sir, there is neither inconsistency nor impropriety in the language used to Mr. Middleton, nor in withholding that paper from this House. In the communication to Mr. Middleton, the Secretary, in urging on Russia the necessity and importance of her interfering with Spain to get her to acknowledge the independence of the Southern Republics, as the only means Spain had of reserving the island of Cuba, tells Mr. Middleton, as much as this Government desires to see Cuba remain in the hands of Spain, yet the President does not see how the United States can rightfully interfere with force between Spain and the Republics, to prevent their taking it, if Spain obstinately persists in protracting the war. To the Government of Mexico, the Secretary says, the United States are unwilling to see Cuba pass from Spain, and requests they should desist from taking it; but he did not add that the United States could not rightfully interfere with force to prevent its transfer; and this is substantially (for I do not pretend to quote the language of the Secretary) the difference complained of, and so much dwelt upon, by some gentlemen in the opposition.

The object of the negotiation, on the part of this Government, was, to prevent Cuba changing masters, and to bring about a peace between Spain and the Republics, by getting Spain to acknowledge their independence. Cuba was in danger of being taken by Mexico and Colombia. Russia was apprised of it, and told we could not use force to prevent the conquest; but, if Spain would acknowledge the independence of the Republics, and thereby make peace with them, that she would, by that means, be able to hold Cuba. This view of the subject, it was hoped, would induce Russia and France to interfere and prevail on Spain to do so—in order to suspend the enterprise against the island—until the result of the negotiation should be known. It was said to Mexico and Colombia, that the United States are unwilling to see Cuba pass from Spain, and we desire you to desist from taking it. Suppose the Secretary had said to Russia, after requesting her mediation with Spain on the subject, that this Government will not permit the Republics to take Cuba, where would have been the inducement to Russia to interfere, or for Spain to yield? Suppose he had said to Mexico, that, although the United States do not wish Cuba to pass out of the hands of Spain, yet, if you choose to take it, the President cannot see any ground upon which this Government can interfere; would there have been any inducement for them to have forbore to execute the enterprise they were preparing against Cuba? What ought to have been said? Precisely what was said—to Russia an open and candid view of the policy of this Government was stated; and to the Republics, the wish of this country in regard to Cuba was also fairly stated.

But the opinion that we could not rightfully interpose with force, to prevent their taking it, was withheld, leaving them to conjecture as to the course that would be pursued in case they made the attempt. The Republics want peace; Spain wants to retain Cuba; and Cuba seems to be the only means left by which Spain and the Republics can be brought to terms. The negotiation has been ably and properly conducted, upon fair and just principles, and the only impropriety I can see in the whole affair, is the publication of the letter to Mr. Middleton, pending so important a negotiation—a thing altogether unprecedented in the annals of our country. If the Senate, regardless of the interests of our country, have caused that letter to be published, it surely can form no ground for the enemies of the mission to Panama, to charge improper conduct on the President or Secretary. The reasons which influenced the President to withhold that letter from this House must be obvious; the Executive knew it ought not to be made public during the negotiation—it accompanied a confidential communication to the Senate. In the resolution of this House he was told that it was not desired he should send us any thing that, in his opinion, the public interest required he should not disclose. The communication to this House was understood as intended for the public as well as ourselves. He ought not, therefore, to have sent it to this House; and yet, strange as it may seem, he is charged on this floor with great impropriety for sending that document to the Senate, where it was expected to be kept from public view until the negotiation was ended, and for not sending it to this House to be made public. Sir, if he had done as the gentlemen complain he did not do, he most certainly would have done wrong—as it has, he has done right. After the publication of this document by the Senate, if the Republics of the South do not take Cuba, it will be altogether owing to their friendship and regard to the wishes and interests of this country. Before it was published they could not know but we would employ force to prevent their taking it—now they know we will not interpose. They have the strongest possible inducements to take it. It is a rich prize—but it is more: it serves Spain as a rallying point for offensive operations against Mexico, Colombia, and Guatemala, being situated near to each of these Republics. And so long as Spain holds that island, and continues the war, each of these Governments will be compelled to keep up a force to protect themselves from invasion from it; a force in each, more than competent to subdue Cuba. Neither can they tell at what moment an invasion may be attempted. And can we expect that they will continue to endure this expense, as well as the constant apprehension of invasion, merely to oblige us? Would we, placed in their situation, forbear to rid ourselves of such an expense and such an annoyance? And, if we would not, can we expect it from others, and can it be expected that we should make war against the Republics for Spain? We do not want the island of Cuba: it is contrary to our policy, to our settled principles, and our true interests, to have colonies; and it is a policy we shall adhere to so long as we shall entertain a due sense of our interests. No, sir, we do not want Cuba nor Canada. We would not have either to-morrow, if they were offered to us. We have territory enough for these fifty years at least; and we are happy and prosperous under our present policy; and I never wish to see it changed in that respect.

It is our interest that Cuba shall remain as it is. I deny the right of England or France, or any European power, to take Cuba—it is no point of annoyance to them—it does not lie contiguous to them; and our interest and safety admonish us it ought not to pass into the hands of any of the great maritime powers. They might be disposed to blockade the Mississippi, or create a system of monopoly in the island. It would be a convenient point from which to make invasions on the Southern States of our Union; and we must, therefore, take care it does not fall into such hands, peaceably nor forcibly. But, if it must pass from Spain, I cannot say with the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. HAMILTON,) that I would rather it should go into the hands of England. No, sir, if it must pass from Spain, and if it can go without a recurrence of the blood and confusion of St. Domingo, I had rather it should pass into the hands of Mexico, who is our neighbor, and not our rival.

The House adjourned.

FRIDAY, April 14.

Mission to Panama.

The House having again resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Foreign Relations, approving the Mission to Panama, with the amendments proposing a qualification to the general expression of approbation thereof—

Mr. WEBSTER addressed the committee as follows:

Mr. Chairman: I am not ambitious of amplifying this discussion. On the contrary, it is my anxious wish to confine the debate, so far as I partake in it, to the real and material questions before us.

Our judgment of things is liable, doubtless, to be affected by our opinions of men. It would be affectation in me, or in any one, to claim an exemption from this possibility of bias. I can say, however, that it has been my sincere purpose to consider and discuss the present subject with the single view of finding out what duty it devolves upon me, as a member of the House of Representatives. If any thing has diverted me from that sole aim, it has been against my intention.

I think, sir, that there are two questions, and two only for our decision. The first is, whether the House of Representatives will assume the responsibility of withholding the ordinary appropriation for carrying into effect an Executive measure, which the Executive Department has constitutionally instituted? The second, whether, if it will not withhold the appropriation, it will yet take the responsibility of interposing with its own opinions, directions, or instructions, as to the manner in which this particular Executive measure shall be conducted?

I am, certainly, in the negative, on both these propositions; I am neither willing to refuse the appropriation, nor am I willing to limit or restrain the discretion of the Executive beforehand, as to the manner in which it shall perform its own appropriate constitutional duties. And, sir, those of us who hold these opinions have the advantage of being on the common highway of our national politics. We propose nothing new; we suggest no change; we adhere to the uniform practice of the Government, as I understand it, from its origin. It is for those, on the other hand, who are in favor of either or both of the propositions, to show us the cogent reasons which recommend their adoption. The duty is on them to satisfy the House and the country that there is something in the present occasion which calls for such an extraordinary and unprecedented interference.

The President and Senate have instituted a public mission, for the purpose of treating with foreign States. The constitution gives to the President the power of appointing, with the consent of the Senate, Ambassadors, and other public Ministers. Such appointment is, therefore, a clear and unquestionable exercise of Executive power. It is, indeed, less connected with the appropriate duties of this House than almost any other Executive act, because the office of a public Minister is not created by any statute or law of our own Government. It exists under the law of nations, and is recognized as existing by our constitution. The acts of Congress, indeed, limit the salaries of public Ministers; but they do no more. Every thing else in regard to the appointment of public Ministers, their numbers, the time of their appointment, and the negotiations contemplated in such appointments, is matter for Executive discretion. Every new appointment to supply vacancies in existing missions, is under the same authority. There are, indeed, what we commonly term standing missions, so known in the practice of the Government, but they are not made so by any law. All missions rest on the same ground. Now the question is whether the President and Senate, having created this mission, or, in other words, having appointed the Ministers, in the exercise of their undoubted constitutional power, this House will take upon itself the responsibility of defeating its objects, and rendering this exercise of Executive power void?

By voting the salaries in the ordinary way, we assume, as it seems to me, no responsibility whatever. We merely empower another branch of the Government to discharge its own appropriate duties, in that mode which seems to itself most conducive to the public interests. We are, by so voting, no more responsible for the manner in which the negotiation shall be conducted, than we are for the manner in which one of the Heads of Departments may discharge the duties of his office.

On the other hand, if we withhold the ordinary means, we do not incur a heavy responsibility. We interfere, as it seems to me, to prevent the action of the Government according to constitutional forms and provisions. It ought constantly to be remembered that our whole power, in the case, is merely incidental. It is only because public Ministers must have salaries, like other officers, and because no salaries can be paid, but by our vote, that the subject is referred to us at all. The constitution vests the power of appointment in the President and Senate; the law gives to the President even the power of fixing the amount of salary, within certain limits; and the only question here is upon the appropriation. There is no doubt that we have the power, if we see fit to exercise it, to break up the mission, by withholding the salaries; we have power also to break up the court, by withholding the salaries of the Judges, or to break up the office of President, by withholding the salary provided for it by law. All these things, it is true, we have the power to do, since we hold the keys of the Treasury. But, then, can we rightfully exercise this power? The gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. BUCHANAN,) with whom I have great pleasure in concurring on this part of the case, while I regret that I differ with him on others, has placed this question in a point of view which cannot be improved. These officers do, indeed, already exist. They are public Ministers. If they were to negotiate a treaty, and the Senate should ratify it, it would become a law of the land, whether we voted their salaries or not. This shows that the constitution never contemplated that the House of Representatives should act a part in originating negotiations or concluding treaties.

I know, sir, it is a useless labor to discuss the kind of power which this House incidentally holds in these cases. Men will differ in that particular; and, as the forms of public business and of the constitution are such that the power may be exercised by this House, there will always be some, or always may be some, who feel inclined to exercise it. For myself, I feel bound not to step out of my own sphere, and neither to exercise nor control any authority, of which the constitution has intended to lodge the free and unconstrained exercise in other hands. Cases of extreme necessity, in which a regard for public safety is to be the supreme law, or rather to take place of all law, must be allowed to provide for themselves when they arise. Reasoning from such possible cases will shed no light on the general path of our constitutional duty.

Mr. Chairman, it is our fortune to be called upon to act our part, as public men, at a most interesting era in human affairs. The short period of your life, and of mine, has been thick and crowded with the most important events. Not only new interests and new relations have sprung up among States, but new societies, new nations, and families of nations, have risen to take their places, and perform their parts, in the order and the intercourse of the world. Every man, aspiring to the character of a statesman, must endeavor to enlarge his views to meet this new state of things. He must aim at adequate comprehension, and, instead of being satisfied with that narrow political sagacity, which, like the power of minute vision, sees small things accurately, but can see nothing else, he must look to the far horizon, and embrace, in his broad survey, whatever the series of recent events has brought into connection, near or remote, with the country whose interest he studies to serve. We have seen eight States, formed out of colonies on our own continent, assume the rank of nations.

This is a mighty revolution; and, when we consider what an extent of the surface of the globe they cover; through what climates they extend; what population they contain, and what new impulses they must derive from this change of Government, we cannot but perceive that great effects are likely to be produced on the intercourse and the interests of the civilized world. Indeed, it has been forcibly said, by the intelligent and distinguished statesman who conducts the foreign relations of England, that when we now speak of Europe and the world, we mean Europe and America; and that the different systems of these two portions of the globe, and their several and various interests, must be thoroughly studied and nicely balanced by the statesmen of the times.

Mission to Panama.

[H. OF R.]

In many respects, sir, the European and the American nations are alike. They are alike Christian States, civilized States, and commercial States. They have access to the same common fountains of intelligence; they all draw from those sources which belong to the whole civilized world. In knowledge and letters, in the arts of peace and war, they differ in degrees; but they bear, nevertheless, a general resemblance. On the other hand, in matters of government and social institutions, the nations on this continent are founded upon principles which never did prevail, in considerable extent, either at any other time, or in any other place. There has never been presented to the mind of man a more interesting subject of contemplation than the establishment of so many nations in America, partaking in the civilization and in the arts of the Old World, but having left behind them those cumbrous institutions which had their origin in a dark and military age. Whatsoever European experience has developed, favorable to the freedom and the happiness of man; whatsoever European genius has invented for his improvement or gratification; whatsoever of refinement or polish the culture of European society presents for his adoption or enjoyment—all this is offered to man in America, with the additional advantages of the full power of erecting forms of Government on free and simple principles, without overturning institutions suited to times long passed, but too strongly supported either by interests or prejudices to be shaken without convulsions. This unprecedented state of things presents the happiest of all occasions for an attempt to establish national intercourse upon improved principles—upon principles tending to peace, and the mutual prosperity of nations. In this respect, America, the whole of America, has a new career before her. If we look back on the history of Europe, we see how great a portion of the last two centuries her States have been at war for interests connected mainly with her feudal monarchies; wars for particular dynasties; wars to support or defeat particular successions; wars to enlarge or curtail the dominions of particular crowns; wars to support or dissolve family alliances; wars, in fine, to support or to resist religious intolerance. What long and bloody chapters do these not fill, in the history of European politics! Who does not see, and who does not rejoice to see, that America has a glorious chance of escaping at least these causes of contention? Who does not see, and who does not rejoice to see, that on this continent, under other forms of Government, we have before us the noble hope of being able, by the mere influence of civil liberty and religious toleration, to dry up these outpouring fountains of blood, and to extinguish these consuming fires of war? The general opinion of the age favors such hopes and such prospects. There is a growing disposition to treat the intercourse of nations more like the useful intercourse of friends—philosophy, just views of national advantage, good sense, and the dictates of common religion, and an increasing conviction that war is not the interest of the human race—all concur to increase the interest created by this new accession to the list of nations.

We have heard it said, sir, that the topic of South American independence is worn out, and threadbare. Such it may be, sir, to those who have contemplated it merely as an article of news, like the fluctuation of the markets, or the rise and fall of stocks. Such it may be, to those minds who can see no consequences following from these great events. But, whoever has either understood their present importance, or can at all estimate their future influence—whoever has reflected on the new relations they introduce with other States—whoever, among ourselves especially, has meditated on the new relations which we now bear to them, and the striking attitude in which we ourselves are now placed, as the oldest of the American nations, will feel that the topic can never be without interest; and will be sensible that, whether we are wise enough to perceive it or not, the establishment of South American independence will affect all nations, and ourselves, perhaps, more than any other, through all coming time.

But, sir, although the independence of these new States seems effectually accomplished, yet a lingering and hopeless war is kept up against them by Spain. This is greatly to be regretted by all nations. To Spain it is, as every reasonable man sees, useless, and without hope. To the new States themselves, it is burdensome and afflictive. To the commerce of neutral nations, it is annoying and vexatious. There seems to be something of the pertinacity of the Spanish character in holding on in such a desperate course. It reminds us of the seventy years during which Spain resisted the independence of Holland. I think, however, that there is some reason to believe that the war approaches to its end. I believe that the measures adopted by our own Government have had an effect in tending to produce that result. I understand, at least, that the question of recognition has been taken into consideration by the Spanish Government; and it may be hoped that a war, which Spain finds to be so expensive, which the whole world tells her is so hopeless, and which, if continued, now threatens her with new dangers, she may, ere long, have the prudence to terminate.

Our own course, during this contest between Spain and her colonies, is well known. Though entirely and strictly neutral, we were in favor of early recognition. Our opinions were well known to the Allied Sovereigns when in Congress at Aix-la-Chapelle, in 1818, at which time the affairs of Spain and her colonies were under consideration; and, probably, the knowledge of those sentiments, together with the policy adopted by England, prevented any interference by other powers at that time. Yet we have treated Spain with scrupulous delicacy. We acted on the case as one of civil war. We treated with the new Governments as Governments de facto. Not questioning the right of Spain to coerce them back to their old obedience, if she had the power, we yet held it to be our right to deal with them as with existing Governments in fact, when the moment arrived at which it became apparent and manifest that the dominion of Spain over these her ancient colonies, was at an end. Our right, our interest, and our duty, all concurred at that moment to recommend recognition—and we did recognize.

If, it is asked, we send Ministers to a Congress, composed altogether of belligerents, is it not a breach of neutrality? Certainly not: no man can say it is. Suppose, sir, that these Ministers from the new States, instead of Panama, were to assemble at Bogota, where we already have a Minister; their councils, at that place, might be belligerent, while the war should last with Spain. But should we, on that account, recall our Minister from Bogota? The whole argument rests on this; that because, at the same time and place, the agents of the South American Governments may negotiate about their own relations with each other, in regard to their common war against Spain, therefore we cannot, at the same time and place, negotiate with them, or any of them, upon our own neutral and commercial relations. This proposition, sir, cannot be maintained; and, therefore, all the inferences from it fail.

But, sir, I see no proof that, as between themselves, the Representatives of the South American States are to possess other than diplomatic powers. I refer to the treaties, which are essentially alike, and which have been often read.

With two exceptions, which I will notice, the articles of these treaties, describing the powers of the Congress, are substantially like those in the treaty of Paris, in 1814, providing for the Congress of Vienna. It was there stipulated that all the powers should send Plenipotentiaries to Vienna, to regulate, in general Congress, the arrangements to complete the provisions of the present treaty. Now, it might have been here asked, how regulate? How regulate in general Congress?—regulate by votes? Sir, nobody asked such questions; simply because it was to be a Congress of Plenipotentiaries. The two exceptions which I have mentioned, are, that this Congress is to act as a Council, and to interpret treaties; but there is nothing, in either of these, to be done, which may not be done diplomatically. What is more common than diplomatic intercourse to explain and to interpret treaties? Or what more frequent than that nations, having a common object, interchange mutual counsels and advice, through the medium of their respective Ministers? To bring this matter, sir, to the test, let me ask, when these Ministers assemble at Panama, can they do any thing but according to their instructions? Have they any organization, any power of action, or any rule of action, common to them all? No more, sir, than the respective Ministers at the Congress of Vienna. Every thing is settled by the use of the word Plenipotentiary. That proves the meeting to be diplomatic, and nothing else. Who ever heard of a Plenipotentiary member of the Legislature?—a Plenipotentiary Burgess of a city?—or a Plenipotentiary knight of the shire!

We may dismiss all fears, sir, arising from the nature of this meeting. Our agents will go there, if they go at all, in the character of Ministers, protected by the public law, negotiating only for ourselves, and not called on to violate any neutral duty of their own Government. If it be so, that this meeting has other powers, in consequence of other arrangements between other States—of which I see no proof—still we are not party to these arrangements, nor can be, in any way, affected by them. As far as this Government is concerned, nothing can be done, but by negotiation, as in other cases.

I must now ask the indulgence of the committee to an important point in the discussion—I mean the declaration of the President in 1823. Not only as a member of the House, but as a citizen of the country, I have an anxious desire that this part of our public history should stand in its proper light. Sir, in my judgment, the country has a very high honor, connected with that occurrence, which we may maintain, or which we may sacrifice. I look upon it as a part of its treasures of reputation; and, for one, I intend to guard it.

Sir, let us recur to the important political events which led to that declaration, or accompanied it. In the fall of 1822, the allied sovereigns held their Congress at Verona. The great subject of consideration was the condition of Spain, that country then being under the government of the Cortes. The question was, whether Ferdinand should be reinstated in all his authority, by the intervention of foreign force. Russia, Prussia, France, and Austria, were inclined to that measure; England dissented and protested; but the course was agreed on, and France, with the consent of these other continental powers, took the conduct of the operation into her own hands. In the spring of 1823, a French army was sent into Spain. Its success was complete. The popular Government was overthrown, and Ferdinand re-established in all his power. This invasion, sir, was determined on, and undertaken, precisely on the doctrines which the allied monarchs had proclaimed the year before at Laybach; and that is, that they had a right to interfere in the concerns of another State, and reform its Government, in order to prevent the effects of its bad example: this bad example, be it remembered, always being the example of free Government. Now, sir, acting on this principle of supposed dangerous example, and having put down the example of the Cortes in Spain, it was natural to inquire with what eyes they would look on the colonies of Spain, that were following still worse examples. Would King Ferdinand and his allies be content with what had been done in Spain itself, or would he solicit their aid, and was it likely they would grant it, to subdue his rebellious American provinces?

Sir, it was in this posture of affairs, on an occasion which has already been alluded to, that I ventured to say, early in the session of December, 1823, that these allied monarchs might probably turn their attention to America: that America came within their avowed doctrine, and that her example might very possibly attract their notice. The doctrines of Laybach were not limited to any continent; Spain had colonies in America, and, having reformed Spain herself, to the true standard, it was not impossible that they might see fit to complete the work, by reconciling, in their way, the colonies to the mother country. Now, sir, it did so happen, that, as soon as the Spanish king was completely re-established, he did invite the co-operation of his allies in regard to South America. In the same month of December, 1823, a formal invitation was addressed, by Spain, to the courts of St. Petersburg, Vienna, Berlin, and Paris, proposing to establish a conference at Paris, in order that the Plenipotentiaries, there assembled, might aid Spain in adjusting the affairs of her revolted provinces. These affairs were proposed to be adjusted in such manner as should retain the sovereignty of Spain over them; and, though the co-operation of the allies, by force of arms, was not directly solicited, such was evidently the object aimed at.

The King of Spain, in making this request to the members of the Holy Alliance, argued as it has been seen he might argue. He quoted their own doctrines of Laybach, and he pointed out the pernicious example of America; and he reminded them that their success in Spain itself, had paved the way for successful operations against the spirit of liberty on this side the Atlantic.

The proposed meeting, however, did not take place. England had already taken a decided course: for, as early as October, Mr. Canning, in a conference with the French Minister in London, informed him, distinctly and expressly, that England would consider any foreign interference, by force or menace, in the dispute between Spain and the colonies, as a motive for recognizing the latter without delay.

It is probable this determination of the English Government was known here at the commencement of the session of Congress; and it was under these circumstances, it was in this crisis, that Mr. Monroe's declaration was made. It was not then ascertained whether a meeting of the allies would, or would not, take place, to concert with Spain the means of re-establishing her power; but it was plain enough they would be pressed by Spain to aid her operations; and it was plain enough, also, that they had no particular liking to what was taking place on this side the Atlantic, nor any great disinclination to interfere. This was the posture of affairs; and, sir, I concur entirely in the sentiment expressed in the resolution of a gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. MARKLEY,) that this declaration of Mr. Monroe was wise, seasonable, and patriotic.

It has been said, in the course of this debate, to have been a loose and vague declaration. It was, I believe, sufficiently studied. I have understood, from good authority, that it was considered, weighed, and distinctly and decidedly approved, by every one of the President's advisers, at that time. Our Government could not adopt, on that occasion, precisely the course which England had taken. England threatened the immediate recognition of the provinces, if the allies should take part with Spain against them. We had already recognized them. It remained, therefore, only for our Government to say, how we should consider a combination of the allied powers to affect objects in America, as affecting ourselves; and the Message was intended to say, what it does say, that we should regard such combination as dangerous to us. Sir, I agree with those who maintain the proposition, and I contend against those who deny it, that the Message did mean something; that it meant much; and I maintain, against both, that the declaration effected much good, answered the end designed by it, did great honor to the foresight and the spirit of the Government, and that it cannot now be taken back, retracted, or annulled, without disgrace. It met, sir, with the entire concurrence, and the hearty approbation of the country. The tone which it uttered found a corresponding response in the breasts of the free people of the United States. That people saw, and they rejoiced to see, that, on a fit occasion, our weight had been thrown into the right scale, and that, without departing from our duty, we had done something useful, and something effectual, for the cause of civil liberty. One general glow of exultation—one universal feeling of the gratified love of liberty—one conscious and proud perception of the consideration which the country possessed of the respect and honor which belonged to it—pervaded all bosoms. Possibly the public enthusiasm went too far: it certainly did go far.

But, sir, the sentiment which this declaration inspired was not confined to ourselves. Its force was felt everywhere, by all those who could understand its object and foresee its effect. In that very House of Commons, of which the gentleman from South Carolina has spoken with such commendation, how was it there received? Not only, sir, with approbation, but, I may say, with no little enthusiasm. While the leading Minister expressed his entire concurrence in the sentiments and opinions of the American President, his distinguished competitor in that popular body, less restrained by official decorum, more at liberty to give utterance to the feelings of the occasion, declared, that no event had ever created greater joy, exultation, and gratitude, among all the freemen in Europe; that he felt pride in being connected, by blood and language, with the people of the United States; that the policy disclosed by the Message became a great, a free, and an independent nation; and that he hoped his own country would be prevented by no mean pride, or paltry jealousy, from following so noble and glorious an example.

It is, doubtless, true, as I took occasion to observe the other day, that this declaration must be considered as founded on our rights, and to spring mainly from a regard to their preservation. It did not commit us, at all events, to take up arms, on any indication of hostile feeling by the powers of Europe towards South America. If, for example, all the States of Europe had refused to trade with South America, until her States should return to their former allegiance, that would have furnished no cause of interference to us. Or, if an armament had been furnished by the allies to act against provinces the most remote from us, as Chili or Buenos Ayres, the distance of the scene of action diminishing our apprehension of danger, and diminishing, also, our means of effectual interposition, might still have left us to content ourselves with remonstrance. But a very different case would have arisen, if an army, equipped and maintained by these powers, had been landed on the shores of the Gulf of Mexico, and commenced the war in our own immediate neighborhood. Such an event might justly be regarded as dangerous to ourselves, and, on that ground, to have called for decided and immediate interference by us. The sentiments and the policy announced by the declaration, thus understood, were, therefore, in strict conformity to our duties and our interest.

Sir, I look on the Message of December, 1823, as forming a bright page in our history. I will neither help to erase it, nor tear it out; nor shall it be, by any act of mine, blurred or blotted. It did honor to the sagacity of the Government, and will not diminish that honor. It elevated the hopes, and gratified the patriotism of the people. Over these hopes I will not bring a mildew; nor will I put that gratified patriotism to shame.

But how should it happen, sir, that there should now be such a new-born fear, on the subject of this declaration? The crisis is over; the danger is past. At the time it was made, there was real ground for apprehension: now, there is none. It was then possible, perhaps not improbable, that the allied powers might interfere with America. There is now no ground for any such fear. Most of the gentlemen who have now spoken on this subject, were at that time here. They all heard the declaration. Not one of them complained. And yet, now, when all danger is over, we are vehemently warned against the sentiments of the declaration.

I now proceed, Mr. Chairman, to a few remarks on the subject of Cuba—the most important part of our foreign relations. It is the hinge on which interesting events may possibly turn. I pray gentlemen to review their opinions on this subject, before they fully commit themselves. I understood the honorable member from South Carolina to say, that, if Spain chose to transfer this island to any power in Europe, she had a right to do so, and we could not interfere to prevent it. Sir, this is a delicate subject. I hardly feel competent to treat it as it deserves; and I am not quite willing to state here all that I think about it. I must, however, dissent from the opinion of the gentleman from South Carolina. The rights of nations, on subjects of this kind, are necessarily very much modified by circumstances. Because England or France could not rightfully complain of the transfer of Florida to us, it by no means follows, as the gentleman supposes, that we could not complain of the cession of Cuba to one of them. The plain difference is, that the transfer of Florida to us was not dangerous to the safety of either of those nations, nor fatal to any of their great and essential interests. Proximity of position, neighborhood, whatever augments the power of injuring and annoying, very properly belong to the consideration of all cases of this kind. The greater or less facility of access itself is of consideration in such questions, because it brings, or may bring, weighty consequences with it. It justifies, for these reasons, and on these grounds, what otherwise might never be thought of. By negotiation with a foreign power, Mr. Jefferson obtained a province. Without any alteration of our constitution, we have made it part of the United States, and its Senators and Representatives, now coming from several States, are here among us. Now, sir, if, instead of being Louisiana, this had been one of the provinces of Spain proper, or one of her South American colonies, he must have been a madman that should have proposed such an acquisition. A high conviction of its convenience, arising from proximity, and from close natural connection, alone reconciled the country to the measure. Considerations of the same sort have weight in other cases.

An honorable member from Kentucky (Mr. WICKLIFFE) argues, that, although we might rightfully prevent another power from taking Cuba from Spain, by force, yet, if Spain should choose to make the voluntary transfer, we should have no right whatever to interfere.

April, 1826.

Mission to Panama.

[H. or R.]

Sir, this is a distinction without a difference. If we are likely to have contention about Cuba, let us first well consider what our rights are, and not commit ourselves. And, sir, if we have any right to interfere at all, it applies as well to the case of a peaceable, as to that of a forcible transfer. If nations be at war, we are not judges of the question of right, in that war; we must acknowledge, in both parties, the mutual right of attack, and the mutual right of conquest. It is not for us to set bounds to their belligerent operations, so long as they do not affect ourselves. Our right to interfere, sir, in any such case, is but the exercise of the right of reasonable and necessary self-defence. It is a high and delicate exercise of that right; one not to be made but on grounds of strong and manifest reason, justice, and necessity. The real question is, whether the possession of Cuba, by a great maritime power of Europe, would seriously endanger our own immediate security, or our essential interests. I put the question, sir, in the language of some of the best considered State papers of modern times. The general rule of national law is, unquestionably, against interference in the transactions of other States. There are, however, acknowledged exceptions, growing out of circumstances, and founded in those circumstances. These exceptions, it has been properly said, cannot, without danger, be reduced to previous rule, and incorporated into the ordinary diplomacy of nations. Nevertheless, they do exist, and must be judged of when they arise, with a just regard to our own essential interests, but in a spirit of strict justice and delicacy also towards foreign States.

The ground of these exceptions is, as I have already stated, self-preservation. It is not a slight injury to our interest; it is not even a great inconvenience, that makes out a case. There must be danger to our security, or danger, manifest and imminent danger, to our essential rights, and essential interests. Now, sir, let us look at Cuba. I need hardly refer to its present amount of commercial connection with the United States. Our statistical tables, I presume, would show us that our commerce with the Havana alone is more in amount than our whole commercial intercourse with France and all her dependencies. But this is but one part of the case—not the most important. Cuba, as is well said in the report of the Committee of Foreign Affairs, is placed in the mouth of the Mississippi. Its occupation by a strong maritime power would be felt, in the first moment of hostility, as far up the Mississippi and the Missouri, as our population extends. It is the commanding point of the Gulf of Mexico. See, too, how it lies in the very line of our coastwise traffic; interposed in the very highway between New York and New Orleans. Now, sir, who has estimated, or who can estimate, the effect of a change which should place this island in other hands, subject it to new rules of commercial intercourse, or connect it with objects of a different and still more dangerous nature? Sir, I repeat that I feel no disposition to pursue this topic, on the present occasion. My purpose is only to show its importance, and to beg gentlemen not to prejudice any rights of the country, by assenting to propositions which, perhaps, may be necessary to be reviewed.

And here I differ again with the gentleman from Kentucky. He thinks that, in this, as in other cases, we should wait till the event comes, without any previous declarations of our sentiments upon subjects important to our own rights or interests. Sir, such declarations are often the appropriate means of preventing that which, if unprevented, it might be difficult to redress. A great object in holding diplomatic intercourse, is frankly to expose the views and objects of nations, and to prevent, by candid explanation, collision and war. In this case, the Government has said that we could not assent to the transfer of Cuba to another European State. Can we so assent? Do gentlemen think we can? If not, then it was entirely proper that this intimation should be frankly and seasonably made. Candor required it; and it would have been unpardonable, it would have been injustice, as well as folly, to have been silent, while we might suppose the transaction to be contemplated, and then to complain of it afterwards. If we should have a subsequent right to complain, we have a previous right, equally clear, of protesting; and if the evil be one which, when it comes, would allow us to apply a remedy, it not only allows us, but it makes it our duty, also, to apply prevention.

But, sir, while some gentlemen have maintained that, on the subject of a transfer to any of the European powers, the President has said too much; others insist that, on that of the islands being occupied by Mexico or Colombia, he has said and done too little. I presume, sir, for my own part, that the strongest language has been directed to the source of the greatest danger. Heretofore, that danger was, doubtless, greatest, which was apprehended from a voluntary transfer. The other has been met as it arose; and, thus far, adequately and sufficiently met. And here, sir, I cannot but say, that I never knew a more extraordinary argument than we have heard on the conduct of the Executive on this part of the case. The President is charged with inconsistency, and, in order to make this out, public despatches are read, which, it is said, militate with one another.

Sir, what are the facts? The Government saw fit to invite the Emperor of Russia to use his endeavors to bring Spain to treat of peace with her revolted colonies. Russia was addressed on this occasion as the friend of Spain; and, of course, every argument which was thought might have influence, or ought to have influence, either on Russia or Spain, was suggested in the correspondence. Among other things, the probable loss to Spain of Cuba and Porto Rico, was urged; and the question was asked, how it was or could be expected by Spain, that the United States could interfere to prevent Mexico and Colombia from taking those islands from her, since she was their enemy, in a public war, and since she pertinaciously, and unreasonably, as we think, insists on maintaining the war; and since these islands offered an obvious object of attack? Was not this, sir, a very proper argument to be urged to Spain? A copy of this despatch, it seems, was sent to the Senate, in confidence. It has not been published by the Executive. Now, the alleged inconsistency is, that, notwithstanding this letter, the President has interfered to dissuade Mexico and Colombia from attacking Cuba. That, finding or thinking that those States meditated such a purpose, this Government has urged them to desist from it. Sir, was ever any thing more unreasonable than this charge? Was it not proper, that, to produce the desired result of peace, our Government should address different motives to the different parties in the war? Was it not its business to set before each party its dangers and its difficulties in pursuing the war? And if, now, by any thing unexpected, these respective correspondences have become public, are these different views, addressed thus to different parties, and with different objects, to be relied on as proof of inconsistency? It is the strangest accusation ever heard of. No Government, not wholly destitute of common sense, would have acted otherwise. We urged the proper motives to both parties. To Spain we urged the probable loss of Cuba; we showed her the danger of its capture by the new States, and we asked her to inform us on what ground it was that we could interfere to prevent such capture, since she was at war with these States, and they had an unquestionable right to attack her in any of her territories; and especially she was asked how she could expect good offices from us, on this occasion, since she fully understood our opinion to be, that she was persisting in the war without or beyond all reason, and with a sort of desperation. This was the appeal made to the good sense of Spain, through Russia. But, soon afterwards, having reason to suspect that Colombia and Mexico were actually preparing to attack Cuba, and knowing that such an event would most seriously affect us, our Government remonstrated against such meditated attack, and to the present time, it has not been made. In all this, who sees any thing either improper or inconsistent? For myself, I think the course pursued showed a watchful regard to our own interest, and is wholly free from any imputation, either of impropriety or inconsistency.

Pains, sir, have been taken by the honorable member from Virginia, (Mr. Rives,) to prove that the measure now in contemplation, and, indeed, the whole policy of the Government respecting South America, is the unhappy result of the influence of a gentleman formerly filling the chair of this House. To make out this, he has referred to certain speeches of that gentleman delivered here. He charges him with having become himself affected, at an early day, with what he is pleased to call the South American fever; and with having infused its baneful influence into the whole councils of the country.

If, sir, it be true, that that gentleman, prompted by an ardent love of civil liberty, felt, earlier than others, a proper sympathy for the struggling colonies of South America; or that, acting on the maxim that revolutions do not go backward, he had the sagacity to foresee, earlier than others, the successful termination of those struggles; if, thus feeling, and thus perceiving, it fell to him to lead the willing or unwilling councils of his country, in her manifestations of kindness to the new Governments, and in her seasonable recognitions of their independence; if it be this, which the honorable member imputes to him; if it be by this course of public conduct that he has identified his name with the cause of South American liberty—he ought to be esteemed one of the most fortunate men of the age. If all this be, as is now represented, he has acquired fame enough. It is enough for any man, thus to have connected himself with the greatest events of the age in which he lives, and to have been foremost in measures which reflect high honor on his country, in the judgment of mankind. Sir, it is always with great reluctance that I am drawn to speak, in my place here, of individuals; but I could not forbear what I have now said, when I hear, in the House of Representatives, and in this land of free spirits, that it is made matter of imputation and of reproach to have been first to reach forth the hand of welcome and of succor to new-born nations, struggling to obtain, and to enjoy, the blessings of liberty.

We are told that the country is deluded and deceived by cabalistic words. Cabalistic words! If we express an emotion of pleasure at the results of this great action of the spirit of political liberty; if we rejoice at the birth of new Republican nations, and express our joy by the common terms of regard and sympathy; if we feel and signify high gratification that, throughout this whole continent, men are now likely to be blessed by free and popular institutions; and if, in the uttering of these sentiments, we happen to speak of sister Republics, of the great American family of nations, or of the political systems and forms of Government of this hemisphere; then, indeed, it seems, we deal in senseless jargon, or impose on the judgment and feeling of the community by cabalistic words! Sir, what is meant by this? Is it intended that the people of the United States ought to be totally indifferent to the fortunes of these new neighbors? Is no change, in the lights in which we are to view them, to be wrought, by their having thrown off foreign dominion, established independence, and instituted, on our very borders, Republican Governments, essentially after our own example?

Mission to Panama.

[H. OF R.]

Sir, I do not wish to overrate—I do not overrate—the progress of these new States in the great work of establishing a well-secured popular liberty. I know that to be a great attainment, and I know they are but pupils in the school. But, thank God, they are in the school. They are called to meet difficulties, such as neither we nor our fathers encountered. For these, we ought to make large allowances. What have we ever known like the colonial vassalage of these States? When did we, or our ancestors, feel, like them, the weight of a political despotism that presses men to the earth, or of that religious intolerance which would shut up heaven to all but the bigoted? Sir, we sprung from another stock. We belong to another race. We have known nothing—we have felt nothing—of the political despotism of Spain, nor of the heat of her fires of intolerance. No rational man expects that the South can run the same rapid career as the North; or that an insurgent province of Spain is in the same condition as the English colonies when they first asserted their independence. There is, doubtless, much more to be done, in the first than in the last case. But, on that account, the honor of the attempt is not less; and if all difficulties shall be in time surmounted, it will be greater. The work may be more arduous—it is not less noble, because there may be more of ignorance to enlighten, more of bigotry to subdue, more of prejudice to eradicate. If it be a weakness to feel a strong interest in the success of these great revolutions, I confess myself guilty of that weakness. If it be weak to feel that I am an American, to think that recent events have not only opened new modes of intercourse, but have created also new grounds of regard and sympathy between ourselves and our neighbors; if it be weak to feel that the South, in her present state, is somewhat more emphatically part of America than when she lay obscure, oppressed, and unknown, under the grinding bondage of a foreign power; if it be weak to rejoice, when, even in any corner of the earth, human beings are able to get up from beneath oppression, to erect themselves, and to enjoy the proper happiness of their intelligent nature; if this be weak, it is a weakness from which I claim no exemption.

A day of solemn retribution now visits the once proud monarchy of Spain. The prediction is fulfilled. The spirit of Montezuma and of the Incas might now well say,

"Art thou, too, fallen, Iberia? Do we see
The robber and the murderer weak as we?
Thou, that has wasted earth, and dared despise Alike the wrath and mercy of the skies,
Thy pomp is in the grave; thy glory laid Low in the pit thine avarice has made."

Mr. Chairman, I will detain you only with one more reflection on this subject. We cannot be so blind, we cannot so shut up our senses and smother our faculties, as not to see that, in the progress and the establishment of South American liberty, our own example has been among the most stimulating causes. That great light—a light which can never be hid—the light of our own glorious revolution, has shone on the path of the South American patriots, from the beginning of their course. In their emergencies, they have looked to our experience. In their political institutions, they have followed our models. In their deliberations, they have invoked the presiding spirit of our own liberty. They have looked steadily, in every adversity, to the GREAT NORTHERN LIGHT. In the hour of bloody conflict, they have remembered the fields which have been consecrated by the blood of our own fathers; and when they have fallen, they have wished only to be remembered with them, as men who had acted their parts bravely, for the cause of liberty in the Western World.

Sir, I have done. If it be weakness to feel the sympathy of one's nature excited for such men, in such a cause, I am guilty of that weakness. If it be prudence to meet their proffered civility, not with reciprocal kindness, but with coldness or with insult, I choose still to follow where natural impulse leads, and to give up that false and mistaken prudence, for the voluntary sentiments of my heart.

The committee then rose, and the House adjourned.

SATURDAY, April 15.

Mission to Panama.

The House having again resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Foreign Relations, approving the mission to Panama, with the amendments proposing a qualification to the general expression of approbation thereof—

Mr. CARTER took the floor, and spoke as follows:

Mr. Chairman: The subject at present before the committee is entitled, as well from its great importance as from its entire novelty, to the most deliberate and candid consideration. From the fullest reflection which I have been able to bestow upon it, aided by the documents which are before us, I have come to the conclusion that the resolution reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations is one which is at variance with the best interests of this country, and involves in it a departure from that neutral policy which has hitherto governed our public councils. If this be true, which I shall attempt presently to show, this committee ought, certainly, to withhold its sanction from such a measure.

To the Executive has the constitution confided the sole and exclusive superintendence of our foreign peaceful relations. I say peaceful, because the power of declaring war being vested in both branches of the Legislature, Congress may be said to divide the responsibility of the Executive, when the country is to assume a hostile attitude with regard to any foreign power. But so far as the consequences of this mission can at present be foreseen and contemplated, it would be assuming too much to say, that war is to be immediately and necessarily the result; that this House, in consequence of its general agency in declaring war, would have a right to interfere with the constitutional functions of the President, and say, that the negotiations or deliberations at Panama should be limited to such topics, or restricted on all topics, to be discussed there, in such manner that the peace of the country should, in no possible event, be endangered. The House of Representatives ought not to place itself in the attitude of giving counsel to the President, or instructions to any public functionary, either at home or abroad, without the power of enforcing them. Self-respect ought to restrain this House from registering any remonstrance, or other declaration, which is to prove inoperative. If any object, valuable to the safety or interests of the country, the acquisition of which the President promised himself, at the Congress of Panama, should, by reason of his recognizing the force of the limitation proposed by this amendment, be put beyond his reach, he would not only be at liberty to disregard it, but he would be bound, by the double allegiance which he owed to the constitution and to the country, to do so. If the mission, therefore, be sanctioned by the House of Representatives, the control of our agents there must be left entirely to the Executive.

There prevails a great diversity of opinion as to the objects of this Congress. The treaty stipulations which have been made between Colombia and four of her sister Republics, confine its objects to a few topics of primary interest, exclusively affecting the South American States who were formerly subject to the Spanish yoke. The three Spanish American Ministers who have invited the United States to send a deputy there, extend their views to other objects, not embraced in those stipulations; and the President indulges himself in still greater latitude, as to the objects of the Congress, and declares, that the purposes of the meeting being "somewhat indefinite, so far from being an objection to it, is among the cogent reasons for its adoption."

An honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. BUCHANAN,) who addressed the committee a few days ago, seemed to think this Congress had placed the United States in an exceedingly embarrassing dilemma. They were to be committed if they went into it, and if they stood out, they were to subject themselves to inconveniences hardly less deplorable than an absolute surrender of our neutral character. And thus, apprehensive of mischief, from taking either side of the dilemma, he has converted his perplexity into a sufficient cause for the United States to send deputies there, for the purpose of inducing the South American Ministers to dissolve their meeting, and return to their homes, without accomplishing the objects which brought them together. Can the gentleman be serious in his opinion? Does he call to mind the length of time and the concert with which the South American Republics have deliberated on this project? Worthy as Messrs. Anderson and Sergeant no doubt are, of the confidence of the Executive, it is ascribing rather too much to their persuasive powers, to imagine that they could, so readily, by exerting them, induce these Republics thus to relinquish and forego all the benefits they had promised themselves from so long-cherished a design.

It has been said, too, that the mere act of sending representatives to this Congress, cannot commit the neutrality of this country. This affirmation is founded on the assumption that either the Congress is not belligerent in its character; or that, if it be so, the United States are not, in their representation there, to be so far identified with it, as to assume a belligerent aspect. Now, sir, what is the condition of these South American States? Are they not engaged in open war against Spain? And do not the treaties which have been laid on our tables point out the organization of means of resisting any attempt, on the part of Spain, or any power in alliance with her, to bring them back to their former condition of dependence, as the principal object to be accomplished by this meeting? In truth, the meeting has no other object but to consider of the most advisable means for rendering their confederacy firmly cemented, and permanent in its duration. And if Spain, with whom we are now on terms of friendship, should take offence at the attitude we should assume at Panama, it would not be competent for us to say to her, in vindication of our conduct, that we took no part in any deliberations which imported hostility to her. It could not be in the mouths of our deputies, to reply to any remonstrance against their presence in this Congress, to say that they belonged to the peace side of the assembly. If the character of the Congress is to be ascertained by the character of the topics they are to discuss, and those topics are partly peaceful and partly belligerent, the aggregate character must be determined by the predominance of the objects which shall engage their attention. And in point of importance to the States themselves, it is unquestionable that the preparation of their just means of resistance to any attempt which may be made against their independence, constitutes the main and most interesting subject for their consultation. Every thing relating to this leading object of their meeting, will import direct hostility to Spain; and, therefore, impress a belligerent character on the Congress.

APRIL, 1826.]

Mission to Panama.

[H. OF R.]

It has been said by another gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. WURRA,) that now, since the South American States have virtually achieved their independence, and wielded their arms successfully against their oppressor, that they will be in danger of turning them against each other, and wasting their energies in intestine wars; that it is the invariable law of all Confederacies, to be held together by a sense of common danger without, and that, as soon as this exterior pressure is removed, the separate members become victims to exhausting dissension among themselves: the United States may, therefore, be of incalculable advantage to these new Republics, by giving them timely admonition against this evil, and turning their resources in a different direction. The gentleman has greatly mistaken the office of our deputies there, if he imagines that on subjects like these, they would be prepared to impart any valuable lessons. Before the new States could be successfully warned against these fatal tendencies, their advisers must be intimately acquainted with their character. They must understand their habits; the state of general intelligence among them; the progress they have already made in the various departments of science and the arts; and a great variety of other requisites, before they could give any valuable advice as to the exact form of Government they ought to adopt. For it could only be by directing their minds to the proper forms of Government by which their resources could be developed, and their happiness secured, that the internal dissensions, to which the gentleman has alluded, could be prevented.

The President declares, in the opening of his Message, that "the first and greatest inducement" which operated upon him for accepting this invitation, was, to meet, in a spirit of kindness and friendship, an overture made in the same spirit by three sister republics. From this amiable and laudable feeling of the Executive, no one can dissent. But, sir, how will you be surprised to hear him, almost in the next breath, declare, that objects of the highest importance, not only to the future welfare of the whole human race, but bearing directly upon the special interests of this Union, will engage the deliberations of the Congress of Panama, whether we are represented there or not! Can objects like these be postponed to mere courtesy and etiquette? Can such a sacrifice of the substance to the shadow be seriously defended?

Congresses of independent powers, meeting in times of profound peace, to concert political measures, have lately come into fashion. We have heard of councils of bishops, and other ecclesiastical magistrates, meeting in former times to regulate the concerns of the church. And so intimately blended, in those days, were the affairs of church and state, that those reverend fathers extended their guardian care, in some instances, to political concerns. In later times, we have beheld the powers of Europe, after having drenched the continent with blood, and wearied themselves in the work of devastation, meeting for the purpose of a general pacification, and restoring quiet to the world. Sometimes, at such meetings, they have stipulated arrangements for the preservation of the balance of power on the continent. But it was not until our day that kings and emperors found themselves under the necessity of confederating together, and opposing their united counsels to the progress of free principles and systems of self-government. The disastrous light which the French Revolution shed upon the fetters which bound the people, while it inspired them with the hopes of release, struck a panic into their masters,

"With fear of change perplexing monarchs."

They saw, with alarm and consternation, the instability of their thrones. They looked around upon each other, in this crisis, for the means of defending themselves against a danger which threatened them all alike. And in this absolute and uncompromising necessity, which threatened the extinction of thrones and crowns, we are to look for the origin of the late political Congresses of Europe. And are we under any necessity of imitating their example? Are not our institutions a sufficient guarantee for the devotion of the people to them, and that they will stand by them in every emergency, and pour out their blood in their defence?

The structure of our Government forbids the imitation of such an example. The powers of Europe, who were represented at the Congresses of Vienna, Troppau, and Laybach, had no Senates to consult, for the ratification of any treaty into which they might enter. No popular assemblies, who were the exact mirrors of a people, peaceful in their habits, peaceful in their policy, and peaceful in every thing which entered into the formation of their character, interposed themselves to the execution of any scheme, either for the security or the aggrandizement of the crown. Their will was the law of their dominions. They had unbounded control over the finances and military forces within their territories. They were, therefore, enabled strictly and promptly to perform whatever engagements they took upon themselves. Congresses, of the description of that proposed to be held at Panama, are, therefore, suitable and convenient engines in the hands of Governments strictly monarchical in their formation. They furnish facilities for the execution of great designs, in which the parties to them have a common interest.

But, sir, we have Ministers residing already at most of the courts whose Governments are to be represented at Panama. They can accomplish, in the ordinary way of separate negotiation, all the objects which are important to the United States. It is in vain to speculate upon the "harmonious and systematic" manner in which objects could be attained, when all the Republics of this continent were represented, each having its own separate and contrariant interests to reconcile and preserve. Indeed, sir, the very fact that so many and such opposite interests shall be pressing upon the members of this Congress, and demanding their share in the deliberations of the Representatives of eight or ten distinct, independent powers, so far from promising a successful result, seems to me to present such embarrassment and difficulty as would forever defeat such a result. Some gentlemen, who have spoken in this debate, seem to imagine, that there were no other means by which the United States could enter into any commercial arrangements, or any other stipulations of a mutually beneficial sort to the Governments concerned, except by our Representation at Panama; that this Congress furnished an opportunity, tempting as it was fleeting, to obtain all the advantages which we could desire in our future intercourse with the South American States; and that the refusal of this country to send Representatives there, would be an act bordering upon infatuation! Such gentlemen suffer the ardor of their feelings to disturb the correct decision of their judgment of the character of this Congress, and of the attitude occupied at this time, by this country, in relation to these southern Republics. We have already entered into friendly and commercial treaties with many of them, and the door is still open to the formation of others on the same terms.

W^r. WEXMS addressed the committee as follows:

Mr. Chairman: The President, in his Message to the Senate, has stated, that "the Governments of the Republics of Colombia, of Mexico, and of Central America, had, severally, invited the Government of the United States to be represented at the Congress of American nations, to be assembled at Panama, to deliberate upon subjects of peculiar concernment to this hemisphere, and that this invitation had been accepted." And goes on to state, that, "Although this measure was deemed to be within the constitutional competency of the Executive, I have not thought proper to take any step in it, before ascertaining that my opinion of its expediency will concur with that of both branches of the Legislature; first, by the decision of the Senate upon the nominations to be laid before them; and, secondly, by the sanction of both Houses to the appropriations, without which it cannot be carried into effect." I will pause, here, sir, for a moment, to ask gentlemen, who appear such warm supporters of Executive recommendations as to justify, in their opinion, the charge (I will not say charitably, but illiberally) extended to those who are sufficiently independent to think for themselves, of being a factious opposition to the Administration—what, Mr. Chairman, I will ask, was the Chief Magistrate's inducement thus to have expressed himself? I will undertake to answer the question, sincerely and honestly, as I believe in my conscience. Knowing, as Mr. Adams does, and no man knows better, the powerful effect of usage, that, in many cases, it amounts to law, he conceived it to be his duty (I mean to himself, sir,) to remind the Representatives of the people that we still possess the power (uninterrupted usage, if you please, to the contrary, notwithstanding,) of granting or not the appropriation called for; and feeling, certainly, as he must, the very great doubts that do exist as to the advantages contemplated to result from this, to say the most you can for it, doubtful project, he unquestionably intended it, as has been very properly advanced by the honorable mover of the resolution now under debate, to draw from this House a fair and candid expression of their opinion; and I verily believe, sir, the President will feel himself greatly relieved, hereafter, by the passage of these resolutions; which opinion would induce me, feeling not otherwise than friendly disposed to the Administration, if I had no other reason, to vote for the amendments. I would ask another question, sir: What, short of discomfiture to the President's feelings, if not disgrace to the country, will be the issue, if, on the arrival of the Representatives to this Congress at Panama, from these United States, instructed, as the opponents to the amendments profess to believe the President now stands pledged to the nation they shall be, the Representatives from the South American States shall reject them, upon the ground that the Ministers have not come there with such expressed instructions in their credentials, as had been previously represented as indispensably necessary, by all three of the South American States? Mr. Obregon, in his letter to Mr. Clay, dated at Washington, on the 8d of November, 1825, states, (what the other Ministers all state.) "The underwritten Minister Plenipotentiary has the honor of informing the honorable Secretary of State, that he has communicated to his Government the conversations which occurred between them on his making known to him the determination of the Governments of Colombia and Mexico to form a Congress of Representatives from the new States of the continent, who, to that end, had been invited, in which were to be discussed subjects of general interest to all the American powers, as well as those which might be particularly suggested by the existence and actual position of the new powers, and in the meeting of which it was thought proper, by the Government of the subscriber, that the United States of America, by means of their Commissioners, should constitute and take part, as being so much interested in the first and principal subject upon which the Congress would be engaged. In consequence of which, being informed of the concurrence of this Government, in the idea of discussing the first point in a Congress, as was desired, and that it would send Representatives to it, under condition that the neutrality in which it stood towards Spain should not be violated, and that it should be invited thereto by the Republics of Mexico and Colombia, who should, moreover, signify the affairs with which it was to be occupied, to promote its object, and the necessary uniformity of credentials or authorization of the respective Representatives, the President of the United States of Mexico has charged and commissioned anew the underwritten to make the invitation, and to point out the affairs as stated." Now, sir, what do we find here set forth? Why, that this Mexican Minister, in a conversation with the Secretary of State, last Spring, mentioned the intention of the South American States to hold a Congress at Panama. That is, that Mexico and Colombia had so determined, and had invited the new States to join them, and that his Government thought the United States ought to constitute and take part, on being informed of the concurrence of this Government upon the conditions as recited. Here, Mr. Chairman, we have the whole secret of this warm and very earnest invitation, now contended for as coming from the three South American States, reduced to a mortifying fact that the invitation came from Mr. Clay. We find, in a very few days after this, Mr. Clay informs Mr. Obregon of the concurrence of our Government with the plan, and that we would send Representatives on certain conditions, enjoined, as Mr. Clay states, by the President. The words of Mr. Clay are: "I stated to you, by the directions of the President, that it appeared to him to be necessary, before the assembling of such a Congress, to settle between the different powers to be represented several preliminary points, such as the subjects to which the attention of Congress should be directed, the substance and form of the powers to be given to the respective Representatives, and the mode of organizing the Congress: that, if these points should be satisfactorily arranged, the President would be disposed to accept, in behalf of the United States, the invitation with which you were provisionally charged." Now, sir, here we have the wise and prudent caution that was to have been looked for from Mr. Adams. But, sir, Mr. Adams is a man, liable, like others, to be led away, by degrees, into error and mistake: so, in this business, Mr. Clay and himself had, before this, become violently in love with each other—each, no doubt, loving himself most, and agreeably to an old adage, we not only see that, when friends fall out they become the most bitter enemies, but, in the same ratio, when bitter enemies become friends, they are apt to become equally violent; very warm and fast friends. So much so is it with Mr. Adams and Mr. Clay, that the latter, although created by the former, has, by his strong and powerful eloquence, gained an ascendancy, it would seem, over him. Mr. Chairman, whilst at this point, allow me to give my political creed, although I detest creeds and confessions everywhere; yet, sir, it has become so fashionable here that I must give into it, although by no means a fashionable man. I consent the more readily, however, to do this, as mine is a very short one. When, as a private citizen, I was last constitutionally called on to vote for two electors of President and Vice President, I certainly did not vote for those offering, who had declared in favor of Mr. Adams. I considered it was time we should select our President from the body of the people. I felt unwilling any longer to continue the practice, so long in use, of taking the Secretary of State, lest it would, at last, by usage, become law; and thus a legitimate claim to the Presidency be set up by that officer, who is only a creature of the President, selected by him as Secretary of State, and not by the people—therefore, it was worse than folly to call a President, so made, the President of the people, when the people did not select him; when he was not their choice; but, in reality, the President elect, so soon as appointed by the President his Secretary. When the people have been thus deprived of the right of choosing who they would vote for, I would not, as one of them, give a brass farthing for the trouble of going miles to the polls to vote for the choice of a few dictators of the country. Nay, sir, the President elects his successor now, when he selects his Secretary of State. This has been the case, in fact, ever since the election of Mr. Jefferson. I thought it time to put a stop to it, or for the people at once to be allowed to elect the Secretary of State, with an eye single to his succeeding to the Presidency, after a diplomatic education of eight years—if, indeed, such an education was to be considered indispensable. But, as I did not, by any means, think it was, I preferred lending my aid in abolishing this abhorrent, because uninterrupted usage, of taking the Secretary of State, and no one else. I, therefore, gave my vote to those electors in favor of General Andrew Jackson—a man, if not as much of a diplomatist as Mr. Adams, yet sufficiently so; and, what was much better, we knew him to be friend and patriot, not intending to say that Mr. Adams is not one. Sir, next to the immortal Washington, Jackson has been made, under God, the political saviour of his country. But he was not elected, although he received a much greater number of votes than either of the other candidates. Yet he did not receive the number required by the Constitution. The three highest, therefore, on the list, came here, and the present incumbent, Mr. Adams, was elected by Congress; he, therefore, became constitutionally the President of the United States. As such, I respect him—as such, I hold it my duty, as one of the Representatives of the people, to afford him every assistance in my power, to meet, with honor to himself and advantage to our country, every particle of that high responsibility which he holds and stands bound to redeem. In a word, to act towards him, as I would have him act towards myself, were we to change situations. Consequently, I shall continue to vote, as I have done, for every measure called for, that I do not, in my conscience, believe dangerous or injurious to my country. Further than this, had the man of my choice been elected, I would not go. After this candid, honest confession of my faith, sir, I hope no man here, or elsewhere, will charge me with faction; if he does, I will respond miscreant to the assertion, or to the thought, if I could come at it. I have other duties, also, to attend to, which I must and will be equally honest in the discharge of; and, should any thing that I may say on this floor, now, or at any other time, be felt or received unpleasantly, I would have all remember that I intend not to make a wound unnecessarily any where; but, when it be necessary, for the good of my country, the safety of our rights, or the liberty of the people, I shall not regard the length, the depth, or width, of such a wound.

Mr. Chairman, I will not detain the committee to hear any remarks upon the subject of Cuba or Porto Rico. I will leave that to my honorable friend from Delaware, who, I believe, will place that, like every other part of the subject, in the clearest possible point of view. One general remark, however, I will make, and it is this: that, if our Government does patiently stand by and suffer either of the European powers, or the South American States, to convert Cuba or Porto Rico into another Hayti, without using all the moral and physical force of this country to prevent it, they will deserve to be handed over to that newly-discovered diplomatic jack-catch we not long since heard of—"Heaven's hangman." With these remarks, sir, I shall first vote for the amendment, and, if carried, so as to stand recorded on your journals, I will vote for the appropriation. With my thanks to this honorable committee for that unexpected share of attention they have afforded me, I shall endeavor to feel contented with the faint attempt I have made to discharge my duty—I wish it was in my power to do more.

MONDAY, April 17.

The Senate's amendments to the "bill further to amend the Judicial system of the United States," were, on motion of Mr. WEBSTER, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mission to Panama.

The House having again resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Foreign Relations, approving the Mission to Panama, with the amendments proposing a qualification to the general expression of approbation thereof—

Mr. FORSYTH then rose, and addressed the committee as follows:

Mr. FORSYTH said, the subject before the committee is one of great interest—it is surrounded by illusions, which render it difficult to decide upon it correctly. To dissipate these illusions will be an easy task, which, if successfully performed, will render it impossible that the people should be led into an erroneous judgment.

There are but too many like the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. WARR,) who conceive that this Mission to Panama is intimately connected with liberty and the amelioration of the condition of the great family of mankind. The President speaks of this Congress as if he were full of glorious anticipations; and in this, as in most other instances, his sentiments have been echoed by the committee of the House. The fact communicated with the Message received this morning, that the Plenipotentiaries of Brazil have been invited to this intended Congress, will be sufficient to correct the error of the gentleman, of the President, and of the committee. It cannot be expected that schemes favorable to free Governments are to be discussed with the assistance, or even in the presence of the Representatives of Don Pedro the First, of Brazil. Indeed, it appears from the papers communicated with the Message, that the Spanish American Governments are exceedingly anxious to remove all suspicion that such ideas are entertained by them. The theme of the Congress is to be American Independence of Spain and Portugal, not the freedom of mankind. A less excusable error is that of supposing that the Spanish American States imitated our example when they separated themselves from Old Spain. We broke the bonds that united us to the parent country, to escape oppression and to enjoy freedom. They, from hatred to France, and love of their own king. It was love for a despot in the person of Ferdinand the Seventh, the adored, and not hatred of despotism, which produced the first efforts to establish Spanish American Independence. The release of the dethroned monarch from his captivity in France, would have been followed by the reunion of the American States to the Spanish monarchy, but for the folly and madness of the restored Government. In this, as in numerous other cases recorded in history, the folly of despotism was, in the order of Providence, one of the chief causes of the moral improvement of the condition of man. While anxious to throw themselves into his paternal arms, the Spanish Americans found themselves compelled to wage a dangerous and doubtful contest, in order to escape the threatened vengeance of their monarch. Their efforts have been great, and their success glorious. As they advanced in victory, they merit praise for having had the sagacity to discover the value of our institutions, and the wisdom to adopt the forms and some of the principles of our constitution.

A more dangerous illusion, as it is flattering to our self-love, is that of supposing that all the movements of our Government in favor of the Spanish Americans have been prudently regulated with a view to promote the establishment of free Governments and liberal institutions. A brief reference to the most marked events from the first proposition, which related solely to Buenos Ayres, made by the present Secretary of State, until the recognition of all the Spanish American States was proposed by Mr. Monroe, will place this matter in its true light.

The first resolution on the subject of Spanish America, introduced by Mr. Clay, was proposed while all Spanish America, except Buenos Ayres, yet owned at least a nominal obedience to Spain. The resolution was successfully resisted in the House of Representatives, on a variety of grounds; the chief were that it was not yet ascertained that Buenos Ayres could maintain its independence—that the country was distracted by factions; the power of Spain had not been exerted against the revolutionary party. That the recognition would not be useful to the Patriots, our ports being open to them without a formal acknowledgment of their Government—it might be injurious to us to discover an unseasonable eagerness to decide on the yet doubtful question between them and Spain. An objection was also urged to the form of the proposition—it proposed, like the Greek resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts, the appropriation of money to pay the expenses of a mission, when the President chose to institute it. It was urged, that it was not the duty of the House to stimulate, but to restrain, Executive patronage. The contest continued to be sustained with doubtful fortune in South America, until the year 1820. In the mean time, our long-protracted disputes with Spain were terminated by the treaty of 1819; out of which grew new difficulties and embarrassments, as Spain failed to ratify it. In the negotiation which preceded and followed that treaty, no steps were taken by the United States towards recognition, but the appointment of the Commissioners to Buenos Ayres and Chili, to collect information of the political and civil condition of those two countries. The Spanish Monarch was engaged, during this period, in preparation for formidable effort against the Revolutionists in the different parts of America. A force of 15,000 well-organized troops, under a leader of talent, experience, and reputation, was drawn together at Cadiz—the means of transportation actively collected—a negotiation with Portugal pressed, to obtain repossession of Monte Video, as a landing place and citadel for the Royal troops. The friends of Spanish America saw, with anxious foreboding, the gathering danger. The Spanish Americans were ill prepared to resist so formidable a force. They owed their escape from the expected peril and their subsequent signal triumphs, to the very source of their danger. The formidable army which threatened the annihilation of freedom in Spanish America, gave freedom to Spanish Europe; and the intended instruments of despotism were the champions of liberty. The imbecile despotism of Ferdinand sunk almost without a struggle, and the constitution of 1812 was restored. Patriotism was called from exile and from imprisonment, to preside over the movements of the restored system. Among the first acts of the new Government, was the abandonment of all attempts to reunite, by force of arms, the ultra-marine Territory to the Spanish dominion.

Commissioners were appointed to visit the American Governments, hear their complaints, and, if practicable, reunite them under the constitution to the parent State. Bolivar and Morillo celebrated the armistice in Colombia with feasts and rejoicings—ate at the same table, and drank from the same cup. The question between Spain and Spanish America was entirely changed. It was no longer a contest between liberty and despotism, between the oppressing and the oppressed. It had become a mere question of political separation, interesting to us and to the world, but one in which the lovers of liberty might well feel sympathy for Old Spain, since her Government was more democratic and free than either of those then established in her former dominions. Her constitution was founded on the acknowledged sovereignty of the people, established representation on the basis of population, and offered to the Spanish Americans, on that basis, equality of rights, commercial, civil, and political. It would be unjust not to mention that the constitutional Government was distinguished by kindness and justice to the United States. Our imprisoned citizens, taken in arms in the ranks of the Spanish Americans, against Old Spain, were liberated—the Florida treaty ratified—the commercial code of Spain so changed as to remove all cause of just complaint.

It was under these circumstances that Mr. Clay's second resolution was proposed, and adopted by the House of Representatives: a resolution expressing a deep interest for the success of the American provinces struggling to establish their liberty and independence. The great cause of liberty, which the friends of freedom throughout the world anticipated would speedily triumph everywhere, if sustained in Spain and Portugal; and Italy was disregarded by the mover of this resolution, and those who voted for it, in their anxiety for the independence of the neighboring States. I shall not be contradicted when I assert, that the triumph of liberty in Europe would have been, if not certain, highly probable, if a firm union had been effected between Spain, Portugal, and their American dominions, and under free Representative Governments; that it would have been better for the cause of the human race had America been reunited to the peninsula under a free Government than separated, although free, if the peninsula was to be again subjected, by that event, to the ancient despotism. The efforts of the Cortes to induce the ultra-marine Territories to reunite under the constitution of 1812, were unsuccessful. The war was renewed, but with a different spirit, more worthy of the combatants. In Colombia the armistice was broken by Bolivar. Our Government continued to manifest a proper solicitude for the Spanish Americans, without forgetting what was due to Spain, free and in the midst of enemies. The policy of the Executive was, at every Session of Congress, fairly expressed, and on no occasion more fully than at the opening of the Congress in the year 1821. After speaking of the successes of the Spanish American Governments during the preceding year, the President says, in the Message of the third of December: "It has long been manifest that it would be impossible for Spain to reduce these colonies by force, and equally so, that no condition short of their independence would be satisfactory to them. It may therefore be presumed, and is earnestly hoped, that the Government of Spain, guided by enlightened and liberal councils, will find it to comport with its interest, and due to its magnanimity, to terminate this exhausting controversy on that basis. To promote this result by friendly counsel with the Government of Spain, will be the object of the Government of the United States." This language could not be misunderstood. Friendly counsel with the Government of Spain, was the means intended to be used for the accomplishment of the desired result—the termination of the exhausting controversy on the basis of the Spanish American Independence. The Executive stood committed to Spain to give that counsel before any decisive step was taken by us on that great question. Spain had a right to expect it, after this volunteered declaration of the Chief Magistrate. How was this expectation met? Within three months from the date of the Message, without any material change in the state of the contest, and without advising with Spain, or, as far as I am informed, even giving notice of such an intention, the President, on the 8th of March, 1822, recommended, in a special Message, the recognition of the Spanish American States, and asked an appropriation of money to enable him to send Ministers to them—an instructive commentary on the doctrine of pledges contained in Executive messages, the more instructive as it proceeds from the author of them. Under what circumstances did this event occur? Buenos Ayres, Chili, and Colombia, were still without constitutions, under a species of military law. Mexico acknowledged the power of that miserable ape of European despots the Emperor Iturbide. Peru was the theatre of a sanguinary and uncertain contest. We embraced Imperial Mexico to the injury of constitutional Spain. Yes, sir, in the hour of her peril this measure was adopted, which, however defensible it may have been, as politic and necessary, was pernicious in its effect on the cause of freedom in Europe. The constitutional party in Spain were, at this period, in the most critical situation. Surrounded by armies without, and assailed within by all the artifices of priestly cunning, operating upon an ignorant and bigoted peasantry, they resisted, as they had done, the pressure upon them, by holding out to the people the hope of a reunion of the Spanish dominions under the Representative system—an event not to be effected if the ancient Government was restored. The language of the Patriots of the Cortes was, "the reunion of all Spain under a free Government, or the independence and freedom of Ultramar." The recognition of the independence of Spanish America, by the United States, struck from the Spanish Patriots their best defence, and the blow was more fatal, as it was given by a free Government. The sequel of the history of the Spanish constitution is soon told; it fell before the united powers of domestic treachery and foreign force. Patriotism, and virtue, and innocence, and beauty, were again driven into exile from fair Spain, or cast into loathsome dungeons, while generous, romantic, and heroic valor, was dragged on a hurdle, with every mark of indignity bigotry and cruelty could devise, to the place of public execution. Liberty, flying from the fastnesses of Asturias, has not found a resting-place on the continent of Europe, yet still hovers over Greece, hoping to discover a refuge among the ruins of her ancient temples.

I do not, Mr. Chairman, mean to censure the policy which has been pursued, nor to enter into any examination of it. The Government has done what it believed its duty to the people of the United States, a duty which is too apt to be forgotten when we take the universe under our care, which is departed from when we legislate for the benefit of other nations. My purpose is answered, if I have shown to the committee that, in the recognition of Spanish America, we did not move in obedience to the love of liberty, or with a view to promote the extension of Representative Governments. Had the love of liberty only governed our actions, our views should not have been confined to Spanish America, or to America. Man is our brother, wherever he resides, and our feelings and wishes are as strong for his suffering in Asia, Africa, or Europe, as in America. What then did we look to? To our interests, which required a separation of the Spanish American Governments from each other and from Spain. The character of these Governments is to the people, for or by whom they are formed, of the first importance; to the people of the United States, of but a secondary consequence.

Having examined what the President proposes, touching this principle, let us see what he proposes on the other great subject with which the principle is remotely connected—the great subject of "European interference with the domestic concerns of American Governments." No such interference is, at this moment, dreaded or menaced. Why discuss the propriety or necessity of our resisting it? The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. WEBSTER) says it must be discussed. The gentleman from Delaware (Mr. McLANE) says it must not be discussed. Both gentlemen err in supposing that there is any intention to discuss resistance, by the United States, of European interference. That part of the screw is already turned upon us. On that point we stand, in the opinion of the Spanish Americans, committed. The parties, speaking of our Executive and the Spanish American Governments, are agreed upon it—we go to Panama under an invitation, in the language of the President, “to take into consideration the means of resisting interference from abroad with the domestic concerns of the American Governments. In alluding to these means, it would obviously be premature, at this time, to anticipate that which is offered merely as matter of consultation, or to pronounce upon those measures which have been or may be suggested.” We go to discuss means and measures of resistance. We are held pledged to resist European interference with the domestic concerns of the Spanish American States. That the United States are not pledged, is to us well known. We can be pledged only by treaty. But our neighbors think we are; they act under this delusion, and ought to be undeceived. To suppose that what has been done by this and the former Administration has imposed no obligation upon us, would be to commit an egregious mistake. What has been done, imposes upon us all the obligation the Executive could, by his own act, create. I speak not of the Message of 1823: I speak of the language of Mr. Poinsett, acting under the instructions of the Secretary of State: and of that of the Secretary of State, writing under the eye of the President. When nations speak, they mean something, as the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. WEBSTER) has emphatically said. Nations speak by their Ministers or Chief Magistrates. Our Minister to Mexico has said to that Government, we shall be compelled, in the event of European interference, to take the most active and efficient part, and to bear the brunt of the contest. It is alleged that this was done without instructions. Sir, look at the instructions, you will find his justification. He was instructed that this determination to resist European interference, was the basis of our policy towards the American States, to urge the Mexican Government to adopt the principles laid down in the Message of 1823—“the important principles of inter-continental law.” In the letters written to him, the Secretary of State speaks of the memorable pledge of Mr. Monroe. In the answer to the official communication of Mr. Poinsett, detailing his conversation with the Mexican Government, there is neither censure of the language used by him, nor caution to be more guarded in future. Indeed, it is perfectly clear that his conduct met the approbation of the Executive. The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. WEBSTER) thinks that Mr. Poinsett’s language was too strong, but that he put the Mexicans right in August; and what is conclusive proof that the Mexicans do not consider us any further pledged to them than England is, that the note written by the Mexican Secretary of State to our Minister and to the English Chargé d’Affaires, on the subject of the transfer of Cuba to France, were precisely alike. The gentleman, from an indistinct recollection of dates and facts, has fallen into a great error. The too strong language of Mr. Poinsett was used on the 27th of September. The impression produced by it could not be corrected the preceding month. The notes to Messrs. Poinsett and Ward were, through the influence of Mr. Ward, at the special instance of Mr. Poinsett, “corbatim et literatim, the same.” If, in August, the Mexican Secretary thought he was authorized to demand our interference, what language will he not now hold since the memorable conversation of September? The declarations of our Ministers are alleged to have been mere argument—a simple reference to the past, not committing nor intended to commit us to any thing. These pretences will not serve. Our Minister spoke plainly and intelligibly, of existing obligation and future action, not of past intention. He spoke not of the dead past, but of the living present, and the pregnant future. How will we escape the consequences of the obligation the Executive has thus imposed upon the United States? If the event occurs which our Minister anticipated, can you deny the existence of any obligation? Or will you hazard the declaration that it is only an imperfect obligation? Or shall we find safety and honor in the puerile sophism of the Department of State, which seeks to avoid a fair conclusion by abusing a term? The Secretary of State asserts that Mr. Poinsett referred alone to a pledge of the character of that of Mr. Monroe’s declaration, “a pledge to ourselves and to our posterity.” Is this the meaning of Mr. Poinsett, when he declared, “what further we were ready to do in order to defend their (the Mexican’s) rights and liberties.” A pledge to posterity—a pledge to ourselves! How strange that vigorous and practised minds should resort to such defences! The existing generation but to often gives a pledge for posterity, which posterity is called upon to redeem. A pledge to posterity may always be given with perfect security. The party who only has the right to demand the redemption of a pledge, is he to whom it is given. Posterity can never make such demand until the present is united to the future.

Mission to Panama.

Equally safe is a pledge to ourselves. The party holding the pledge can release it. If we ourselves should ever be so indiscreet as to call, at an inconvenient season, for the redemption of a pledge given by ourselves to ourselves, we ourselves can release ourselves from the obligation to redeem the pledge given by ourselves to ourselves. Could the genius of ridicule itself, by the use of words, produce a more whimsical confusion of ideas? “The people of the United States stood pledged to posterity and to themselves.” If we have given any pledge, it has been given to some power or powers, who have a right to hold it, until redeemed by us, or voluntarily surrendered by them. Mr. Monroe’s Message was no pledge, for it was addressed to no power. What it has become in the hands of the present Administration, is another and distinct inquiry, into which I propose to enter, after I have endeavored to explain what that Message originally was. The circumstances under which it was prepared, furnish the best elucidation of it. After the suppression of free Governments, in Piedmont, Naples, and Spain, on the principles proclaimed by the Holy Allies, in the successive Congresses of Troppan, Laybach, and Verona, it was seriously apprehended that the allied sovereigns would extend their parental regards to this continent. This apprehension was the more reasonable, as the principles upon which France had just acted in Spain, in the suppression of the constitution, and the restoration of the despot, could, with great facility, be brought to justify an intervention between Spain and her revolted colonies—an intervention the Spanish monarch was informally soliciting, and which was expected to become the topic of discussion, at least, in Paris. England, who had remained a tranquil spectator of the outrages committed by organized and disciplined despotism, in Italy and Spain, had too deep an interest to remain silent when America was in question. To give decisive effect to the warning the British Minister had determined to give to the allied monarchs, he wished us to join in it. Our Minister to London was asked to make, in concert with England, a declaration to the allied sovereigns. Without instructions, Mr. Rush could not accede to this proposal; but, with a boldness highly honorable to his diplomatic character, he offered to take the responsibility of this measure, if Great Britain would place herself precisely in the same position as the United States, by an acknowledgment of Spanish American independence. As Mr. Canning was not prepared to go that length, the declaration was not made by us. No doubt (of this, however, I speak without certain authority) some official communications were made to the President, through the English representative in Washington. Coinciding with Britain in the policy of at once preventing, by an immediate movement, any allied intervention in the Spanish contest on this continent, the President, in place of an official note to the allies, expressed his opinions in his Message to Congress. This course was recommended by two very important reasons: we avoided by it any entanglement, the necessary consequence of our movement, if made in concert with another power; the other, and more decisive consideration, was, that, by a Message to Congress, while it would fully explain the views of the Chief Magistrate, this Government would be, as to its future course, least committed. What did the Message of 1823 assert? "That we should consider any attempt made by the European alliance, to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere, as dangerous to our peace and security." That "we could not view any interposition for the purposes of oppressing" the Spanish American States, ac-knowledgeed by us, "or controlling, in any other manner, their destiny, by any European power, in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition towards the United States." To what system does the President allude? It is usually taken for granted, that he alludes to arbitrary Government; that he considered the establishment of such Governments on any part of this hemisphere, "as dangerous to our peace and security." A little reflection will show that this conclusion is erroneous. No President could have so degrading an opinion of our Government, or of the people, whose will created it, and whose valor will support it, as to believe that the existence of a despotic Government in any part of this hemisphere, is dangerous to our security. He who acknowledged the independence of the imperial Governments of Don Pedro of Brazil, and Iturbide of Mexico, with the same alacrity that he did the Republican Governments of Colombia, Chili, and Buenos Ayres, certainly did not entertain such an opinion. To what, then, did he allude? He alluded to the system established by the allies, as explained at their different Congresses, and as acted upon, formerly in France, and recently in Italy and Spain. He alluded to the system of interference, by an armed force, in the domestic affairs of nations, under the pretext of maintaining or restoring domestic peace, and placing the institutions of the invaded country on such bases as would afford salutary guarantees to the general tranquillity. The essential difference between our system and that of the allies, of which the President speaks, in the same Message, arises from our asserting, and uniformly acting on the principle on which our Government is erected, that every people have the right to regulate their own concerns in their own way; to live under such a Government as they may choose to establish; to change it at their pleasure, whenever a change is necessary to their happiness and prosperity. This principle is true everywhere; but, in the maintenance of it in Europe, we have but a remote—in the maintenance of it in America, a direct, interest. The law of self-defence requires us to act, whenever any combination of powers—Asiatic, African, European, or American—interferes with the domestic concerns of the American States. This was all that was rightfully asserted by the Message of 1823. The motive of interference does not enter into the question. If the interference was in a crusade against liberty, it was not "dangerous to our peace," but a direct attack upon us. If the crusade began at Patagonia, it would not end at Mexico. If, for the purposes of oppression, to gratify ambition, or to sustain the sinking cause of a cruel tyranny, the interference would be a gross wrong, which we, of right, might arm, and act to prevent. But what effect has the assertion of these principles, in an Executive Message, produced upon us? Has it proved their truth? Their truth had never been, and is not, doubted. Did it bind us to act upon them? We should, in case of necessity, have acted upon them, had they not been asserted; and we shall act upon them whenever an emergency may require it, without regard to the Message; and our mode of action will be precisely the same as if the Message never had been sent to us. How we shall act, will be decided by Congress, whose will is as completely unfettered, as if the Message never had been prepared, or its author never had existed. I speak, sir, of the Message, unconnected with the use subsequently made of it. What it has now become, I will show to the committee. Under the plastic hand of another artist, a Message of a President to Congress has been converted into a bond uniting our destiny to that of Spanish America. A declaration, founded on the law of self-defence, has been changed to a pledge of guardianship and protection of all the Spanish American Governments: the condemnation of the principles of the Holy Alliance, into the assertion of the right, in this continent, to act upon the same principles. Can gentlemen doubt that these changes have been wrought, or attempted? The correspondence with Mexico proves them beyond dispute. The last metamorphosis may be found in the instructions of the 25th of March, 1825, to Mr. Poinsett. Mr. Clay writes: "the political systems of the two continents (Europe and America) are essentially different. Each has the exclusive right to judge for itself what is best suited to its own condition, and most likely to promote its happiness; but neither has a right to enforce upon the other the establishment of its peculiar system."

Now, sir, strange as it may seem, here is the acknowledgment of the right of the allied sovereigns to do all that has been done by them in Europe, and the assertion of the right of any American alliance to do what it pleases on this continent. The exclusive continental right of regulating its own system, can only be exercised by the instrumentality of the power of the great nations occupying it. The Holy Allies have done no more than proclaim and act upon this doctrine, in Europe. Are we to copy their detestable example here? The principle asserted is equally false, applied to either continent; and equally false, however pure the motive of its application. Its apparent plausibility arises from assuming that to be true of a continent, occupied by many nations, which is true of each nation that occupies it. Every nation has the exclusive right to judge for itself what is best suited to its own condition. Any interference with that right, is equally detestable in principle, whether made by powers occupying the same or a different continent. No continent has a right to prescribe to the nations composing it any regulation whatsoever of its internal affairs. Connected with the proposed Mission to Panama, with the character of the assembly of nations which is to meet there, and the peculiar stipulation of the treaties formed touching the powers, or rather objects, of that assembly, this attempt to introduce this new term of inter-continental rights into the code of national law, is ominous of the intentions of our present Palinurus. It is to concert means of resisting European interference; these being considered as the principles of Mr. Monroe's Message, that we have been invited, and have consented to go to Panama. We go not to undecieve them; not to explain to them their mistake, in supposing us pledged to any efforts for the defence of their rights; but to discuss the question of means, as if the pledge existed in its full force, as presented to Mexico, by our Minister. Supposing no treaty engagement is made, what will be the effect of a formal discussion, and a formal agreement, recorded in the protocols of the Assembly? But the President does not tell us that he will not make a treaty. He says "a joint declaration of the character of the obtrusive interference from abroad, and the exposure of it to the world, may be, probably, all the occasion would require. Whether the United States should or should not be parties to such a declaration, may justly form a part of the deliberation." This declaration will be signed by our Ministers, if they think it expedient. That they will be pressed to join in it, cannot be doubted, when we reflect on the situation of the South American States. What will be the effect of such a joint declaration, to which we become parties, about which we shall not be consulted, nor will the Senate be asked for their advice? Will we not stand still more deeply involved than we now are? Am I not justified by this examination of this subject, in believing that the public interest requires no negotiation at Panama respecting it? It is not necessary to discuss how we shall exercise our discretion, when the lawless intervention of any power, European or American, in the domestic concerns of a neighboring State, shall impose upon us the necessity to act. Instead of discussing the propriety of our uniting in a declaration, our Ministers should go to extricate us from the embarrassments created by the imprudent diplomatic and Executive declarations already made; with orders to withdraw us from the eddy, not with the power to plunge us still deeper into the vortex of implied pledges to defend Spanish American rights and liberties.

We must not forget, Mr. Chairman, that the language of the President does not exclude the idea of forming a treaty on this, as well as on the other basis of the American system—colonization. Coinciding with the President, as they suppose, honorable gentlemen tell us that we must have Republics on this side the Atlantic. We must have Republics. How must we establish them? Our own Republic exists by popular will. Our will cannot control our neighbors, unless enforced by our power. Do we mean to force our American neighbors to be free, contrary to their wishes? Gentlemen, in their infinite love of free institutions, abandon the first principles of our own institutions, and are prepared to imitate those alliances which they, at the same moment, condemn. Neither religion nor liberty can be, on just principles, propagated by the sword. These same gentlemen, while they join our committee in echoing the opinions of the President, that "great political interests will be discussed at Panama," that the decisions of our Ministers "will act on us" politically, also profess themselves perfectly satisfied that no entangling alliances are intended, or likely to arise out of the proposed mission. While I consider these opinions delusive, I ask gentlemen who entertain them—to explain how their intentions can be accomplished, how our political interests are to be guarded, without treaties with those whose decisions are so important to us, and upon those points especially which touch our political interests? Such treaties will necessarily expose the destiny of our country to the discretion of other nations. Every alliance is, in my judgment, entangling, which places our peace on the discretion or movements of any other Government, whether we are to play the part of guardians, allies, or auxiliaries. The President, and the honorable members of this House who justify his course, with one breath, deny the danger of entangling alliances, and, in the next, argue that they are inevitable.

Sir, on this subject of the form of the Governments on this side the Atlantic, no error more fatal to the future prosperity of this people could be committed than that of believing that our interests require us to act on different principles than those which have usually, if not always, regulated our Government. In the forms of the Governments of other nations we have no right to interfere; and it is indifferent where those nations live. America, Africa, Asia, Europe, are to us the same. We will that our Government shall be free. Let other nations exercise their will. If wisely, in copying our institutions, and conforming to our principles, they will secure their own prosperity and our respect; if madly, in copying the follies of the Hebrews, who were discontented without a king, let them suffer the appropriate penalty. The gratification of their wishes will bring with it the punishment for their absurdity. The very dangerous ideas of our Chief Magistrates, touching our future intercourse with the Governments of this continent, is forcibly illustrated by referring to another subject proposed to be submitted to the discretion of the Ministers who are to go to Panama—Religion. A subject the immortal authors of our constitution would not permit us to touch, is to be made a part of the instructions of our Chief Magistrate to this new mission. I will not take the pains to point out the change in the mind of the President, as exhibited in his Message to us and to the Senate, nor to dwell on the fact that all the wishes of the President, as expressed in the Message to us, have been already accomplished, as regards those American Governments with whom we have already formed treaties, and that the correspondence with the other Governments does not show the smallest probability of any difficulty of succeeding to the same extent with those with whom we are yet negotiating; but I deem it important to press on the attention of the committee that our Chief Magistrates have considered it "as among the duties devolved upon us, in the formation of our future relations with our Southern neighbors, to use all the moral influence which we can exercise, whether of example, of friendly counsel, or of persuasion," to establish civil and religious liberty among them.

I confess to you, Mr. Chairman, that I was not prepared to expect a denunciation of privateering from Massachusetts; and when I look at the incidents of the Revolution and of the late war, I am filled with wonder that any politician of our country should desire to see it formally denounced by an assembly of nations. Of the fifteen hundred vessels taken from Great Britain during the late contest, balancing the account of her plunder of our citizens on the ocean, how many were captured by public armed ships? I should be happy to hear a fair explanation from the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. WEBSTER,) who has addressed us on this subject of the difference, on moral principles, of capturing the private property of an enemy on the ocean by commissioned public vessels of war, and commissioned private vessels of war.

True, sir, the gentleman gave us no opinion; he gave us an argument in defence of the President's opinion, who "cannot exaggerate to himself the unfading glory with which the United States will go forth in the memory of future ages," if, through our moral influence, the South American States abolish private war on the ocean.

Mr. Chairman, I confess, without hesitation, that I am unwilling to surrender this powerful instrument of offensive defence; and what I am unwilling to surrender to a powerful maritime State I should be ashamed to ask of our feeble neighbors. Nor can I leave this subject without protesting against the injustice of the distinction made between a force prepared by the resources of the Government and that prepared by individual enterprise, controlled and directed by public law. As much gallantry, heroism, courtesy, and patriotism, have been displayed on the decks of our privateers, as have ever been exhibited, except on the decks of our own public ships of war. That England, with her swarms of small public vessels of war, commanded by petty officers, who have enriched themselves by preying upon belligerent and neutral commerce, should inveigh against the use of privateers, is natural and appropriate; that there should be converts to her doctrines in this country is to be deeply regretted. The President, however, is not sanguine in his hopes of effecting so much as the abolition of private war on the ocean, at Panama. He believes it will be practicable to establish the principle that the friendly flag shall cover the cargo. The rule that free ships make free goods has been discussed for centuries; after various efforts, the rule of maritime war, as it at present exists, that enemies' goods, under a friend's flag, was prize of war, and a friend's goods, under an enemy's flag, not prize of war, has been quietly adopted. For the security of the property of our citizens, it is practically sufficient. The recurrence to the disputed doctrine can only be important to the carriers of the cargoes of belligerents, and to the feeble maritime powers who may be engaged in war. Maritime strength will not admit the rule; maritime weakness willingly adopts it. What does our Chief Magistrate propose? To compel the powerful by combining together the feeble States? No, sir, he proposes to adopt the principle as applicable only to those who admit it. In a former discussion, I took occasion to show that the stipulation to that extent already made with Colombia, might lead to great embarrassments with Spain, with whom we have a similar stipulation. I will not repeat what I then urged, preferring to rely on the recollection of the committee.

APRIL, 1826.]

Mission to Panama.

[H. OF R.]

The basis of our relations with Hayti cannot be changed, unless, indeed, the anticipations of our sister Republic of Colombia should be realized, and other parts of our hemisphere should be in like circumstances. And what, Mr. Chairman, does our Executive say on this proposition to discuss the basis on which our relations with Hayti shall be placed? He thinks it may be a question of preliminary advisement, whether the political condition of Hayti be brought at all into discussion. Aware, however, by the official notice from the Colombian Minister, that the question of Hayti is to be not only discussed, but determined, the President proceeds to inform us that our Ministers will be instructed to present certain views to the assembly, and, if they are not concurred in, to decline acceding to any arrangement which may be proposed on different principles. What views are these? The Haytiens hold a nominal sovereignty, by the grant of a foreign prince, under conditions equivalent to a concession by them of exclusive commercial advantages to the subjects of that prince. This statement is not now true; the Haytiens refuse to hold their independence as the boon from France—what else is to be urged by our Ministers? "There are certain circumstances in the political condition of that island, which have hitherto forbidden our acknowledgment of its independence." I trust, sir, by this declaration, the President does not mean to intimate that these circumstances are not hereafter to prevent that acknowledgment. I take it for granted, that he is not so lost to his duty—why, then, should these views be presented to the assembly at Panama? If I understand the object, it is to accuse the United States for their illiberality in declining to accede to the arrangement, which will certainly be proposed on different principles. I trust, sir, we shall not be thus degraded. I should, I confess see with dread, the painful task of thus defending the United States, imposed upon the President of an Abolition Society. As the Executive does not propose to form an agreement, all discussion is useless; whatever may be his intentions, no treaty can be ratified which proposes to change the "basis of our relations with Hayti, or any other part of our hemisphere, which may hereafter be in like circumstances." With the movements of the neighboring nations towards Hayti, we have no concern. Let them act. Southern feeling, prejudice, if gentlemen prefer the term, should prevent our Executive from naming this topic in any assembly of nations.

The great object of the Mission to Panama is yet to be considered; the destiny of Cuba and Porto Rico is also to be fixed at the Isthmus. Whatever may be our wishes, no one proposes we shall negotiate treaties with the American States relative to these islands. Remonstrance, advice, nay, a treaty cannot be necessary. For the defence of my amendment, the admission made by gentlemen would be sufficient, but this branch of the discussion is too interesting to be lightly touched. I would, then, inquire upon what principle it is that the names of Cuba and Porto Rico are joined together, by the Administration, and by the advocates of this mission? The fate of Porto Rico, lying beyond Hayti, more than a thousand miles from the Cape of Florida, is but little more interesting to us than that of any of the leeward islands. It cannot, into whatever hands it may pass, be a source of serious danger to the United States; and yet, sir, it seems to be considered in the same light as Cuba, lying in front of our territory, within a day's sail of our most exposed frontier, and in the centre of the Gulf of Mexico. The law of self-preservation compels us to watch with anxiety over the destiny of Cuba; with that of Porto Rico we have no greater interests that we have in the destiny of the West India islands—not, in fact, as deep an interest as we have in the fate of Jamaica. Confining my remarks to Cuba, I ask gentlemen upon what ground it is that they expect we shall assist in the discussion of the question of Cuba at Panama? It is strictly a belligerent question. Our Ministers will be told, "by the terms of the invitation to your Government, and its acceptance, this is a matter on which you cannot be heard." If deference to our Government should induce the assembly to waive this exception, what can your Ministers say? If you take Cuba from Spain, you endanger the Southern States. What will be the answer? Cuba, in the hands of Spain, is, and ever will be, the source of infinite evil to us; her possession of it is incompatible with our security and independence. Will your Ministers be instructed to tell them, you shall not touch Cuba? Will the law of self-preservation justify this intervention between the belligerents, authorize us to demand a restriction of the rights of lawful war? Our danger from this source is remote, unhappily but too probable, yet still contingent. The danger of the Spanish Americans is immediate and pressing. Mr. Chairman, it is important to the character of our Government, that, on this subject, we should make no pretensions which are not strictly just in themselves, and which we are not prepared, at every hazard, to sustain. The contest with Spain never will be brought to an end, if Cuba is not wrested from her by the Spanish Americans. It affords revenue to her exhausted Treasury, refuge to her beaten troops, refreshment and security to her wearied mariners. It is the jungle in which the Royal Tiger hides himself, that he may spring, unawares, upon his unsuspecting prey. The people of the island are under a grinding despotism, from which they long since would have sought to free themselves, but from the peculiarity of their situation. They dare not strike for freedom, without promises of assistance and protection, which no neutral nation can give, without a violation of the acknowledged laws of national morality. Shall we say, then, to the Governments of Spanish America, who have the right to drive the tiger from his hiding place, and free their brethren from tyranny and oppression, Wince not; suffer patiently the present, endure with fortitude the future danger; give not freedom to your fellows; it is incompatible with our interests, and may endanger our tranquillity? I envy no man's fate, who bears instructions to hold such language on Continent or Isthmus. I shall feel deeply humiliated, as an American, if such instructions are ever given by a President of the United States. The destiny of Cuba is one of the most difficult political problems of the present time. I wish it to remain in the hands of Spain, or some power strong enough to preserve its internal tranquillity, and yet too feeble to be dangerous to the commerce of the Gulf of Mexico. This desire is, I trust, excusable; but an active effort to secure to Spain her dominions, would be criminal. While we proclaim ourselves the friends of Spanish American liberty, we cannot, without the basest selfishness, seek to condemn Cuba to eternal slavery. The organic laws of Colombia and Mexico render it impossible that the inhabitants of Cuba should willingly unite their destiny to either Government; yet the right of these two Governments to conquer the island cannot be disputed—the means of effecting the conquest are insurrection and massacre—without a resort to these, the efforts of the combined Governments will probably be insufficient.

What shall we do, sir? Our duty to them and to ourselves points to our course. Give them plainly to understand that we will not suffer the scenes of St. Domingo to be acted in Cuba. That, while we do not interfere in any manner, to control the exercise of the rights of war, we should act effectively on the law of self-preservation, the moment their movements in Cuba should make it necessary. To meet this contingency, immediate preparation should be made. Honorable gentlemen of this House think, however, that all that is proper has been done, or will be done, at Panama. Will these gentlemen reflect for a few moments on the extraordinary circumstances under which we are to present ourselves at this assembly of nations? We, the freest nation on the globe, professing to be at the head, at least, of the American States, go to Panama under the auspices of the Holy Alliance—we go with our great and magnanimous friend, the Emperor of Russia, to support us, whose intervention has been invoked by our Executive in the name of benevolence, and to maintain legitimacy. Heretofore, during every change of the varying contest, we have refrained from interfering ourselves, and protested against the interference of other powers, especially the Holy Alliance; but now, sir, when the dominion of Spain is lost on the continent, she herself, almost at the feet of her former colonies—now, we interfere to preserve her; we invoke the head of the Holy Alliance to use his influence with one of the League, holding out to her hopes the fair islands of Cuba and Porto Rico, and promising the preservation to her of these last relics of her American despotism. How could the Emperor resist our seducing call? He promises to consult his Allies; but mark, Mr. Chairman, the condition of this promise. Until Spain's ulterior views are positively ascertained, with regard to her American possessions, and her decision upon the proposition of the United States, and the opinion of her Allies, on the same subject, are also known, Russia cannot give a definite answer. In the meanwhile, she is pleased to hope the United States will use their influence in defeating, as far as may be in their power, every enterprise against these islands, &c., &c. Our influence is expected to be used, you see, Mr. Chairman, to defeat every enterprise against Cuba and Porto Rico, and we go to Panama, as I solemnly believe, to avoid the responsibility thus most wantonly and idly incurred. It will not escape the most casual observer, that we have given to Spain a powerful motive for adhering to her usual policy of delay. Until she decides on the question presented by the United States, our influence and that of the whole alliance of the Holy Powers is to be exerted to prevent any change in the present condition of Cuba and Porto Rico. How, sir, are we to escape the toils into which the Executive has contrived to wind himself? It is apparent that he feels the net around him, and hence arises the difference in the language of the first letter to Mr. Middleton, invoking the Imperial benevolence and of the answer to Mr. Middleton's letter, announcing that the Emperor was disposed to show his benevolence, and to maintain legitimacy. The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. WEBSTER) mistakes entirely, when he supposes that the contradictory language of our Secretary of State, is found in his letters to Russia and the South American Governments. So far as we are informed, there has been no communication to our sister Republics on the important question of Cuba, except the announcement of our friendly efforts with the Holy Alliance, and the suggestion that the suspension of all attempts on the islands of Cuba and Porto Rico, "would have a salutary influence on the great work of peace;" "a suspension due to the enlightened intentions of the Emperor of Russia, upon whom it could not fail to have the happiest effect."

If the glaring inconsistency of our conduct does not bring reproaches upon our Ministers, what answer will they make if, in the discussion of this subject, some wily Colombian or Mexican quotes these words from the letter of our Secretary of State? "The President cannot see any justifiable ground on which we (the United States) can forcibly interfere. Upon the hypothesis of an unnecessary protraction of the war, imputable to Spain, it is clear that Cuba will be her only point d'appui, in this hemisphere. How can we interpose, on that supposition, against the party clearly having right on his side, in order to restrain or defeat a lawful operation of war?" Our Ministers might have urged the dangers of insurrection and desolation, had not our most adroit statesman contrived to deprive them of this resource. Hear, sir, what has been announced to the world, that with which our neighbors will not fail to close the mouths of our Ministers: "If the war against these islands should be conducted by these Republics in a desolating manner—if, contrary to all expectation, they should put arms into the hands of one race of inhabitants to destroy the lives of the other—if, in short, they should countenance and encourage excesses and examples, the contagion of which, from our neighborhood, would be dangerous to our quiet and safety—the Government of the United States might feel [yes, sir, might feel, are the words; it seems to be doubted even in that case] itself called upon to interpose its power. But it is not apprehended that any of these contingencies will arise; and, consequently, it is most probable that the United States, should the war continue, will remain hereafter, as they have been heretofore, neutral observers of the progress of its events." If none of these contingencies are apprehended, what business have we to discuss the question? Whether they are or not, this official declaration of the Secretary of State, is a conclusive answer to any remonstrance we can make, and, if accompanied by the assurance that the intention of the South Americans is to make Cuba an independent State, will leave us without a decent pretext to press the subject. The Administration seems to think Cuba is incapable of maintaining its independence. Why? It is nearly as large as England, and capable of sustaining as dense a population. If now too feeble to sustain its independence, by its own efforts, it may be aided by those powers who are so deeply interested in its fate: under a free Government, it will soon acquire competent strength.

Suppose, Mr. Chairman, the assembly at Panama, in their anxious desire to gratify us, and to produce the "happiest effect upon our great ally, the Emperor of Russia," and, with a proper regard to "his enlightened intentions," should address themselves in terms like these to the United States: We will suspend all attempts on Cuba and Porto Rico, on the condition that you prevent Spain from making use of either of them to our annoyance. This proposition is fair and reasonable: What answer can we give? There is but one. We cannot justly do so; nor can we justly, except in the manner I have indicated, interfere with their enterprises against Cuba. Porto Rico is too distant so far to affect, as to authorize us to act under the law of necessary self-preservation.

The Executive must look at this assembly as the organ of a great confederation. The Isthmus of Panama is intended to be the resting place of the lever, the Congress of Plenipotentiaries, by which some American Archimedes is to move the great political power of this continent at his pleasure. To the ambitious statesman, burning to illustrate his name, to acquire for himself a brilliant place in the history of the political convulsions of the world, the temptation to force or seduce the United States into this "great American Confederation," whose "magnitude appals" ordinary politicians of contracted views, is indeed formidable. But, sir, it must be resisted. The people of the United States have nothing to acquire through the instrumentality of this formidable power—no motive to look on Spanish Americans in any other light than the rest of the world, as "enemies in war, in peace friends." It is this view of the subject that shows the importance and necessity of an expression of our opinions. This is an epoch in our intercourse with our American friends. The President says we must have political connections with them, which are not necessary with the rest of the world. Our committee echoes the opinion. The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. WEBSTER) speaking with the same views, warns us of the necessity of elevating ourselves to the spirit of the age in which we live. This language is not new in the halls of Congress, but it now comes from a new and unexpected quarter. The answer which was formerly deemed conclusive, can be now repeated: there is no necessity for an intimate political connection with our neighbors. We have nothing to effect which we cannot accomplish by our own means. As to this great confederation, there are two decisive reasons for avoiding any connection with it: we cannot hope, alone, to direct an assembly composed of numerous Catholic Spanish American States, having common interests, language, feelings, and prejudices. If successful in acquiring a complete ascendancy, of wielding at will the whole moral and physical power of the North and South Americans, what advantage have we to gain by it? First in the order of time, our Republic is now, and ever must be, first in power and intelligence; while faithful to the principles of the solemnly adopted constitution, the people will be prosperous, free, and happy. Will the brilliant situation of the head of the American Confederacy add to the stability of our constitution, to the prosperity, freedom, or happiness of the people? To neither. Our splendor will dazzle the eyes of other nations—our power may shake Africa, Asia, and Europe. We shall exchange solid popular comfort and domestic happiness, for empty national splendor. We shall have brilliant wars, in which our gallant sailors and enterprising soldiers may gain deathless renown, and brilliant alliances to immortalize our adroit diplomatists; but every contest will increase the burdens necessarily imposed upon the people, until we shall look as English statesmen will soon be compelled to look, to national bankruptcy, as the only refuge from the effects of popular despair. To the fatal consequences of looking beyond our own resources, of mixing our destiny with that of other nations, the Farewell Address of the most illustrious man, not of our own country, but of the age in which he lived, directs our attention. He speaks to his countrymen in the language of affection more than parental, of wisdom almost prophetic, to warn them against the danger of foreign alliances. To me, sir, the least excusable part of the management of this Panama question is, the attempt which has been made to give a false coloring to these last counsels of Washington. We have been told, substantially, that he spoke only of European foreign alliances; that if he now existed, he would not be averse, as his language fairly indicates, to those political connections which the President thinks we must have with Spanish America. The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. WEBSTER) thinks the argument on the Farewell Address is not conclusive, but fair. Is that a fair argument which seizes upon one of the reasons by which a policy is recommended, and substitutes for the policy clearly explained and supported by general reasoning, a policy founded on the selected single reasoning? Avoid, as far as practicable, all foreign political connections, in extending our commercial relations. Such is the advice given. Europe, in which stood the Governments of the great commercial powers, is detached and distant from us; we can easily avoid political connections. The period will soon arrive when our own strength will be so far increased, that no temptations to such connections will exist.

TUESDAY, April 18.

Mission to Panama.

The House having again resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Foreign Relations, approving the Mission to Panama, with the amendments proposing a qualification to the general expression of approbation thereof—

Mr. THOMSON, of Pennsylvania, addressed the committee as follows:

Mr. Chairman: The subject now under consideration presents for our decision important questions of constitutional law, relating to the powers of the House, and how far it may constitutionally interfere in the foreign diplomatic affairs of the country. When the House is called upon to act upon bills appropriating money to enable the Executive to send Ministers abroad, it must act freely, as it does in all other cases, and decide as its duty to the country may require. It has certainly the power to reject such bills, as it has to reject other bills, if it be satisfied that the peace, the happiness, and the prosperity of the country, require it to adopt such a course. This, it must be admitted, gives to the House the power to restrain the intercourse of the country with foreign nations. This is a great power, and ought not to be exercised unless in cases where it is made clearly and satisfactorily to appear that the Executive branches of the Government, to whom, by the constitution, the management of foreign affairs is committed, intend to enter into arrangements with foreign powers which will tend to involve us in war, to fetter us with improper alliances, or otherwise compromise the high interests or dignity of the nation. But this power to restrain the foreign diplomatic intercourse of the country, by no means implies the power of managing that intercourse. It does not follow, from the possession of it, that we can constitutionally issue instructions to foreign Ministers, or order the President of the United States how he shall instruct them.

From what fountain in the constitution do gentlemen propose to draw this power of instruction, and confer it on this House? Is it from the power to appropriate the money necessary to enable the President to send Ministers abroad—upon the principle, that the power to appropriate the money, implies in itself the power to dispose of it when it is appropriated, and direct for what objects and in what manner it shall be applied? Is it to be laid down and established as a principle of constitutional law, that, because this House must join in passing the bills appropriating money to support our foreign diplomatic correspondence, it may take that correspondence into its own hands, and give instructions to our Ministers abroad? Do gentlemen consider the consequences which must flow from such a principle? It would terminate in concentrating in this House the whole of the powers of the Government: in conferring upon it a dictatorial authority to dispose of all the affairs of the nation—civil, political, and military. Establish it, and the appropriation for the support of the army cannot be passed until a resolution of the House is adopted, appointing the officers, designating their command, and specifying the service in which each division shall be engaged. The navy appropriations must receive the sanction of the House under the same conditions. A resolution must pass appointing Captain Stewart to command in the Pacific, Porter in the Mediterranean, and Rodgers in the Gulf of Mexico; and prescribing to each the instructions under which he is to act. Thus, this House would be vested with the entire and exclusive command of both the army and navy. A doctrine which leads to such consequences cannot be true. But it has not the semblance of foundation in the constitution. The House alone has not the power to make any appropriation. The Senate and the President must also yield their assent. So that, if the argument proved any thing, it would prove, not that this power of instruction may be exercised by the House alone, but equally and jointly by all the several branches of the Legislature.

It has been argued, that because Congress has the power to declare war, and wars may be occasioned by the manner in which our foreign relations are managed, therefore, this House has the power of giving instructions to the President and his Ministers, in what manner these foreign relations shall be conducted—what shall not be negotiated, what shall, and in what manner. This argument is liable to the same objection with the last. It proceeds on the false assumption, that the power to declare war is vested in this House alone. This power is vested by the constitution, not in this House, but in Congress; not in one, but in all the branches of the Legislature.

That the amendment, offered by the honorable member from Delaware, contains instructions to the President in what manner he shall conduct the negotiations at Panama, is, I think, obvious. The following is the resolution reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

Resolved, That in the opinion of the House, it is expedient to appropriate the funds necessary to enable the President of the United States to send Ministers to the Congress at Panama."

This resolution contains nothing more nor less than the principle contained in the bill, appropriating the money to pay the salaries of the Ministers and expenses of the mission. The amendment proposes to affix it as a condition to the adoption of this principle, that our Ministers at Panama shall not be allowed to discuss certain matters, nor be allowed to enter into certain stipulations. Now, the question is not, whether the restrictions proposed by these amendments to be laid on the Ministers at Panama, in the exercise of their diplomatic office, are politic and wise; whether they are the proper restrictions and limitations which ought to be contained in their instructions;—but whether it be the proper constitutional province of the House to interfere at all, either to restrain or to enlarge their powers. I can look on this amendment in no other light, in this respect, than if it was offered as a proviso to the bill appropriating the money to defray the expense of this mission. If it were made a proviso to that bill, would it not obviously act as a limitation set by this House upon the treaty-making power, vested by the constitution in the President and Senate? Would not the Senate regard it as such, and at once reject it as unconstitutional?

The right to command and the obligation to obey are correlative. If this House, therefore, has the right, by resolution, to command the Executive to give certain specific instructions to the Ministers at Panama, he is bound to obey. If he is bound to obey the resolution of this House, there is the same, if not greater reason, he should be under equal obligations of obedience to the Senate. If he is so, then this resolution ought to be a joint one, or he may have opposite commands from these two bodies, on the same subject, each of which he is equally bound to obey—which is absurd.

Either the amendment, if we adopt it, is intended to have some effect, or it is to have none. If it is to be entirely without efficacy, the House would, I presume, for that reason alone, refuse to pass it. If it is to have some effect, upon whom is that effect to be produced, and what is it to be? It is to be produced on the Executive, and is to compel him to give certain specific instructions to the Ministers at Panama. It is proved by the reasoning I have just used, and indeed is admitted, that this House cannot do this by a direct command. Has it the power, then, to do that indirectly, by attaching conditions to the appropriation of money, which it has no constitutional authority to do directly?

If the House has the authority, under the constitution, to prescribe to the Executive, either directly or indirectly, the instructions he is to give to foreign Ministers, it must have some power to enforce obedience to its mandates on this head. This power must extend, not only to the President, but to the Senate. Can it send its officers, and arrest and bring the President before it, to answer for having given other and different instructions from those it has dictated? Can it arraign the Senate for confirming a treaty made in disobedience of its instructions? Can it institute an impeachment of the President before the Senate, for a disregard of its authority on this point? I think no man acquainted with the constitution of this Government will venture to answer either of these questions in the affirmative.

It is true that the House has the power of expressing its opinions on abstract propositions relating to the foreign policy of the Government. To express these opinions, it is not necessary it should have any other than a general knowledge of our diplomatic affairs. It can well say, that the policy of the country towards foreign nations, ought to be pacific; and when war is going on between any of them, that it ought to be neutral; that its policy is, and ought to be, to extend our commerce with all nations, and have entangling alliances with none. To be able to say this, with a proper understanding of what it does say, it has no need to open the bureau of State, and examine the foreign diplomatic correspondence of the nation. But when it comes, in relation to any particular mission, not to pronounce general propositions, but to descend to particulars, to say what shall or shall not be negotiated; what stipulations shall or shall not be entered into; and what instructions our Ministers shall have; it is absolutely necessary that not only the correspondence of our Ministers in relation to the affairs of the particular mission under consideration, but in relation to all other foreign affairs, should be laid before it, that it may know the whole of the diplomatic relations of the world, and judge whether the instructions it is about to give are calculated to advance that policy which it thinks the country ought to maintain. The inconvenience of such a system is obvious. Foreign nations could hold no correspondence with us. They would be aware that every year the whole matter must be laid before this House, and published to the world. The propositions now under consideration are not abstract general propositions; they descend to particulars, and are connected with this mission, and made part of it. They prescribe what is and what is not to be done, in this particular case. If these can be called abstract general propositions, then the words abstract and general have lost entirely their signification.

The construction for which I contend, is the one which has prevailed ever since the adoption of the constitution. This House has never passed any resolution expressing opinions in relation to our foreign affairs, except in general terms. It may have called the attention of the Executive to a subject, but it has never undertaken to prescribe in what manner negotiations, touching that subject, should be conducted. It has never expressed opinions, the evident tendency of which was to weaken the influence of the Executive, in his negotiations with foreign powers, and to show that it had lost confidence in the Senate, as to the manner in which that body would exercise its functions, as a part of the treaty-making power. But the gentleman from Delaware says this is not a case in which the opinions of this House, and those of the Executive, can come in collision. From this I understand him to mean, that the propositions contained in the amendment are nothing more than the principles which the Executive has intimated to us he will regard in conducting the negotiations at Panama. Why, then, does the honorable member so earnestly urge the adoption of the amendment? If the Executive and this House are "of accord" on this point, why indicate distrust in him and the Senate, by the passage of a resolution which, upon these principles, can have no other object than to bind him to pursue a course he has said he will pursue, and to warn the Senate that it must not ratify any thing not negotiated in accordance with these principles? Whatever might be my opinion of the gentlemen holding the great offices of this Government, entrusted with its treaty-making power, I would not dishonor my country by placing her public functionaries in this attitude in the presence of foreign nations.

The honorable member from Delaware urges, as a principal reason for adopting this amendment, that the President has asked the House for its opinion as to the policy of this measure, and that we are, therefore, bound to give him our sentiments fully on the subject. The gentleman means, I presume, that the President has called upon us for our opinion in this case, in a manner different from that usually practised, by merely asking an appropriation. This is a matter of fact, and how does it stand? The President, in his Message to us, the only paper among the documents addressed to this House, says—"The concurrence of the House to the measure, by the appropriation necessary for carrying it into effect, is alike submitted to its free determination, and indispensable to the fulfilment of the intention." Again, at the close of the Message, he says—"I submit the propriety of an appropriation to the candid consideration and enlightened patriotism of the Legislature." By thus submitting the subject to us, I do not see any expression of a wish that we should give any opinion, except that which we must give, by passing or rejecting the appropriation bill. To make this matter out, recurrence has been had to the Message to the Senate, a paper which, at the time it was written, was not expected to be made public, nor to be sent to the House. How this can be construed into a request made to the House for its opinion, when it was not sent to the House, nor to be seen by it, is not easy to conceive. But the President has no power, by the constitution, to require or demand of this House its opinion on any of its measures, before they are carried into effect. He cannot make us a part of his cabinet council, or demand of us our advice and direction in any other manner than is authorized by the constitution. This mission is an Executive measure. It is projected by the Executive; it must be conducted by the Executive; and for its final success, the Executive must be responsible. If this House shall assume the power of directing and controlling the operations of the Executive, by giving him its opinion and advice as to the manner in which those operations are to be conducted, it will terminate in making the President the irresponsible agent of this House, and not the responsible representative of the sovereign people of the United States. If he is to proceed in the discharge of the duties and trusts committed to him, under the shield of opinions expressed, and advice given by this House, it will be vain to say that he is at all responsible. If the House gives orders, which he obeys, and thereby compromises the interest of the nation, can the House impeach him for the misconduct which they themselves have occasioned? While I have the honor to hold a seat on this floor, I will do nothing willingly which will, in the least, diminish the responsibility of any branch of the Government.

Mission to Panama.

This amendment contains propositions, to which, as abstract principles, I entirely agree. That the policy of this country should be to extend our commerce with foreign nations, without forming with them any entangling alliances, is certainly true. That our Ministers must appear at Panama in a diplomatic character, is also true. They can appear in no other. It is not my wish that the Government should enter into any alliance, or make any stipulation, with the South American Republics, which may bind us hereafter, whether we are willing or not, to engage in their wars with foreign nations. But does it follow that, because these propositions are all true, we are therefore solemnly to resolve them by a vote of this House? Has any one denied their truth? Where, then, is the necessity of such a resolution? But, there is one part of this amendment, for which I could not vote, if the constitutional difficulty were even removed. It is, that our Ministers are not to be permitted to discuss certain subjects, and, among others, "any measure which shall commit the present or future neutral rights or duties of these United States." I cannot vote for this, not because I am willing that our Ministers should enter into the discussion of any measures with the view of violating our neutrality, or which must have directly that effect, but because the proposition is so extensive and indefinite that it would be impossible for them to know what subjects they might discuss. Who can possibly foresee what measure may commit the future neutral rights and duties of a nation? If this passes as part of the resolution, what subjects will be left for discussion? I answer, none. There is no subject which can be made the topic of diplomatic discussion, which may not, in some way or other, give occasion to some other nation to take offence, either justly or unjustly.

Have we been always so punctilious in relation to our neutrality? No, sir. In the year 1811, when Old Spain was fallen—when her political and military constitution and strength were wholly overthrown, we, without any ceremony, and even without the formality of a discussion, for the protection of our own just rights, ordered the occupation of Florida, a part of her dominions, without regard to the danger of violating our neutrality. Are we afraid of our neutrality, now that it is not the weakness of Old Spain with which we may come in collision, but the united powers of South America, or that of England, or of France? Sir, this is a feeling which neither my vote nor my voice shall ever countenance. I would feel myself dishonored if I thought my native country could be guilty of such meanness, as to treat the weakest independent nation on earth with less justice or ceremony, because it was weak, than she would the Emperor of Russia or the monarchy of Great Britain. How, if this part of the amendment passes, are we to partake in the discussion in relation to the present condition and future destiny of Cuba, which may, nay, which must come under the consideration of the Congress at Panama? We cannot attempt to dissuade the South American Republics from taking possession of it, lest we shall give them offence, and endanger the committing of our neutral rights and duties with them. We cannot urge them, if they should resolve to carry the war into that island, to come under obligations that, when they do so, they will not conduct it in a manner which we suppose calculated to injure us, lest Spain should allege we had violated our neutral duties towards her; and we cannot say one word of allowing it to become independent, with its domestic tranquillity properly guaranteed, lest we should get into difficulties with both of these powers; and, lastly, we are not to be allowed to speak of taking possession of it ourselves, if our interest should demand such a step, lest, perchance, Spain, England, France, and the southern Republics, should take offence, and our neutral relations should be brought into hazard with them all. The political relations with Cuba are, at this moment, profoundly interesting to this nation, and I, for one, will not agree that our Ministers shall go to the Congress at Panama without having full power to speak on this subject, as our interest may require, in the most decided tone.

The honorable member from Delaware says, forms are nothing—it is the substance we are to regard. It is true, that forms of words are nothing; but the constitutional forms of this Government are every thing. They are the great bulwarks of civil liberty—the partition walls which the people of this nation have erected between the several departments of this Government, to prevent them from interfering with one another, and the whole power from running into one mass, and then becoming absolute and despotic. They are vital to the preservation of civil liberty. If forms are nothing, why may we not issue writs of error from this Hall to the Circuit Courts, and bring their records before us, and reverse or affirm their judgments? The matter or substance is, to do justice between the parties; and cannot we trust ourselves to do that when the cases are before us? Upon this principle, what is to prevent us from usurping all the powers of the Government—civil, military, executive, legislative, and judicial? Why may we not appoint one committee to take charge of the Executive functions of the Government; another to assume the seats of the Judges in the Supreme Court; and a third to dispose of that venerable body which occupies a splendid hall in another part of this building? The true theory of our Government is, that its several functionaries, in each of its departments, are like the agents of the people to discharge the duties enjoined on them respectively by the constitution: for the faithful performance of which they are all responsible to the people, in the manner provided in the constitution; that the functionaries of one department, who attempt to exercise the powers peculiar to another, are so far from being in the constitutional discharge of their duty, that they are guilty of an open violation of that duty.

But, Mr. Chairman, what necessity is there for adopting the amendment? If the President is resolved to plunge us in war, to compromise our neutral relations with foreign powers, or to disregard that pacific policy which has heretofore guided the councils of this nation, there may be some occasion, if the House had the power, to restrain his authority, and that of the Senate, in the manner proposed by the adoption of this amendment. How is the matter of fact? Has the Executive any such intent? In his Message to us, the President has said so much to show that he has no design to enter into any entangling political connection with the South American States, or to compromise the neutral relations of the country, that it would be improper for me to detain the committee to quote it. In his Message to the Senate, he says: "It will be seen that the United States neither intend nor are expected to take part in any deliberations of a belligerent character; that the motive of their attendance is neither to contract alliances nor engage in any undertaking or project importing hostility to any other nation." The Secretary of State, in his report to the President, speaking of the conference he had held last Spring with the Ministers of Colombia and Mexico, on the subject of the proposed Congress, says: "It was also stated by each of these Ministers, that his Government did not expect that the United States would change their present neutral policy, nor was it desired that they should take part in such of the deliberations of the proposed Congress as might relate to the prosecution of the existing war with Spain." In his answer to the letter of Mr. Obregon, the Minister from Mexico, the Secretary of State, speaking of the Ministers to be sent to this Congress, says: "While they will not be authorized to enter upon any deliberations, or to concur with any acts inconsistent with the present neutral position of the United States, and its obligations, they will be fully empowered upon all questions likely to arise in the Congress, on subjects to which the nations of America have a common interest." The Colombian Minister, in his letter to the Secretary of State, of November 2, 1825, speaking of the subjects to be considered and discussed at the Congress at Panama, says: "He is, however, authorized by his Government to assure the United States that these points have no tendency to violate their professed principles of neutrality." The Minister from Mexico, in his letter of the 8d of November last, to the Secretary of State, speaking of the subjects to be discussed in this Congress, says: "In consequence of which, being informed of the concurrence of this Government in the idea of discussing the first point in a Congress as was desired, and that it would send Representatives to it, under condition that the neutrality in which it stands towards Spain should not be violated," &c. The Minister from Central America, speaking of the objects of the Congress, in his note of the 14th of November last, to the Secretary of State, says: "And which will not require that the Representatives of the United States should, in the least, compromise their present neutrality, harmony, and good intelligence with other nations." Thus, it appears, sir, not only that the Executive is determined to do nothing tending to commit our neutral relations with foreign nations, nor to contract alliances, but that the Ministers of the several South American Republics are fully apprised of the views of our Government on this point. Yet, it is gravely contended that the President intends to compromise our pacific relations, and to enter into entangling political connections, injurious to the future prosperity of this nation. Sir, I can, in these documents, see no such design. If I did, I would not stand on half-way ground; I would not attempt to bind the Executive and the Senate by resolutions, which those who advocate them admit they may disregard—mere ropes of sand, of no power. I would, at once, effectually interpose in the manner prescribed by the constitution—refuse the appropriation, and prevent the mission.

Something has been said, Mr. Chairman, on the subject of Executive confidence. In my official character, as a member of this House, I have no confidence to bestow on any Executive, except what the constitution requires, nor may I give less than it enjoins. It does not permit me to step over the boundaries which it has prescribed to the powers of this House, and intrude into the exercise of the functions of any other branch of the Government, and allege, as a reason for such intrusion, a want of confidence in those who administer that department. When breaches of official duty occur, the constitution has provided the mode of trial and punishment. In some cases it has given the Legislature the power to arrest the operations of the other branches of the Government, by refusing appropriations; but it has nowhere declared that the functionaries of one branch shall assume the powers of another, merely because they think that other will not faithfully discharge its duties. For these reasons I cannot vote for this amendment. I consider it not only as unnecessary, but as an unconstitutional interference with the rights and duties of the Executive and Senate.

Much has been said, Mr. Chairman, on the subject of the powers of the Congress at Panama. Gentlemen reason as if questions were to be decided there as they are in this House, by a majority of votes; as if the honor, the peace, and the future destiny of this nation were to be committed to a Congress of States, in which we were to have but one vote against eight. Sir, this is not to be the case. Our Ministers there are not to be legislators; they are to be diplomatic agents—Plenipotentiaries, who, from the very nature of their office, can decide nothing by vote. Whatever they do, must be by negotiation; and every treaty or stipulation entered into, must be ratified here by the Senate, before the faith of the nation is pledged. The South American States send Ministers to this Congress to take a different part, and to perform very different duties from those to be taken and performed by ours. They come there, bound by treaties of league and confederation, to enter into certain arrangements. We send our Ministers, wholly free from all obligation, to do whatever a prudent regard to our own interests may dictate.

The political relations of the South American Republics with this nation, have been fully discussed in the course of this debate. Our commercial connection with them has not been so much noticed. Permit me, sir, to turn, for a moment, the attention of the committee to this interesting subject. Most of those Republics lie in latitudes, and possess a soil, which enables them to rear the rich products of tropical climates. Several of them have gold and silver mines of inexhaustible wealth. These great resources, which are every day becoming more known, already stimulate the enterprise of every commercial nation. Our intercourse with them employs a great amount of capital and many of our ships. From the character of their soil and climate, and the habits of their population, it may fairly be concluded that they will not soon become a manufacturing people. This renders it probable that these Republics will, for ages, continue to be, as they now are, the great market for all our surplus manufactures. Permit me, sir, to advert particularly to our commerce with the Republic of Peru, to exemplify the advantages we now enjoy, and those we have in prospect, by cultivating the friendship and securing the confidence of these powers. In that country our flour is a staple of commerce, and our cotton fabrics are rapidly superseding those of Calcutta, heretofore in general use. Between the months of June and March last, five vessels sailed from Philadelphia, belonging to citizens of the United States, to the coasts of Peru, sixteen from Baltimore, one from Norfolk, four from New York, one from Providence, six from Boston, and two from Salem, whose cargoes, almost entirely composed of our own manufactures, and the productions of our own soil, amounted to two millions one hundred and thirty-one thousand six hundred and eighty-four dollars. Besides, no doubt, others have sailed from these and other ports of the United States for that Republic, whose destiny is not known. During the same period, it is known that ten American ships have departed from ports on the continent of Europe, bound for Peru, engaged in the carrying trade. Our commerce, direct and indirect, with this Republic alone, may be estimated at the annual rate of not much less than ten millions of dollars.

Peru and Mexico are the great fountains from which flow, directly and indirectly, into this country, nearly our whole supply of the precious metals. These are the chief articles of export from Peru. They are produced there in greater abundance than in any other country, and are, of course, to be obtained there at a cheaper rate. This country, from its geographical position, its capacity to furnish an advantageous market for our manufactures and agricultural products, and the abundance it furnishes of the precious metals, must soon become the centre on which our whole Asiatic commerce will turn. We need gold and silver for the trade with India. Heretofore we have obtained them from Peru and Mexico, enhanced by freight and insurance. When our commercial relations with these Republics are placed on a proper and permanent foundation, our merchants will ship, in our own ports, our own manufactures and agricultural productions, for the ports of Peru and Mexico, and there exchange them for the gold and silver necessary to carry on our Asiatic trade, and immediately proceed on their voyage to India. The immense beneficial effects of such a revolution in our commerce with that part of the world, may be estimated by considering the relief it will give to the circulating medium of the country, from the constant and enormous demands made upon it for specie to vest in the India trade.

By the emancipation of the South American States, and the consequent demolition of the Spanish colonial system, we have a ready and convenient market opened for all our manufactures and the products of our agriculture. Our capital is employed in a lucrative commerce. Our shipping is increased, our seamen are multiplied, and new sources of wealth are opened to us in our Asiatic commerce. The enjoyment of all these advantages depends on ourselves—upon our prudence in maintaining good relations with these Republics. Every thing, therefore, which relates to this subject, is deeply interesting to the manufacturing and grain-growing sections of the Union.

We at present pay, in the ports of Peru, on our cotton fabrics, a discriminating duty, above those paid by other countries, of ten per cent., and the enormous duty of seven dollars and fifty cents on each barrel of flour we export there. It is certainly a matter of great consequence to us to have these duties repealed, as well as to have all our other commercial relations with these powers put upon a proper footing. It may be said this can be done without the mission to Panama: that commercial treaties can be formed at the several courts of these Republics. What prospect, I ask, have we of obtaining advantageous commercial treaties with them, if we treat their overtures of friendly intercourse with haughty and insolent contempt? What better opportunity can we obtain of using our influence on them, to induce them to establish a system of liberal commercial relations among themselves, and with other nations, than is now offered at the Congress of Panama? I am, therefore, decidedly in favor of this mission. I consider it a measure calculated to advance, in a pre-eminent degree, the best interests of the nation, as well as the great cause of civilization and liberty.

It is candidly avowed, Mr. Chairman, by the honorable mover of this amendment, that his object is, that this House should recall or reverse the celebrated declaration of the late President of the United States, contained in his Message of December, 1823. That the amendment, if adopted, would have this effect, is obvious. This, if there were no other, is sufficient reason with me for voting against it. Sir, I will not recall that declaration. Its promulgation did this nation great honor, and rendered infinite service to the cause of civilization and liberty. And shall we now tarnish our glory, and renounce entirely our relation to this great cause? Whom, sir, do we represent? A nation of slaves to some petty despot? No, sir; we represent a noble, generous, and chivalric people—a people who are free, and proud of their civil liberty—a people who are justly proud of having their institutions taken as the model on which other nations, who have broken the bonds of slavery, are forming theirs—a people who realize the noble stand they have taken, by this declaration, at the head of the family of free nations; who are generously anxious to see the principles of civil liberty fill the earth, as the waters “cover the channels of the great deep.”

In accordance with the generous sentiments of the nation, the late President made the declaration of 1823. It was received throughout the United States with enthusiasm. While this feeling prevailed in every State in this Union, it was remarkably predominant in that one of which I have the honor to be a native. The Spring following, the convention there met which nominated one of the most distinguished men of this age a candidate for the Presidency. This convention appointed a committee to prepare an address to the people of the State, on the subject of the approaching election. This committee, with an American feeling, and devotion to the cause of civil liberty, which does them great honor, in their address advert to this declaration in the following terms: “The present is a period of awful interest to all Republican Governments. They are every where invaded by a formidable combination of tyrants, exulting in their past success. Naples, Portugal, and Spain, are re-settled in the calm of despotism, and the sombre monuments of tyranny and superstition are elevated over the tombs of martyrs and patriots, and the ruins of constitutional Governments. The light of Grecian liberty must be extinguished, as a torch of discord thrown into the Ottoman empire. The conflict between the oppressor and the oppressed, will not be confined to Europe. The fleets and armies of the Holy Allies embark for American coasts. American Republics, bordering on our own country, must be subjugated. The veteran patriot who presides over the destinies of our country, has declared we must resist—and the nation sanctions the declaration. Nor are we left to blind conjecture, as regards the light in which this country is viewed by the despots of Europe. One of their ambassadors lately declared, in the court of Madrid, ‘that the United States were the source of all the revolutionary principles that disturbed the crowned heads of Europe.’ How can we mistake the import of such a declaration?”

This just devotion to the cause of civil liberty was the sentiment of my native State then, it is her sentiment now, and will be her sentiment to the remotest ages of posterity. I am proud to be the native of a State which holds the cause of liberty dear, and looks with jealousy on the movements of despots. And shall I, sir, with this known expression of the public will before me, vote for recalling this declaration? No, sir; I will not change nor recall one word, one syllable, nor one letter of it.

What, sir, was the condition of the world when this declaration was made? The great cause of freedom had been overthrown on the continent of Europe. Spain, Portugal, and Naples, had been compelled to yield their free institutions, and to receive law from absolute despots. The light of civil liberty had been extinguished, and one impenetrable gloom of despotism covered throughout continental Europe. The Holy Allies had then effected their unholy purpose in the Old World. But they saw that if the cause of liberty prospered, on this side of the ocean, its effects must, soon or late, be felt in their dominions. A question then presented itself for their decision, big with interest to this country, to this hemisphere, and to the world: whether they should at once interpose with force between Spain and her revolted colonies, reduce them to obedience and their former allegiance, and finally overturn all free Governments on this side of the Atlantic. The genius of this nation saw the imminent danger to which the cause of civil liberty was exposed, and resolved to interfere. She interposed her adamant shield between these infant Republics and the ancient tyrannies of Europe, and pronounced the definitive decree, that the ocean must be the boundary of their principles. This decree was promulgated in the celebrated Message of the late President. It had the desired effect, and the cause of civilization, of liberty, and of mankind, was permitted, in this hemisphere, to triumph.

Mr. GARREY then spoke as follows:

Mr. Chairman: I ask the indulgence and attention of the committee for a few moments, in relation to the question before us. I wish to state, sir, that I am opposed to the amendments of the resolution under discussion, and in favor of the appropriation to pay Ministers to be sent to the Congress of Panama, as proposed by the resolution and bill of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and for the following reasons:

It is unprecedented for the House of Representatives to give instructions to interfere in relation to Ministers to foreign courts. This House has nothing to do with the treaty-making power: it has once so determined. That was also the opinion of Gen. Washington on this subject.

The House of Representatives, in 1796, being dissatisfied with the treaty made with Great Britain, called for a copy of the instructions of the Minister who negotiated that treaty. General Washington, then President, in refusing to comply with the request, and in giving his reasons for so doing, states that,

"Having been a member of the General Convention, and knowing the principles on which the constitution was formed, I have ever entertained but one opinion on this subject; and from the first establishment of the Government to this moment, my conduct has exemplified that opinion—that the power of making treaties is exclusively vested in the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and that every treaty, so made and promulgated, thenceforward became the law of the land. It is thus that the treaty-making power has been understood by foreign nations; and, in all the treaties made with them, we have declared, and they have believed, that, when ratified by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, they became obligatory. In this construction of the constitution, every House of Representatives has heretofore acquiesced; and, until the present time, not a doubt or suspicion has appeared, to my knowledge, that this construction was not the true one. Nay, they have more than acquiesced; for, till now, without controverting the obligation of such treaties, they have made all the requisite provisions for carrying them into effect."

He adds, in conclusion:

"As, therefore, it is perfectly clear to my understanding, that the assent of the House of Representatives is not necessary to the validity of a treaty; as the treaty with Great Britain exhibits within itself all the objects requiring legislative provision; and on these the papers called for can throw no light; and, as it is essential to the due administration of the Government that the boundaries fixed by the constitution, between the different Departments, should be preserved; a just regard to the constitution, and to the duty of my office, under all the circumstances of this case, forbids a compliance with your request."

The House of Representatives, after this, by two resolutions, expressed their opinion on this subject, the first of which is in the following terms:

"Resolved, That, it being declared, by the second section of the second article of the constitution, 'that the President shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur,' the House of Representatives do not claim any agency in making treaties; but that, when a treaty stipulates regulations on any of the subjects submitted by the constitution to the power of Congress, it must depend for its execution, as to such stipulations, on a law or laws to be passed by Congress; and it is the constitutional right and duty of the House of Representatives, in all such cases, to deliberate on the expediency or in expediency of carrying such treaty into effect, and to determine and act thereon, as in their judgment may be most conducive to the public good."

Special instructions by this House would, I think, be contrary to the letter and spirit of the constitution. "The President shall have power to nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint, Ambassadors, other public Ministers, and Consuls." The President also has power, by the constitution, to "fill up vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions, which shall expire at the end of the next session." The power that creates, from necessity, in the absence of constitutional provision and law, must instruct and direct.

Ministers may be appointed and treaties made, through the instrumentality of the President alone, in the recess of the Senate, but cannot be ratified without the consent of two-thirds of that body.

The laws of nations recognize the making of treaties by independent Governments, through the agency of Ministers; and our constitution, in obedience to that principle, has vested the power of nominating and appointing Ministers with the President and Senate of the United States, and they are responsible to the nation for all treaties made and adopted.

Instructions from this House cannot be enforced; for there is neither constitutional provision nor law to compel obedience.

Not only so—the object of the mission being, in some degree, advisory, instructions might not, if we had the power, be judiciously given.

If this House has the power contended for, the Senate surely has, and the President also. And if the instructions of the two several Houses and the President all disagree, what is to be done? Who shall Ministers obey? By following the directions of one, they disobey the others. Besides, a principle like the one contended for, would be assailing, without good cause, the prudence and wisdom of the Executive. There can be no reason for alarm: for all acts of the President and Ministers, in relation to treaties, must be reviewed and sanctioned by two-thirds of the Senate, before they can be adopted or binding. And do gentlemen doubt the prudence and wisdom of that august body? If not, where the danger?

In addition, this nation calls loudly for a speedy appropriation. Both principal and interest, in a commercial and other points of view, (putting aside every other consideration,) should induce us to be represented at the Congress of Panama. And I venture to say that three-fourths of the people of the United States have full faith in the mission proposed, and the acts of the President on that subject. It is humane, it is benevolent, it is congenial to the feelings of a free people, to take an interest in the rising importance of the South American Republics! It looks to the improvement of the condition of man.

Generations to come will approve our acts, and sing praises to the philanthropists and statesmen who inclined a listening ear—lent a helping hand—received with open arms, and aided a sister Republic, by the advice and wisdom of our counsels. We ought never to be wearied with doing good. Why then do we hesitate? Where is the cause of alarm? Once adopt a cold, political, unfeeling philosophy towards other nations, and let that doctrine be encouraged and promulgated until the people of our own are controlled by its principles, our Government would then be found with an icicle at its heart; the streams of justice would then cease to flow; and we should be shivering in anarchy, and in the cold embrace of ruin. It is the love of country—the principles of virtue, humanity, and independence—the liberty of speech, of the press, and of conscience—the sympathetic feelings for the suffering of others, assimilated to ourselves, together with a recollection of our own, and other heroes, who have fought and bled that man might be free, that cements, harmonizes, and strengthens, that fellow-feeling which unites and sustains this Republic, and lights up a glow of patriotism in every American heart. Let a different principle once prevail, and the balance of power be destroyed, which operates as a powerful magnet upon this people, our Government would fall to pieces, and dissolve like a rope of sand, leaving us afloat amidst the storms of a political ocean, without pilot, chart, or compass.

The constitutional prerogative, vested in certain departments in this Government, in respect to its diplomatic character with other nations, is admirably calculated to insure peace and prosperity. If other essential principles of the constitution are preserved, and its intended distribution of power to each department rightly continued, this Government is founded upon a rock, immovable as Atlas, and imperishable as time; political storms may hereafter arise and roll, but, as long as the empire of reason reigns, the lashing wave of faction may beat in vain.

Aspiring men, intriguing and ambitious, at some future period, may assail, in its essential part, with impetuosity, and apparent success of conquest, the battlements of the constitution; but that noble chart of liberty, purchased by the treasure, toil, and blood of the heroes and fathers of the Revolution, in the hands of a virtuous, wise, patriotic, and intelligent people, will be preserved, and remain the admiration of future ages, as a scroll of wisdom, independence, and fame. How often is the sun, when marching gallantly on in its majestic course, suddenly obscured by clouds and storms! Yet, its powerful rays soon burst forth in all its effulgence and glory. So, in some respects, our constitution, that polar star of our country, is often darkened and obscured by the tempestuous vapors of human intellect and ingenuity; yet, like a strong ship amidst the storms of the ocean, she resists the tempest, and rides upon the mountain wave, carrying her gallant crew in safety to their destined port.

Mr. INGHAM said: It is with great reluctance that I at any time intrude myself into a general debate on this floor, because I cannot but consider any thing that I might have to say, when subjects are so fully and much more ably discussed by others, as an intrusion upon the patience of members, rather than as having even a claim to their indulgence. There are, however, occasions when, even under these objections, members may be justified in exercising their common right of delivering their sentiments, and offering their reasons for their vote more fully than they can be known from a naked vote on the journal. It often happens that those who disagree as to many of their premises, will unite in their conclusions; and, also, that those who agree in their premises, mainly, may differ in their conclusions. These considerations, were there no others, seem to require of me to avail myself of the occasion to present to the committee and to my constituents, the reasons which will govern the vote I am about to give. Before I proceed to the general course of remark which I had prescribed to myself, it will be proper to notice some of the observations of my colleague, who has just taken his seat, (Mr. THOMSON.) My colleague has assumed the position first taken by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. WEBSTER,) and occupied by all who have since spoken on the same side. I understand it to be this: that, by adopting this amendment, we attempt an unconstitutional exercise of power, inasmuch as the treaty-making power is vested in another body, and hence we have no right to instruct the President as to what measures he ought or ought not to negotiate about with foreign powers; and, consequently, we have no power or right to declare our opinion in relation to the measures proposed to be adopted at Panama, in the manner and form of the amendment now under consideration. If my colleague, and those who have preceded him, had made out their case, or even given it a plausible appearance, it would have been an important addition to their argument; but in this I think they have entirely failed. In the first place, the amendment proposed is not an official instruction, in form or substance, and must have required much aid of the imagination to conceive of it as such. The amendment is neither more nor less than a simple declaration of the opinion of those who vote for it, in relation to a great question of national policy, which I hold we have an inherent right to make, by virtue of our relation to the people and the country. But I go further, and, I trust, will be able to show that the expression of such an opinion is clearly within the expressly delegated powers of Congress.

I admit that few occasions will be likely to arise, wherein it would be expedient or necessary for this House to declare its opinion on such subjects; but of this the House will be the judge for itself, and of course each member must judge for himself. I have no doubt the present case will most fully justify the declaration proposed. It seems to me that gentlemen cannot be aware, when they thus deny the right of the House of Representatives to instruct the President, (as they are pleased to call it,) in the form of this amendment, of the inextricable difficulties into which their doctrines will lead them. They cannot maintain their position without denying every power of Congress upon the most unimportant interests committed to their charge. Do they not extend to all subjects of legislation within the limits prescribed by the constitution? None will surely deny that such a legislative power is vested in Congress, and I ask no other admissions, (it is not necessary for the purposes of my argument, to rely upon the impeaching power;) the legislative power undoubtedly must comprehend within it the use of the necessary and proper means for its exercise, and the application of those means to the accomplishment of its legitimate objects. This power extends to the regulation of commerce—the declaration of war—and I believe every conceivable object in one shape or another, embraced within the treaty-making power. We pass laws in relation to foreign commerce, which subject is clearly within the scope of the treaty-making power; to alliances, offensive and defensive, which also belong to the treaty-making power. These may involve war, and yet the power to declare war belongs to Congress. By pursuing the subject in this way, we should find the treaty-making and legislative power so blended as to be wholly inseparable; they are, in fact, so interwoven together, that the ablest men who have ever discussed the subject in either House of Congress, do not appear to have been satisfied themselves where the line of separation is. Numerous examples have been given, wherein this House had exercised the same power now proposed, viz: That of declaring its opinions on matters belonging to the treaty-making power. I will not repeat these, but refer to other examples, in my judgment even much stronger.

On the 8d of March, 1815, Congress passed a law proposing, in terms, to all foreign nations, who would repeal their discriminating impost and tonnage duties in relation to the United States, that, as soon as the President of the United States should be satisfied of the fact, our discriminating duties, in relation to such nations, should also be repealed; and this law has been acted upon in numerous cases, with and without treaty stipulations. The measure was recommended by President Madison, and has been acted on by all who have followed him. It was not merely the declaration of the opinion, but a declaration of the will of the whole legislative body, on a subject clearly within the treaty-making power, and that declaration made previously too. There is another example, still much stronger, if possible, to show that the legislative power is inseparable from, and even paramount to, the treaty-making power. In the year 1778, the old Congress made two treaties with France, one of alliance, offensive and defensive, the other of amity and commerce. These treaties were made when the United States were in close connection with that country, united by sympathies and interests of the most imposing character; in 1793, Congress, by law, abrogated both treaties. Is it not, then, idle to assert that it is unconstitutional to declare our opinion on treaty-making questions, when we have declared our will, both by previous and subsequent legislation? Here I would remark, by the way, that, when these treaties were formed, none supposed that they could become a subject of difficulty; but the designation of the articles considered contraband, in the treaty of commerce with France, not being ingrafted in the treaty with England, in 1794, commonly called Jay's treaty, was the cause of the difficulties between the United States and France, and also with England, which led to spoliations and depredations upon our commerce under Orders of Council and Decrees, in violation of national law, from that time, until they terminated in the late war with England. These difficulties had their origin in national sympathies, and were promoted by the same cause, until they ended as I have mentioned.

My colleague has said, however, that we, the House of Representatives, cannot act in relation to subjects which the Congress can. I do not comprehend the distinction. Congress never can act as a joint body. We act separately. Each House commences such measures as it thinks proper to adopt, and it begins by referring them to committees, who examine, investigate, and report their opinion, either in a general report, resolution, or bill. This is the beginning of our acts; and the House, exerising all the powers vested in the committee, declares its opinion for or against the reports of the committees, or modifies them. Such is the practice and constant process of our Legislature. I am, therefore, at a loss to know what my colleague means, when he says, Congress may declare its opinion on subjects not within the competency of the House to declare its opinion upon.

I do not think my colleague has made out his case, that we are about to exercise an unconstitutional power by instructing the President; but, if he had moved to change the form of the resolution, so as to obviate every appearance of its being an instruction, and this motion had been rejected, then he might have some right to insist that the resolution was objectionable in form; if he would make such a motion, without affecting the substance, he should have my vote cheerfully; but there is no form in which an opinion on this subject could be declared, which might not be objected to for the same reason.

The subject does appear to me so plain, that I am at a loss to conceive how such an objection has been made so current among the opponents of this amendment, unless, indeed, the want of more substantial ground to rest upon has forced gentlemen to occupy this. Our object is to declare our opinion upon a great measure of national policy, not in the form of official instructions, but with a view to making known that opinion, as well to the other branches of the Government, as to the world. This opinion can have no other than a moral influence; and in that respect it is intended, and will not be disregarded. And it is very immaterial as to what form of words it may be expressed in, so as that they may be understood. My colleague has pressed the argument with such earnestness, that I cannot doubt his sincerity; but he has surely not examined the whole subject, or he would have seen to what difficulties such anti-republican doctrines would lead him. He says, we have no power to instruct, because we cannot compel the President. I am sorry to see my colleague so misled by a sympathetic sensibility to Executive supremacy. I do not feel it, nor would my principles permit me to cultivate it, whoever might be President. Is it true that this House cannot compel the President in any case? I will not follow my colleague in his suppositions, "that we might as well order the President, by law or resolution, to appoint this or that officer of the army or navy, to this or that station," as adopt this amendment.

That power is not legislative; it is a pure, unmixed Executive power, although I could find an example, during the late war, in which an attempt was made to prevent the President by law from sending the army across the line; that was, however, a mere ebullition of faction which cannot be defended. But is this House without power "to compel the President?" I will put a case for the consideration of those who advance this doctrine, so degrading to the power of the House of Representatives. Suppose the country to be involved in war. It cannot be carried on without the exercise of the constitutional power of this House, in providing the means. Overtures for peace are made: the President sends Ministers to negotiate. It is, however, known to this House, that the enemy have offered an honorable peace. The President, ambitious of conquest, refuses to make peace: will you then tell me that this House has no constitutional right to declare its opinion, because it cannot make a treaty? What would the House do in this case? I put it to every member who has denied our constitutional right to express our opinion in this case, to say what he would do in that case; would he suffer the interest and peace and happiness of the country to be jeopardized by an ambitious President, and sit silently and submissively voting the supplies, without expressing an opinion? Sir, we would not hesitate a moment to speak to him in a voice that he could not misunderstand. We would not speak by adding a rider to our appropriation bill, but we would speak by resolution, and say to him, you must put an end to the war. Would any President disregard such an admonition? I should like to know whether a resolution of that kind would be an unconstitutional instruction to the President. Call it what you please, the President would be compelled to obey; he must send his Ministers instructed to make peace. Sir, would gentlemen deny to this House the power which, in such cases, is exercised by the British Parliament? The President is an agent of the people; he is not presumed, under the form of our Government, to possess any sovereign power; he only exercises delegated power. The sovereign power of this nation rests in the people; but, according to the forms of the British Constitution, it is in the king, and yet there the Parliament, when it determines for peace, makes known its desire to the sovereign, and he must obey. Such was the declaration of Parliament, which terminated the war against us in the Revolution, and gave us our independence. [Mr. Thomson explained: he said, he did not deny the power to express opinion, but to instruct.] I am not aware, said Mr. I., that I have misstated any expression of my colleague; he will do me the justice to believe that my very great personal respect for him, if not for myself, would forbid that I could intend to misstate or misrepresent any argument. I think, however, he must be satisfied, that, if such a resolution as that before us is exceptionable on the ground of its being an instruction, that every declaration of opinion by this House, on subjects which belong, in any manner, to the Executive duties, must also be unconstitutional. Before I take leave of my colleague, I would say a word on the topic of confidence, which has been introduced into this debate as a principal foundation of the opposition to this amendment. It is of some importance that we should understand it. I would repose the same confidence in one branch of the Government, as such, that I would in another; but no degree of confidence that I may repose in any other department can relieve me from my own proper responsibility. Gentlemen will not say that we ought not to examine bills from the Senate, because we have confidence in that body; nor is it an improper distrust for us to examine their bills, with as much care as we do those reported by our own committees. So of the President; where his duties are involved with ours, and we have a joint responsibility, we must judge for ourselves, and act in accordance with that judgment, and not upon confidence. These are my views upon this point. My colleague says, forms are every thing! I understand him to mean constitutional forms. In this I agree with him; but have not been able to perceive the slightest obstacle to this resolution in any form of the constitution: on the other hand, I think I have shown that our right to express an opinion in this case is an undoubted, perfect, constitutional right, derived from our legislative power, and clearly within the sphere of our duties. The nature of our obligation, in relation to appropriations, has also been brought into this discussion, and I will take this occasion to explain my views of it. There are three classes of appropriations made by Congress. 1st. Those over which we have an undoubted discretion. 2d. Those made in pursuance of contracts. 3d. Those made obligatory by the constitution. Of this last class are the salaries which the constitution has declared shall not be diminished, such as those of the Judges of the United States Courts, &c. With respect to these three, there is not only a moral, but a constitutional obligation: we are sworn to support the constitution, and cannot withhold a salary which that instrument has declared shall not be diminished. The next class of appropriations, about which there is any doubt, is that made in pursuance of contract, whether in pursuance of treaties, or other contracts.

I hold it to be incontrovertible, that, whenever the constitution has given us the power, without qualification, to do any act, we must be vested with a discretionary power to determine upon its expediency: the obligation cannot be absolute. It has been said that we have the physical power. I say we have the constitutional power. There is, however, a moral obligation upon us to exercise this, as well as every other power, according to the principles of justice and good faith—of which we must be the judges. Every contract, however, which depends upon an appropriation for its final execution, must, from the nature of the case, be made subject to that condition: but I will admit the obligation to be much stronger to appropriate where a contract exists, than where there is none, and which, according to my judgment, resolves itself into this: That, where an appropriation is asked to carry into full effect a contract of any kind, those who refuse it must incur the responsibility of showing good and sufficient reasons for not granting it; they must satisfy their own consciences that the public interest forbids the grant of money; the burden of the proof lies upon them; the presumptions are all in favor of the appropriation. But, in ordinary cases, the burden of proof lies on the other side; before money can properly be asked from the Treasury, the necessity for it must be shown. This I consider a safe and sound doctrine on this subject, from which nothing is to be feared, if it is faithfully adhered to.

In another part of the arguments of my colleague, he quoted a paragraph from an address to the people of Pennsylvania, by the convention of that State who nominated General Jackson for the Presidency of the United States. So far from finding any thing in that paper to weaken the position I have taken, I accord, heart and hand, with every sentiment that he has quoted. That declaration, as well as the memorable Message to which he refers, was predicated on a state of things which no one now pretends to have existence: That the Holy Alliance was about to engage in a war not merely against South America, but against all free Governments. Had such a purpose been known to exist, to an extent that would have comprehended our Government, it would have been no difference where they struck the blow; such a war would have been our war; but even in such a case we should not have been willing to have entangled ourselves with any agreements to guarantee the free institutions of South America: for these might have been changed by the people themselves, with which we had no right to interfere. But there is no such case before us now. What are we about to do? If there is any meaning in the language of these documents, one and all, we are to enter into stipulations with the Congress at Panama, that we will resist any interference of the Governments of Europe in the war between South America and Spain, under any circumstances that such a war might arise. Is not this very different? Can we, having a due regard to the peace and happiness and safety of our own country, enter into an agreement that might bind us to engage in a war for any other nation or nations on the face of the earth, whether it was just or not? I am opposed to entering into any stipulations of this nature, and believe we ought to leave the Government free to determine that question, whenever the case shall arise, and not commit ourselves beforehand, as it is proposed to do. Shall we compromise the happiness of this people, and the character of our Government, by stipulating with the Southern American nations that we will go to war with Russia or England for ten or fifteen miles or leagues of the northwest coast? In short, sir, shall we unite our destiny with that of any other nation on the face of the globe? I have never ceased to sympathize with the people of Southern America in their struggle for liberty; there is scarcely a man in this nation who has not sympathized with them; but it does not follow that we shall be carried away by these sympathies to entangle ourselves in their foreign disputes or wars.

It will not be pretended that every nation which has established free institutions, will always act with justice in its disputes. I devoutly wish they may do so; but, in the nature of things, we have no security that they will. But, suppose we enter into the stipulations and "joint declaration" recommended by the President, will the South American Governments be the more likely to act with justice towards other nations? Finding the United States at their back, will it make them more careful to act with justice and prudence in their foreign policy? Power often forgets right, among nations, as well as men, and the stronger we make such combinations the more apt they will be to disregard justice. Our policy is peaceful, and the cardinal virtue of Republican Government should be justice. Whatever compromises these, jeopardizes not only the happiness of a free people, but the character of their Government. I will say nothing in answer to the arguments for this political mission, addressed to our cupidity and love of trade. Every one knows that no commercial treaties can be formed at Panama. That power is expressly reserved from the Congress in the treaties between those States; besides, we have commercial treaties with most of the States already, and no serious difficulties exist in making others.

Why this subject has been introduced I know not, unless to operate upon those who may not have the means of detecting its fallacy. I recur to the question, then, Have we a right, or have we not, to declare our opinion on this great question of policy? If we have no constitutional power to pass this amendment, we commit an act of usurpation; but if we have the power, and consequently the right, those who deny it endeavor, by artificial toils and nets, to embarrass the free deliberations of this House, and are guilty of a flagrant attempt to prostrate its rights and power at the feet of the Executive Department of the Government. One or the other of these conclusions must follow—we have the power and the right, or we have it not.

I will not stop to consider the form of the words proposed to be used for this purpose, nor to examine the constitutional objection to this amendment, urged by the gentleman from Massachusetts, on account of its having the words "being understood" at the head of it. The fear of my vote's "being understood" is no objection with me. It is for that purpose I vote for the amendment. We propose to declare, in a distinct and separate resolution, in respectful terms, the sentiments of this House, and, as we believe, of this nation, on a great subject of national policy, which is also, as has been shown incidentally, connected with our legislative powers; and such a declaration is met, not by a denial of the truth of its propositions, but by the assertion that it is an infringement upon, an invasion of, the Executive prerogatives! Have I not shown that this doctrine is wholly unsound? But I will appeal to the opinion of the President himself, who, I am sure, would not venture to advance the doctrines we have heard on this floor. I am bound to believe, from the evidence contained in his Message, that he thought we ought to express our opinion, not only in general, but in detail; because I must believe that he meant to act candidly and fairly with us, when he submitted this whole subject to the "free determination" of the House of Representatives; that, in his communication, he meant to address this House as a dignified statesman would always address a co-ordinate branch of the Government with which he was connected. I think it derogatory to his character to suppose that he intended we should decide in the gross for or against this measure, without reference to its details.

What would be the incontrovertible inference, under these circumstances, if an overwhelming majority of this House shall negative this proposition, after the manner in which he has submitted this matter to us? Would he not have a right to believe—would not the nation and the world think—that this House were in favor of compromising the future neutrality of the country? Every man of common sense would so understand it. Gentlemen may rest as well as they can upon their nice wire-drawn distinctions; the people of this country will not look to these; they will always look to substance when they want to judge of our acts, and this is the only way in which they can judge of them. They will find our names recorded on the journal either in favor of or against a policy which is intended to commit our future neutrality. With them, too, we shall find that forms are nothing, substance every thing; and gentlemen who incline to vote against the amendment on account of form, will do well to reflect upon the position they will be placed in. These records may rise in judgment against them, and the time may come when the entanglements we are now about to commence will induce our posterity to look back into them, and point with scorn to the names of the men who first sanctioned this scheme of a political connection with foreign countries. The President will stand justified—it will be seen that he submitted the whole question for the "free determination" of the House of Representatives. Whether right or wrong, he consulted both branches of Congress, and they not only sanctioned the measure, but negatived a declaration that we ought to pursue our old policy of avoiding entangling alliances. It will be no excuse to say that this thing was done because members thought it in-delicate to express any opinion; and, in order to justify themselves, construed the President's Message to mean what he never intended, and in contradiction to its most obvious import. I would urge gentlemen to guard with jealous caution every appearance of departure from a policy so deeply interesting and vital to the happiness of this nation. This is not all, sir; the policy now proposed is in direct opposition to the admonitions and farewell advice of the most illustrious man that ever lived. His advice I would almost admit to be conclusive with me in all cases. He had vast and comprehensive views of the interests of his country, and his heart had scarce a throb but for her prosperity. I would think myself very safe in adopting his farewell advice for my political Bible; and to act upon faith on it, without appeal. That great man perfectly understood the dangerous tendency of forming political connections and alliances with foreign nations, and how easy it was, by an entanglement with one nation, to excite the hostility and jealousy of others. He clearly foresaw that such connections could easily involve the nation in war, even without the consent of its Government or the people. A pledge thus given commits the public faith, and the occasion might happen in which there would be no choice for the Government, but to violate the faith of the nation, or go to war. The highest responsibility devolved upon Congress is the power to declare war; but every purpose of the constitution is defeated, if we are involved in war by a pledge of faith or treaty of alliance, in which Congress has not been consulted. But we are told the measures to be negotiated at Panama cannot possibly involve us in war. I put it to the candor of every member who hears me, whether this assumption is not wholly unfounded? Why is it proposed to make a "joint declaration" that no European nation shall interfere between Spain and the South American States? Why is it proposed to stipulate with the South American Governments that we will not permit colonization on our territory? Is it empty wind, or do we intend to fulfil what we promise? If we do, and the case occurs, we must go to war, without being left free to judge of the exigency, or we must violate our national faith. These considerations prove as well the right as the expediency of declaring what we believe to be the true policy of the country. It is therefore our most solemn duty to declare our opinion, whatever it may be; and any attempt to prevent the fulfilment of that duty, by nice hair-splitting technicalities, and such constitutional difficulties as we have heard advanced, I cannot but consider as a most flagrant attempt to prostrate the rights of the people, and of this House, at the feet of Executive power. These doctrines were not taught in the old Republican school, and I trust they will never be current in our country. They not only undermine the foundation of our system, but they are so palpably inconsistent, that some other consideration than their intrinsic merit, must be necessary to induce any one to adopt them. We may declare to the President that he shall make peace. We may declare that any treaty, when made, ought to be abrogated; and we may refuse to carry on war. All these most important powers, the exercise of which is fraught with such hazardous consequences, cannot be denied to us; but we are gravely told that we violate the constitution, if we express any opinion in relation to any one of these subjects. After the danger has occurred, we may apply a remedy to the evil, but we must not give an opinion by way of a preventive! Can any thing be more absurd? On the contrary, I maintain, that the true theory of our Government requires, on all great and momentous questions, that there should be some previous sanction of all the branches, in order to secure its harmonious operation—not in the manner proposed by some gentlemen in this case, but by a "free determination" upon the whole merits of the measure. We have had indeed the semblance of free deliberations proffered to us in this case, but nothing more. According to the doctrines laid down here, it has in fact been more like a snare laid for us, (whether so intended or not,) than any thing else.

The President sends a proposition, inviting our free determination upon it; and when we are about to express our opinion as to the measures he proposes, we are met on the threshold, by his most confidential friends in this House, and told that we must not look into the details of this measure; we must not even look into the documents he has sent us for the evidence of his intentions; we must consider the whole project in gross, and have full confidence in the Executive discretion; and that we will violate the constitution, if we express any opinion different from that of our Committee of Foreign Relations. This is not all. We may consider the propriety of making the appropriation, but subject to the "moral obligation" of voting the supplies to carry into effect whatever the President and Senate may constitutionally do!

If this is "free determination," I am at a loss to understand it. Such may be the appearance on the journals, but it cannot be real; the whole tendency of such doctrines is, to make the Executive power absolute, and prostrate this House at its feet. The President may discuss his measures before us, our committees may discuss them, and make long detailed reports upon all the topics suggested by the President, and express their opinions on each, but this House must not speak, unless it be in an affirmative response to the Executive edict. I am sorry to see so much zeal in support of what I consider a repudiated doctrine, on Executive confidence, and especially from my colleague who spoke on a former occasion, (Mr. WURDELL,) for whose sound republican principles, and for whom, personally, I have very great respect. He, sir, if I am not mistaken, asked if we "would suppose the President would do wrong." [Mr. WURMS explained, that he must have been misunderstood; if he had used such an expression, he only meant that a reasonable confidence must be reposed in each department, that it will do its duty within its sphere; that he did not intend to express any idea of a special confidence in public men.] Mr. I. observed, I am happy to hear the explanation of my colleague; as the remark is now qualified, there is little difference between us on that point. The expression, as I have stated it, was used, though I have no doubt it was a mere slip of the tongue; it only serves however to show the danger of sustaining arguments fundamentally erroneous. If my colleague had not been on the brink of the precipice, he would not have fallen in. I am glad to hear him disavow the principles to which such doctrines lead.

Man is not changed, Mr. Chairman, by time or place: he is still the creature of education and of habit. Remove the means of education, and in a single age the whole human race would sink into savage ignorance. Principles alone can control and fix his habits. Principles are every thing in politics. I would, without claiming any other right to offer advice to my younger friends than that which I may derive from some more experience, warn them not to adopt principles in any case tending to fix erroneous habits of thinking. Principles are every thing in politics. They perform for man, in the political world, what divine institutions do in ethics; they are the great landmarks which must guide us in our path of duty; these alone, can preserve us from the influence of personal feelings or political bias. Principles, I say, are every thing in guiding the mind to determine such questions as this, in which they are so deeply involved. The question is nothing, more or less, than whether this House, the Representatives of the people, shall freely exercise a perfect constitutional right, in declaring their opinion on the great interest of our country. Suffer this right to be prostrated, (for where men adopt false theories for a particular purpose, they are apt to regard them afterwards as true,) I say, suffer this right to be prostrated by such doctrines, and what becomes of our Government? It will soon sink into despotism. The Executive will is every thing—popular will nothing. We must appropriate the people's money, whenever the President demands; and, above all, we must not examine into our foreign affairs: these belong to the Executive prerogatives, although they may affect our destinies more seriously than any other concerns committed to our charge. Let this doctrine be finally established, and we would soon have a Cromwell to turn us out of doors, whenever we might hesitate to obey him.

As long as I shall be trusted by my constituents with a seat on this floor, I will maintain, with all my feeble ability, this power of the House as a sacred trust not to be betrayed, nor the duty under it to be violated by any encroachments whatever, either from without, or the more fatal encroachments from within. Mr. Chairman, it is no less a violation of duty to surrender a power which the public good demands that we should exercise, than it would be to usurp a power. I have considered this point as one of the most important in discussion, and have, therefore, dwelt on it at so much length. In my judgment, the right is a perfect constitutional right, and ought forever to be asserted and maintained as such.

I will now beg leave to add something to what has been so much better said, by others, in relation to the proposed mission to Panama. Can any one doubt, who has read the documents on your table, that a political connection is contemplated with the confederated Governments of Southern America different from the connection we have had with any other Government since the French treaty of 1778? Is not this a new position, a new epoch in the history of our country? May it not lead to consequences which none can now foresee? One of the avowed objects of this mission, is to enter into a stipulation with the Governments at Panama, that we will prevent colonization on our own territories. I would appeal to every member of the committee to say whether this is a fit subject to go abroad to make stipulations about! Can we not take care of our interests without binding ourselves to a foreign country to do it! Was there ever such an itching for mingling in the affairs of foreign countries? We are told, there is no danger of an injurious treaty, as the Senate will have to ratify before it becomes obligatory upon the United States. This may increase the security in this case, but does not relieve us from our proper responsibility. When I consider it my duty to do any act, I will not refrain from it because there is a probability that some one else will do it: but there is another point which cannot be answered by referring the responsibility to the Senate, and I beg the attention of the committee to this subject. I should be glad to hear from some gentleman who may follow me, a precise answer on this point. The President proposes, in his Message communicated to this House, to enter into a "joint declaration" by the Plenipotentiaries of this Government, and the deputies of the confederated Governments of South America at Panama. A joint declaration is to be made in relation to the question of an interference on the part of the Governments of Europe with the Governments of Southern America. And what is a joint declaration? Does this belong to the treaty-making power? The President and Senate may make treaties, but where do we find any power given to the President to authorize the Ministers of the United States to do any thing (much less commit the future neutrality of this country) by any pledge or declaration, or manifesto in connection with a foreign Government, except by treaty? Shall we be told that this declaration will be submitted to the Senate for their ratification? Or is it to be submitted to Congress for some enactment? If it were, it would no doubt come with the usual entanglements which have been contrived to sustain Executive power, viz: The pledge of the public faith, &c., and moral obligation to redeem. But it is not intended to come back for ratification; and can, therefore, be considered in no other light than as a palpable and flagrant usurpation of power; because we cannot find in the constitution any authority given to the Executive to enter into a connection with foreign powers, by "joint declaration." Either of the branches of this Government might, with propriety, declare its opinion on any subject of foreign policy. Such a declaration would, like our enactment of laws, be within our own control. But associate with one or more foreign powers in a declaration of the kind proposed, and it assumes a very different character. It would be a pledge—nothing less than a pledge; binding, if constitutionally made, the honor and faith of this nation; and would, if any case within its possible contemplation should arise, come back upon us with all the force of moral obligation to redeem it. It has been said in this debate, that "when nations speak, they mean something." This is certainly true, and whatever you would say in a "joint declaration," such as is proposed, you would mean to assert and maintain. But if the President had power to make a pledge in that form, it is the worst form which the proposed political connection with the Southern American Governments could assume. It is insidious in its commencement, and contains within it a poison that, however slow in its progress, must, if attempted, endanger the vital interests of our country.

I should be glad to hear what can be said in defence of this part of the scheme at Panama. Mr. Chairman, we ought to be aware of such pledges. Have we not already seen the use which has been made of the Message of the late President in our negotiations abroad? Although it was a declaration unconnected with any foreign nation, and all its purposes completely within our own control, yet it has been used by our Minister at Mexico as a pledge, and it is clear that he has been authorized so to use it by the Department of State, by which it is distinctly spoken of as a pledge, and urged as a reason for insisting upon commercial privileges from Mexico. It is even probable that, in pursuance of these representations, we have now a commercial treaty negotiated with that Government, actually, if not literally, upon the basis of this pledge. If such a declaration as that made by Mr. Monroe can thus be interwoven with and used as a pledge in our foreign negotiations, what would be the character of the pledge which might be made of a Congress composed of Plenipotentiaries from seven or eight Governments?

Reject the amendment under consideration, and sanction this purpose now, and whatever the consequences may be, will you not be told hereafter that the project was submitted to you, and received your sanction; that you have refused to qualify it when the question was distinctly presented, and have thereby given it a form and character which it could not otherwise have had? According to my construction of the Message of the President, he has acted fairly, in inviting our free deliberation on this subject; and, although we may think some of the purposes he has in view to be erroneous and injurious to the country, yet, after he shall have made the stipulations which he has told us he intends to do, we should be much at a loss for an excuse to refuse our aid to carry them into effect. The President would say, I laid the whole matter before you, and you not only gave it sanction generally, but, when the question was presented whether there should be any qualification of, or restraint upon, the measures I had proposed, you declared by your vote there should be none, and thereby sanctioned my whole purpose as I laid it before you. Such would be the language he would hold; and this, added to the doctrines of moral obligation we have heard so much about, would completely conclude us.

Do gentlemen perceive what nets are spread for us? We must trust every thing to Executive discretion; we must not express an opinion, even when asked; and whenever he, by his Ministers, shall pledge the honor and faith of this nation, by treaty, or manifesto, we, the Representatives of the people, to whom are committed the purse-strings of the nation, are bound to appropriate without inquiry. Such doctrines do not belong to my political creed.

I regret that the President has abandoned those principles, in relation to our foreign policy, which I am sure he formerly maintained. I need only refer to the discussion upon the resolution of the Secretary of State, urging the recognition of the independence of the South American States, before they were, in fact, independent, and to the arguments of the Committee of Foreign Affairs, then coinciding with the Department of State, to show that the opinion of the then Secretary of State and present Secretary of State were directly at variance as to our neutral policy. In 1816, the present Secretary of State declared in a speech on the floor of this House that the United States would be justified, by every principle of public law, in embarking in the war between Spain and her colonies; and that we ought to embark in it. The only qualification he used, was, that we ought to have a proper understanding first with other powers. This was, however, only a consideration of expediency, and could not affect the question of right to embark in the war. He must, therefore, be considered as having avowed the policy of embarking in that war. I have not the speech before me, and speak of it only from memory. It is many years since, but I cannot be mistaken. Congress thought differently—the President thought differently—and the next Administration have pursued a very different policy: they would not even recognize, by sending Ministers, till the South American Governments were clearly in possession of the authority in those States. And this policy, no doubt, received the approbation of the then Secretary of State, (now President of the United States.) Here, then, is a question on which these gentlemen were at issue. The present Secretary of State was willing to go to war in 1818 against Spain. He was, of course, willing to incur the same risk in 1818, when he introduced his resolution to recognize the independence of South America. In this he was consistent: I disagreed with him then, as I do now. But he was consistent—he always wanted to have something more to do in that contest than the Administration, or the House of Representatives, or the people of this country were willing to indulge him in. The event has shown that we, and also the South American States, have done very well upon the neutral policy. They have achieved their independence without foreign aid, and we have avoided not only a war with Spain, but we have shown to the world that we will not officiously interfere in the affairs of other nations.

This Government chose its own time for recognition; after the most deliberate consideration, we determined to acknowledge, as we have always done, the Government, de facto, without waiting till it might suit the stubborn character of Spain to acknowledge the independence of her colonies, which she did not do in relation to Holland for near half a century after all attempts at subjugation had seemed fruitless.

I have said there was a difference of opinion between the President and Secretary of State, as to the neutral policy of this country in relation to South America; and the difference between them was this: the former was willing to recognize, when it could be done without just cause of war with the mother country—the latter was quite willing, if not anxious, to take part in that war.

We have been almost forbidden to look into the documents on our table for evidence of facts in relation to this subject; but I will take the liberty of referring to a paper which has not been laid on our tables. It is an article which made its appearance in a paper that was then under an engagement to have the patronage of the State Department, and which now prints the laws “by authority.” This article appeared, when all was quiet in this country, on the subject of embarking in this splendid scheme of a mission to the Confederate Assembly at Panama. It is remarkable, too, that this article appeared about the time of the conversation held at the Department of State, last Spring, with the Ministers of Colombia and Mexico, on the subject of our invitation to that Congress. This article is evidently written with some care, and preases its purpose with both zeal and ability, through a channel devoted to the State Department, and not very friendly to the President. It would not be presuming much upon credulity to suppose that it might have passed under the eye of, if it had not been written by an amanuensis of, the Secretary of State himself. What is it? After adverting to some fact stated in a South American paper, it proceeds thus:

“It has been announced by the Government of Colombia, that a Congress of the States of South America will probably meet at Panama in the course of the present year. Will not these United States be represented there? Will we lose the opportunity of expressing, by an ambassador, at least, our fraternal feelings towards the other inhabitants of the Continent?”

“Let them propose to all the American nations a confederation. The details of so magnificent a work would require long and laborious consideration; but the leading principle should be the establishment of a constitution something like our own, by which an Areopagus or Congress should watch over the mutual relations of the Confederate States; and which would wield the force of the Confederate States in defence of any member that may be attacked; such are the bases which would insure to us power and peace, and secure to the founders praise and gratitude from posterity. It is a practicable plan now. We have, at present, no conflicting interests with one another. The proposed scheme is intended to prevent our ever having them; or, if they should arise, it provides for their amicable arrangement.

“It is objected that foreign nations will view the confederation with jealousy: I answer, first, it will be strong enough to conciliate the good, and regard the rage of unjust men with indifference. Treaties of mere alliance have not hitherto been found sufficient; they have almost always terminated in disgust, and have been broken. Secondly, I answer, that, in modern times, the example has been repeatedly set us. The Holy Alliance is itself an example. The Germanic Confederation as it was, and as it stands, is a case in point. The Confederation of the Rhine another. The former union of the three Crowns of England, Scotland and Ireland, another; as also the former, and perhaps present condition of the dominions of the empire of Austria. The Heptarchy of England, and nearly all the nations of Europe in the dark ages, to say nothing of the Greek Confederation in ancient times. The errors of these examples are before us, to warn us against their repetition, and to instruct us how to organize our confederation.

“This scheme of a general Confederation of the Americas is submitted to the public as a means of securing power abroad and peace and happiness at home. Humanity, policy, and reason, call upon us to rivet the bonds of fraternal affection, &c., and to guard, with a sacred vigilance, against the rupture of a single link. A confederation alone is competent to this duty. Without it we submit to the ordinary fate of other nations: jealousy, discord, and war, whenever any nation thinks itself strong enough to wage one with impunity.”

This article, of which I have read only an extract, finds its way to Washington. It no doubt met the eye of the President, who must have been at that time very much alive to this subject. This splendid scheme of a confederation of the Americas was not suited to his taste; and he, of course, would have no inclination to be moved upon, even by his Secretary, in a matter of that kind. Soon after the article made its appearance in Washington, we find it republished, "by request," in the National Intelligencer, with the comment which I beg leave to read:

April, 1836.]

Mission to Panama.

"We have seen the purposes for which the statesmen and Government of Colombia are said to desire to hold a Congress, or Amphictyonic Council, as it has been called, of the American Governments, to which it is surmised that the United States have been, or are to be, invited to become a party. We cannot permit this proposition to pass without a remark, lest our silence might be taken for assent to it, in any shape; or even for indifference in regard to it, so far as this nation is embraced in it. If the public sentiment be in accord with ours on this point, we shall never send a Representative to any Congress of nations, whose decisions are to be law for this nation. Our own confederacy insures the power and the mode of asserting our own rights, and vindicating our wrongs.

"By an alliance with any other nation or nations, it is obvious we shall not strengthen but expose ourselves. We should lose, by any such alliance, the independence which is our boast. For what is independence but a name, if the question of peace, of war, &c., are to be determined for us, not by the Congress of the United States, but by a stupendous confederacy, in which the United States have but a single vote." "It will be seen that we consider the proposed confederation as intended to possess the power, as well as the name of the ancient council of Amphictyons, having power to cause obedience to its decrees. It is surely not necessary to urge arguments against a departure from that cardinal principle in our foreign intercourse which distrusts and rejects alliances with foreign nations for any purpose." "Every one will see at a glance the vital objections there are to this Government's coupling its destinies with those of any other people on earth."

"The Amphictyons of Greece were a body necessary perhaps in that age, among other objects to keep alive religious institutions, and to protect its oracles. We have no sacred wars to wage, nor occasion for a Holy Alliance to protect either our religious or our political rights. It is no reason, because such a measure has found favor among the nations of Europe, that it should be resorted to by the nations of America."

"We have spoken of the proposed Congress of American Governments as of a confederacy of those nations. If, however, nothing more be meant than a conference of Ministers, &c., to consult upon what the interests of the whole may seem to require, we do not know that we should see any other objection to it, than that it can be productive of nothing beneficial. If such a conference were proposed, perhaps mere courtesy might induce an assent to it on the part of this Government, were it only to assert the doctrine that, in becoming independent of the Metropolitan Governments, the Governments of America ought not, and, as far as respects this people, will not, be independent on one another."

"Against the magnificent scheme of the Philadelphia Mutina, we enter our decided protest. We want not his Areopagus, any more than we do the Amphictyons. For our Areopagus, we are satisfied with our bench of judges; and, for our Council of Amphictyons, we choose our Congress. We desire, in fine, to be members of no confederation but that of the United States."

It is apparent, at a single glance, that this paper was written by some person who had reflected maturely on the subject. It was done when this nation was not dreaming of any schemes being on foot to entangle our destinies with South America at Panama. I would appeal to every one who has paid the least attention to the style of a distinguished functionary of this Government, whether he does not perceive a most striking resemblance to it in the style of this paper. Mr. Chairman, it was written by no every-day scribbler. If, after a comparison, any one shall doubt, I will only say he is more sceptical in his disposition than I will acknowledge myself to be. I will not conceal my belief as to the authorship of the two papers: so far, at least, as to declare that I am convinced that in the Philadelphia paper was written under the eye of the Secretary of State, and that in the National Intelligencer under the eye, if not by the pen, of the President himself. I pretend not to have any other evidence of this fact than what will be found in the articles, the circumstance of their appearance, and the known opinion of these two gentlemen on the subject discussed in the papers; I will not, therefore, be suspected of having betrayed any confidence in relation to any supposed knowledge of their authorship. I will only add, that the last contains more good sense, upon a subject somewhat intricate, than I have ever seen comprised in so small a space. It is, in my judgment, one of the ablest papers that I ever put my eye upon. If I am correct in my supposition as to the authorship, these two papers will give us the free and untrammelled opinions of the two statesmen at the head of the Executive Department of the Government at that time. These opinions are not more opposite than they were known long since to have been, in regard to our connection with South America; but here they are presented in distinct and undisguised colors, clearly exhibited and easy to be understood. The Secretary is for a magnificent scheme of confederation of the Americas in the grand assembly at Panama. "Treaties of mere alliance will not do." Then he runs over the examples of grand Congresses in modern times: at the head of these is the "Holy Alliance" of the European continent! Excellent example! And at the tail, the heptarchy of England! "The errors of these examples," says he, "are before us, to warn us against their repetition, and to instruct us how to organize our confederation." But we find the President protesting, in the most decided terms, against the magnificent scheme of the Secretary. They appear to have been, in fact, as opposite as the Antipodes. We shall presently see how they are brought together. The first movement made by the Secretary was his conversation with Mr. Obregon and Mr. Salazar, which, he carefully tells us, was held, at their instance, at the Department of State. The result of this verbal conference is to procure a sort of invitation, or, rather, an inquiry, whether it would be agreeable to the United States to be invited. The Secretary received it with great complaisance, but somewhat coyish, no doubt. He reports the matter to the President, who desires to know the "objects of the Congress and its mode of organization and action;" and, if these preliminary matters could be arranged, the President was willing to send Ministers to Panama. The answer of the President was communicated to Mr. Obregon and Mr. Salazar verbally, (I could wish it had been in writing, and then there could have been no mistakes or misunderstandings about it.) These gentlemen write home to their Governments, and, on the 2d and 3d of November, they inform the Secretary of State of having received further instruction to give us an invitation to the Congress. Mr. Salazar informs him of the objects which it was expected we would take a part in the consideration of: but he says not a word on the subject of the "organization and mode of action" of the Congress, not any more than if it had never been presented to his attention. He seems to understand that, if the President approved of the subjects to be discussed, he would send a Minister to represent the United States at the Congress; no other condition is adverted to upon which the invitation was accepted.

Mr. Obregon seems to have understood this verbal communication of the Secretary somewhat differently, viz: That the only condition of our acceptance was, "that our neutrality with Spain should not be violated, and that the President should be informed of the affairs with which the Congress was to be occupied, and of the uniformity of the credentials or authorization of the respective Representatives:"—now the condition required by the President was, that the preliminary points, including the mode of organization and action, "should be satisfactorily arranged," and not, as Mr. Obregon supposes, that he should merely be informed of them. There is an evident misunderstanding between them. Mr. Obregon does not even seem to know the conditions required by the President: for he does not advert to them at all; neither he nor Mr. Salazar says a word about "the mode of organization and action," in the Congress, nor afford any evidence that such an inquiry had been made by the Secretary of State. Nor do we yet know any thing on that subject; although the organization of the body must determine whether it is a confederation or a diplomatic council. We are, to this moment, wholly in the dark on this important point, whether it acts by the common will of a majority, or two-thirds, or three-fourths, or whether unanimity is required. This was evidently a serious difficulty; but no explanation had arrived on the third of November, and there was no time to be lost. But this difficulty was got over in some way. After deliberating twenty-seven days, the President agreed to waive all his objections to the organization of an Areopagus, or Amphictyonic league, and determines to consider the assembly as merely "consultative" in the first instance. (I regret this qualification. If he should adapt the instructions of our Ministers to such a body, and it should turn out to be a confederated body, acting by a common will, voting by a majority, or two-thirds, &c., what will he then do? Will he send the Ministers into the assembly, and suffer the interests of this people to be voted upon by a foreign Congress?) This is the President's first waiver in this contest with his Secretary. Now let us see what advance the Secretary makes to meet him. He has apparently waived his magnificent scheme of "confederating the Americans," and is content to make some treaty-stipulations: and what are these? Mere entering wedges! Yes, sir, I beg attention to the words, mere entering wedges, to open the way by degrees for future operations. I want to see no such entering wedges in the hands of a man who combines so much of qualities rarely combined, viz. temerity and perseverance. But the President does not consent, after the debates in the Senate, to make treaty stipulations, involving our neutrality. They finally agree, however, to propose a stipulation that each country will defend its own territory from foreign colonization, and to make a joint declaration about European interference in the affairs of South America. This, it was supposed, could do no harm; and here these two very distinguished statesmen have come together, and this is what we are called upon to spend $100,000 of the public money for, in order to make our appearance at the splendid Congress at Panama.

The President seems to think he has rendered the measure harmless, and the Secretary is satisfied with having secured his entering wedges. But there is one point to which I beg the attention of the committee, because it is yet unsettled. The President, in every communication on the subject, promises not to "commit our neutrality;" when the Secretary speaks on this subject, he always uses the words "present neutrality." Now, we know that a stipulation of alliance, offensive and defensive, to take effect in any future struggle, would not commit our present neutrality; but it might commit, most dangerously, our future neutrality. There is, then, a difference between the two expressions, which is intended to mean something.

I have said that the documents do not show any evidence of entire reconciliation on this point. Now let us see who has gained his point. The Secretary of State writes a circular to Messrs. Salazar, Obregon, and Oana, informing them of the acceptance of the invitation, upon the terms, and for the purposes proposed by them, in the following words: "He (the President) has therefore resolved, should the Senate give their advice and consent, to send Commissioners to the Congress at Panama. Whilst they will not be authorized to enter upon any deliberation, or concur in any acts, inconsistent with the present neutral position of the United States, and its obligations, they will be fully empowered and instructed upon all questions likely to arise in the Congress, on the subjects in which the nations of America have a common interest."

APRIL, 1826.]

Mission to Panama.

[H. OF R.]

This is a letter purporting to have been written by direction of, and under the inspection of, the President himself; whether it was so, I know not; but it is a formal declaration of the position our Ministers are to assume at the Congress, and a copy of it is, before this time, with the Governments of Mexico, Colombia, and Guatemala. It contains no reservation as to objects affecting our future neutrality; and I take it for granted, from this material fact, and from every thing on that subject, throughout the whole documents, that it is intended to adopt measures which may, and probably will, affect the future neutral relations of this country. Now, if the case was presented for my solemn determination at this moment, I would rather commit the present neutrality of this nation, by immediately embarking in the war between Spain and South America, than to form any entangling alliance, or stipulation, which would oblige us to embark in war hereafter, the merits of which I could not now determine on. Before I would consent to pledge this country in any war, even of our own, I would be sure that we had justice on our side; and how much less willing should we be to commit ourselves in a future war, in defence of a foreign country, without the possibility of such an assurance!

Mr. Chairman, although this question seems to remain unsettled between the President and his Secretary, my belief is, that the President disinclines to commit the present or future neutrality of the country. But not so with the Secretary: he, in perfect consistency with his whole policy, would hazard both, if it would aid him in accomplishing his grand scheme of confederating the two Americas, by which, as his Mutius says, we should acquire so much "power abroad." Sir, we do not want any power abroad, except that moral power which justice and neutral policy, and a faithful attention to our concerns at home, will give us. I, therefore, will not vote for an unqualified approbation of this mission. I have no difficulty about the question of appropriation. I will not, so far as my vote will prevent it, surrender the powers vested in this House by the constitution. If I did, I should betray the interests of the people who sent me here, whose approbation, connected with a consciousness of having faithfully performed my duty to them, is the highest reward I can desire.

In my judgment, the material question to be decided is, whether we will approve of the purposes avowedly intended to be effected at Panama, as appears by the documents, at the hazard of an entanglement, which no one can see the end of! I have shown, I think, to the satisfaction of every one who hears me, that the President and Secretary of State have been at variance themselves on the subject, and that their own deliberate views were so opposite, as to be utterly irreconcilable, upon any rule or principle of action: and hence it is we find, throughout the whole of these documents, purposes and doctrines so incoherent, incongruous, ambiguous, and incomprehensible. I venture to say, and will appeal for the truth to any candid, dispassionate man in this House, or out of it, to say whether he believes such another medley was ever presented to any deliberative body, in an enlightened age. Well may gentlemen try to sneer at us, or in any other way put us out of the notion of looking into these documents. One thing only is certain in them: that is, the evidence of a deliberate purpose to adopt a new policy for this country, by forming a political connection with the South American nations. To this purpose, in whatever shape it may be presented, I never can give my consent—and I object to it, not much more on account of its changing our old and settled policy, than on account of the doctrines which have been advanced to sustain it, and without which doctrines it could not receive fifty votes in this House.

The doctrines asserted to defeat this amendment, are the same identical doctrines which prevailed in, and were the cause of, "the reign of terror." They are based upon the idea of Executive infallibility, and that of the duty of the House of Representatives to support, by approval, when that might be necessary, every act incidentally involved in the Executive duties. We are told, in this republican age, that this House must not speak about our foreign policy—because it belongs to the Executive; and that, when he speaks, we must obey. Sir, these are doctrines suited better for tyrants and slaves than freemen. Let them once be sanctioned, and a single step farther will make another sedition law: for, if we have no right to speak on public measures, it is but another step to say the people have no right to speak, and if they have no right to speak, you have a right to stop them from speaking. Such is the course of reasoning which led to the encroachment on liberty in the day of that famous law. I refer not to the reign of the first Adams, that dark period of our history, with any pleasure: far from it; but to look for beacons to warn us of the dangers which surround us.

Is it not true that some gentlemen are looking for a revival of the principles which predominated in that day? What did the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. WEBSTER) mean, when he, in a tone of significant complaint, said, the gentleman from Delaware was the last man in the House from whom he would have expected the avowal of the opinions urged in support of this amendment? Mr. Chairman, is it come to this, in the first year of this new era, that we shall hear the old repudiated doctrines of '98, which have been buried for a quarter of a century, boldly revived and reasserted! I would be glad to know what the gentleman from Massachusetts meant by the rebuke, unless he thought he had some claims on the gentleman from Delaware, as a disciple of those repudiated doctrines. I do not know that the gentleman from Delaware ever avowed such opinions; but I do know, there was a time when these gentlemen pursued different roads, and which, in my judgment, involved an unerring test of public virtue; and beyond that period, I do not wish to go to find party distinctions. I can find a sufficient test there, for my political friendships. In the late war—the second war of Independence—when we were contending with the most powerful nation of the earth; the enemy laying waste every village, and even cottage, within the reach of his power; when fiscal embarrassments pressed heavy upon us; when, in fact, the country was bleeding at every pore, the gentleman from Delaware had shouldered his musket, and marched to meet and fight the enemies of his country, as did my honorable colleague, (Mr. BUCHANAN,) and many others of the same political faith.

But, Mr. Chairman, I ask, where then was the gentleman from Massachusetts? I can tell you, sir. I was a member of the same Congress with him. Many of my constituents, and those of my colleagues, were suffering every thing which the human constitution could endure, braving the enemy on the northern frontier, or blanching in cold and comfortless tents on the shores. Their sufferings were aggravated by the want of the common necessities of life. I speak from knowledge and experience, and not at random, when I say, that the gentleman from Massachusetts was then engaged, not only in withholding the supplies, but literally lashing with pinions the arms of the brave defenders of his country, and in devising every means which his capacious mind could conceive to resist a vigorous prosecution of the war; identified with every combination and faction, Hartford Convention and all, to unnerve the arm and weaken the power of the Government, when the enemy was at our doors, and his bayonet at our breast. Sir, the gentleman stood in the same relation to the domestic enemies of his country then, that he now does to most of the opponents of this amendment. He was their Magnus Apollo! To him they looked for guidance in every movement; he had only to wave his hand, and they obeyed the signal. But the country triumphed without his aid; the war terminated in a blaze of glory. The nation still feels, and, I trust, will never cease to feel, the beneficial consequences of the heroism displayed in that war. But none of these feelings found a place in the breast of the orator at the laying of the foundation stone of the Monument of Bunker's Hill! Ill-fated Bunker Hill! Illustrious mound! consecrated to virtue, liberty, and love of country! Thy glory was perfected! Alas! that it should have been stained by an oration on thy summit, in which all the glorious achievements of the second war of Independence were carefully remembered to be forgotten! Can I, while I feel the responsibility of my station; can I, knowing these things, be expected to act upon faith with the gentleman? No, sir! I cannot be led away by the sympathies of any man for foreign countries, who had so little for his own in the hour of her greatest perils. Sir, we have heard much about faction; not, indeed, within these walls, except in the form of echo. According to my understanding of the word, there is no sin tolerated by human laws which I do so much abhor and abominate. Mr. Chairman, a whipper-in, whose father and brother have lately received distinguished appointments from the present Administration, has sought, with what success I know not, to pay the family debt, by denouncing as a factionist every member in either House who is disposed, in time of profound peace, to "deliberate," when the Executive calls upon him to "act." Mr. Chairman, the charge of "faction, unprincipled faction," comes with an ill grace from such a family. The father was one of the fathers of a factious combination, during the late war, not less wicked in its motives than the Hartford Convention itself in its worst aspect. He opposed, in the other branch, with all his power, and most insidiously too, every measure intended to give vigor to the prosecution of the war. Another member of the family, a brother, was a member of this House at that time, and he declared upon this floor that the then President of the United States (one among the most virtuous and intelligent men of this or any other age) "deserved a halter!"

I regret, in the course of my public duties, to be under the necessity of thus referring to the conduct of a man, venerable by age, and highly respectable for his early services; but the conduct of public men is always a proper subject for animadversion, and I act on the defensive. Are we to sit in silence, when assailed from such a quarter as a faction, "an unprincipled faction," because, when the great interests of the country are under our consideration, we choose to examine them for ourselves, as it is our perfect right and solemn duty to do? I may be excused, I hope, for indulging some sensibility under such a charge. I have seen, and therefore know, something about faction. I do not recur to these recollections through any feeling of malevolence, but to point where the beacons are that will guard us from some dangerous rocks and shoals, in the way of our voyage of life. I well remember when faction reared her haggard mien within this House, and had determined that nothing should satisfy her vindictive rage but the expulsion, per fas aut nefas, of every public functionary from the Departments of the Government, or that they should stipulate to take into the Cabinet a majority of the worthy factionists themselves. That was faction! It was in the most gloomy period of the war. Every heart which had a spark of patriotism was anxious for the cause of the nation. Many, who had been opposed to the declaration of the war, had then determined to defend the country. Such was the disposition of a great number of the Opposition, especially in the Middle and Southern States; but, as the clouds of adversity lowered on us, faction reared her crest still higher. The greater the difficulties and dangers, the more bold and arrogant was she.

I cannot dismiss this subject without advert- ing to an incident in that period of our history never to be forgotten. New Orleans, the Key of our Western Empire, was invested by the most formidable army that had ever placed a hostile foot on our shores. The only defence was a mere handful of raw militia, led on indeed by one of the most gallant men that ever lived! yet provided with nothing for a vigorous defence, but the force of his genius, and their own strong arms and patriotic hearts. Congress was in session; we were waiting in the most anxious suspense, apprehending a most fearful catastrophe. Two weeks passed away without a mail. The factionists had predicted what they wished to be true, that Jackson was defeated, and New Orleans sacked. At length the glorious news arrived; the letters to the War Department were sent to the chamber of the House of Representatives early in the morning, and read in one of the committee rooms, over and over and over again, to the successive throngs that crowded in to hear the joyous news. When this scene was over, the members returned to the hall: the different parties then occupied different sides of the House. On the one side was a scene of inces- sant greetings, salutations, and congratulations, approaching to ecstasy. On the other—sat faction! Yes, gloomy faction! with dark and lowering brow, pondering in sullen silence upon the causes and consequences of this death-blow to her last hope. Sir, no human tongue can describe that scene, as it now presents itself to my memory. If I could, I would gladly forget every thing on one side of the picture, while I would cherish, to my latest breath, every thing on the other. But, sir, while these recollections remain, it is impossible that I can consent to sacrifice any interest of my country, because I may dislike the men who may happen to be in power. Neither can I put myself in the wake of any men, associated with the most wicked factionists of that day, and seeking to entan- gle our country in a foreign alliance, by way of a "speculative experiment" to divert public attention from their own political sins.

Mr. AROHER.—The President had said that objects of the highest importance, in reference to the general welfare of the human race, and bearing on our own specially, would engage the attention of the Congress at Panama; that the lapse of many centuries might probably fail to present an occasion so favorable for the ad- vancement of some of the most essential of those objects; that "among the topics to be present- ed for discussion, there was scarcely one in which the results of the meeting will not deeply affect the interests of the United States." And yet, what does he allege as the primary induc- ement to the deputation of the mission? A com- pliment—a manifestation of courtesy to the new States of South America. This would be with him a sufficient reason for the rejection of the measure. He could not consent to institute a mission of this delicacy, to be confided to the discretion of an officer who held language of this sort. The manifestation of courtesy to the new States of South America! And where was this manifestation of courtesy to end! Had we not been the first to recognize these States— sent Ministers before they were received—ne- gotiated with Spain, with all the great European powers, to obtain the recognition of their inde- pendence? Is further evidence required? He was afraid, that by multiplying endorsements on our bill, we should bring our credit into hazard. He would admit that objects of importance were connected with the mission, and there was a remark of general application to them. Why not pursue the usual obvious mode of separate negotiation with the several States, instead of negotiation in Congress? This last mode had undoubtedly a less degree of facility to recom- mend it. With three of the most considerable of the new powers, we have effected treaties by the former mode, embracing all the objects we had proposed. Why deviate from a method which had been thus successful, or distrust its results, in relation to the remaining States? The President had informed us of the auspicious re- sults and promise of the mode of negotiation we had been pursuing, yet, in the same breath, re- commends this mission. What reasoning was there in this? Consider the several objects sug- gested. To obtain regular information of the proceedings of the Congress. To supply a defi- nite explanation of our views and policy. These were proper objects. Did they require our par- ticipation in the proceedings of the Congress, and engagements in the questionable course of its policy? commercial arrangements, and the adjustment of the doctrine of blockade? The former, as far as we had proposed, had already been attained, or were in a certain course of at- tainment, by ordinary negotiation; and on the subject of blockade, no adjustment was required. There had been no contest on the principle, amid all the contention which the application had occasioned. The controversy related to the application only. The just doctrine was per- fectly understood—threatened with no distur- bances, and had been recognized without heat.

tation by the only one of the new States with which a question had arisen on the subject. Then no Congress was wanted to settle this matter.

But there are reserves. The Slave Trade and the island of Hayti. There is no gentleman on this floor who does not believe the policy of this country on these points should be inexorably fixed, without reference to other objects or other nations. By relaxing our policy on these subjects, we shall bring a moral and political contagion into our country. We can only act with an exclusive reference to our own peculiar views. Why should not the South American nations admit Haytien vessels and black Ministers? They have or may recognize the independence of that island, and are influenced by none of those objections which have weight with us. What ground of objection can we have? How can we then, situated—fettered as we are, ask them to go into negotiations on these points? We cannot change our policy: where then is the advantage of negotiation, where the fairness? Shall we ask them to change their policy? Can any fair and reasonable man consent to go into the Congress of Panama to deliberate on this subject?

Again: as to Cuba and Porto Rico. Some gentlemen, who are said to be in opposition to this mission, say, we ought not to go into discussion on these points, because our Government stands committed. Mr. Clay has stated, in official communications, that, whilst we could not see with indifference the transfer of these islands to any European power, neither could we be justified in opposing their acquisition by one of the South American States by a lawful operation of war. It was affirmed, on the other hand, that these pledges were of no force; that in reference to obvious and high considerations of interest, we should do wrong to suffer the South American Governments to seize these islands. Both by those who are opposed to this measure, and those who defend it, we are shown to be in a situation in which we cannot act in relation to those islands. It would be an insult to send Ministers under these circumstances. He did not see, however, that we are committed on this subject either to one course or another. He denied that there is any settled principle which is referable to this subject. Our policy should vary according to circumstances. Ought we to allow a transfer of these islands to any European power? If the power to which they are transferred be a weak power, we could have no objection. Again: as to the mode of transfer. If the transfer be made by a lawful mode, who would say we ought to interfere to prevent the cession of these islands? How could doctrine of this character be maintained? Let a case be stated to exemplify it: Suppose that Spain should enter into a treaty with France, by which France should say to her, you shall give up those islands, and we will then withdraw our troops from your territory, and permit you to remodel your political constitution on a basis of freedom." Who would consent to condemn Spain to such slavish subservience as to compel her to refuse such an offer? Who would consent to tell her she is not at liberty to make such terms? He knew, nor could conceive of any authority which could be shown for such an infringement of the right to transfer territory on the part of the lawful possessor. If Spain transfer these islands, shall we adopt a course which is in opposition to the principles and practice of public law and justice? Can we remodel the laws of nations so as to make them conform exclusively to our views and interests? We ought not to do so if we could. With his consent we would not attempt to do so. There is no danger so great, so much to be dreaded, as the perpetration of injustice to a power weaker than ourselves. If there was any man who could hold the opinion that this course is to be defended, he would not hold this opinion. Such was not the opinion which could be reconciled with interest any more than justice or generosity. The Secretary of State did not see how we could prevent this transfer to the South American States, if made by lawful operation of war. On the contrary, there were gentlemen on this floor who had spoken of resistance in this event—who had said we ought to resist any attempt to take possession of these islands by the South American Governments. He was not prepared to say, when these Governments had but one way of wounding their adversaries, and that was by taking possession of these islands, that we ought to interfere to prevent it. If, according to their own view of their own policy and their own interests; if, with a view to facilitate their ultimate triumph, and the recognition of their independence, they should think fit to proceed in this way, it would be the mere violence of power for us to say to them that they should not so proceed. He could not see how such a proceeding would interfere fatally with our interests; he did not see how it came in such perilous conflict with our policy. If, however, it does; if its tendency was to set up a formidable power within a league of our own shores; if it would set up on our immediate frontier a threatening, powerful, and petrifying despotism; even under such aggravated circumstances, he would not say to a weaker power, "Because we are strong, and you are weak, I will check your lawful course, and defeat your fair purposes." No. Perish the Southern States—perish rather the country to which he belonged! Perish all that was near and dear to him in heart and hope, before he would hold language so selfish and unmanly—the language of such a cold and withering tyranny.

We ought not, then, to go to Panama. By the one party it is argued that we are committed on one side, and therefore ought not to go; by the other party it is contended that we are committed on the other side, and therefore ought not to go. He was of opinion that we stand uncommitted on all sides, and therefore we ought not to go, to commit ourselves. Suppose that Great Britain should, by unjust means, obtain possession of these islands, are we prepared, even in this event, to make resistance? What is the true character of our policy? Suppose Spain should cede the islands, to Great Britain, shall we say to her, "You must not negotiate on this point?" Suppose that Great Britain should refuse to listen to any suggestions or remonstrances of ours, and should say she will hold these islands: what can we do! Shall we go to war? Should we threaten—announce our intention to go to war in that event! A threat we might have to fulfil, an intention we might be under the necessity of renouncing. Are our means, our resources such as would justify us in rushing into a war on such grounds? When we go to war, or when we assume a tone of war, we expect to profit by going to war. By going to war, in this case, we should only make bad worse; because we should not be equal to Great Britain. We are only an equal competitor to Great Britain in a just war. If we should choose to hold a language or conduct of dictation to this power, no sagacity was required to predict the result. We should lose Cuba and Porto Rico—have to sustain the formidable expenses of the contest; and, added to these, the injury which we know, from recent events, so well how to appreciate, resulting from the sacrifice of our commerce and industry, and the agitation and ravage of our coasts. He was disposed to act, not by the rule laid down by the Secretary of State, in his correspondence, but the plain, common sense rule, which ought in all events to regulate our course. He would act, and be left free to act, according to circumstances, and would never go as a volunteer into a war from which no advantage could possibly result. A constant and attentive regard should undoubtedly be paid to the fate of the Spanish islands. Negotiations should be kept perpetually alert, to prevent a disposal of them which might be thought to threaten our interests. There were possible contingencies in which a resort to force, or the menace of force, to effect the object, might be advisable as well as just. But the uncertainty of the occurrence, as well as composition of these contingencies, required that our hands should be kept unbound, to be extended in the direction which our interests might demand. Accession to the joint negotiation proposed must either prove entirely futile, or have the effect to tie them up, and was therefore on every consideration inadvisable. As far as we have gone along, then, he saw no sufficient considerations to lead us to become parties to this Congress. We had no object to ask, and therefore should abstain from it. Our objects had been obtained, or were in a course of certain attainment; or our policy was fixed, not open to negotiation—or they were no objects to us. He would forbear any critical review of all the objects which had been presented. It would be difficult in regard to some of them, without a departure from deference to the President. The abolition of private war on the ocean, and propagating a better system of religious faith in South America, were examples. He classed these objects together, as belonging, in his conception, to a common character. The abolition of private war on the ocean! The affectation of the phrase was indication enough of the character of the object. Why not call it by its known and proper name of privateering? And why abolish this form of its operation, if war were to continue? What were the superior recommendations of its operation on the persons of the parties to it, rather than their property? Did not a wholesome humanity, as well as reason, demand both modes of operation, as multiplying the facilities to the termination of it, as well as the motives to forbearing from it? And if war were to prevail, why not, in reference to a principle of justice as well as policy, permit the participation of individual enterprise in its incidental advantages?

Mr. SAWYER, rose and said: Menas came and whispered to Pompey, that he now had it in his power to become master of the world, as the two sovereigns were on board his ship, nearly unattended, and immersed in wine: and if he would but say the word, he would cast off, put to sea, and throw them overboard. Pompey told him he ought to have done it without, as now he could not be guilty of so great a breach of trust: So, if the President had secretly ordered Mr. Anderson, who was in that neighborhood, to be present at this Congress of Panama, as an agent, I would have disregarded it; but now I cannot sanction a formal embassy of two Ministers, at an expense of forty thousand dollars, to proceed there openly, in face of all the world, professedly to do nothing, "or merely to set forth our reasons for declining any proposals for specific measures." It must attract the notice of foreign powers; it will excite their jealousy; they will believe that such an imposing mission is intended for some purpose, and that we have abandoned that neutral ground which we have so long occupied. This mission will be worse than useless. It is not a place to enter into commercial treaties; we have enough of them already with those powers—and what advice can we now offer them that will avail? They have all formed their constitutions; their Governments are in the full tide of successful experiment; and any advice that we might now offer them, as the fruits of our experience, would be too late. This Congress of Panama is intended entirely for the deliberation of this great Confederacy, on the subject of their military operations, contingents, questions growing out of their foreign and domestic relations, which are peculiarly interesting to themselves, and which they may be presumed to be better acquainted with than we are. Now, whatever may be resolved on that may have a bearing upon any foreign or neighboring power, we shall come in for a share of responsibility, if we have Ministers there. For, if we do but advise, that will be sufficient to implicate us in those transactions, and jeopardize us with those powers with whom we may come in collision—with Spain, Brazil, France, or the whole together—which might involve us in war, and ultimately plunge us into the vortex of European politics. The acceptance of this invitation was most unadvised and hasty. Our modern Alexander has jumped over the walls, among the enemy, without his army; and has received some dangerous wounds to his political life, before they could come up to his rescue: and now we are called on to interpose our shields, to risk ourselves to extricate him from his danger, to divide it with him. I, for one, have not sufficient confidence to venture.

We have a Congress of our own: let us attend to that, and we shall have enough to do. We were no party to those wars which paved the way to this Congress, and can have no more right to a voice there than in the Turkish Divan. And shall we establish a political lecture-room, or college, alongside of them? Shall we assume the profession of teachers? If we do, I hope they will pay us. But we should first be satisfied that we are entitled to this preference in the science of Government and the administration of political affairs, before we act the universal pedagogue. To be sure, in the art of President-making we stand unrivalled, and are justly entitled to a patent right, provided we can find any nation disposed to purchase a privilege. For I am sure that no other nation would have found out that, from the "three highest" on the list, was meant the lowest.

A decent excuse, not "a cold repulse," against the acceptance of this invitation, would have satisfied those powers who made it. I believe that it was merely intended as complimentary. From the relations we bore to those powers, and to the rest of the world, they could not have supposed that we would have taken part in it in good earnest. And yet it seems that our Solomons, who have had so much experience in the ways of the world, and in the forms and ceremonies of Courts, have taken in downright seriousness this joke, or expression of empty politeness. But, even admitting they were in earnest, yet the correspondence between these Ministers and Mr. Clay (which I will not detain the House by reciting) shows that they would not have been offended had we declined the offer. So far from it, they express some uneasiness, or fear their overture might give offence to us, and require, beforehand, to know whether such an invitation would be acceptable. If, therefore, we can give no offence by refusing, and may give it by accepting—if we can render those nations no service by our counsels, but may render ourselves much disservice by offering them, I can see but one reason why we should sanction it, and that motive is, to minister to Executive patronage. The great States are to be conciliated: for you find all the appointments of note made from the largest States:

New York, the first Minister to Europe: Pennsylvania, a member of the Cabinet, and a Minister to Panama; Ohio, the fourth officer of the Government, and a mission to Peru; Virginia, two members of the Cabinet. Does not all this go to show a deliberate attempt to seduce the powerful States from their integrity? Yes, and I will engage they see it themselves, and are prepared to treat it as it deserves. After waiting near two months for this information, what have we? A commentary upon the Carthaginian and Prussian treaties; the last of which has been dwelt on with filial partiality and vanity, and which has been of about as much use as the first. I feel competent to decide for myself; and can truly say, there is nothing proposed to be gained at this Congress of Panama, but what either has been, or may be obtained, in the ordinary channels of negotiation; but that we may lose by it our peace, our respectability, and perhaps our independence. We already have Ministers to all those powers; and I am sure the instructions to Mr. Anderson, which are ingrafted into those of other Ministers, were sufficiently full to enable him to enter into treaty stipulations on all the points proposed to be discussed at this Congress. I cannot see, therefore, on what account these Ministers are to be charged, unless it be on the principle of the tailor, who charged for a suit of clothes, then for a coat, waistcoat, and breeches. In a similar way, it is attempted to double our Executive patronage under the diplomatic head, which is about as fair, in a moral point of view, as it is wise in a political.

It is not my purpose at this time to make a long speech. There is a regulation which prevails in the estates or Parliament of Hanover, which I would recommend for our adoption: that is, when a member appears to be wearying the House by a long speech, the President shall put him in mind, "durus er sich kurs fac;" that brevity is the soul of wit. So, the least said on this occasion, the better, and the least said, the best.

Mr. WORTHINGTON then rose, and addressed the committee as follows:

Before I consider the immediate objects of the mission, I shall notice some objections which present themselves at the threshold of the inquiry. Of this character, is a pledge alleged to have been given, upon certain points of great public concern; and the hazard to which we expose our neutrality by sending Ministers to the Congress of Panama. This supposed pledge is contained in a declaration of President Monroe, in his message to Congress in 1823, and in the instructions to our resident Minister in Mexico, and in conversations between that Minister and the functionaries of the Government near which he resides. The Message of Mr. Monroe was communicated to Congress at the time when the great powers of continental Europe were carrying into effect measures previously concerted to prevent the growth and extension of liberal principles in the west of Europe. It was seriously apprehended by many in this hemisphere, of whom Mr. Monroe was one, that the same powers would forcibly interfere between Spain and her former colonies, and if they succeeded in crushing the spirit of liberty in that quarter, they would next, in the plenitude of their power, attempt to extend the system of legitimacy to us. An undertaking of this kind might not have appeared to them, as some thought, so hazardous and difficult as many objects they had accomplished. As far as they had acted in concert, they had achieved all their enterprises. They had wrested the sceptre of Charlemagne from the giant grasp of Napoleon. They had extinguished the rising flame of liberty in Piedmont and Naples, and placed upon the head of the Austrian monarch the iron crown of Lombardy. They had considerably enlarged their own territory, and erected new kingdoms out of the fragments of provinces and former republics. They had restored all the branches of the house of Bourbon to the thrones of their ancestors, and they were anxious to reinstate the Spanish branch in its ultra-marine possessions. By their joint efforts and their joint counsels, they had effected wonders in Europe in support of what they termed legitimate Governments, and they vainly thought they could extend their principles to the southern part of this continent. They were opposed to what they called anarchic and revolutionary principles, everywhere, and of this character they conceived to be those of the Spanish American States. If they could have succeeded, in the South, in putting down principles cognate with our own, it was strongly apprehended they would next turn their arms against us, and although they could not subdue us, they might give us much trouble, and put us to great expense. Nor was this considered a vain apprehension by many politicians of that day. The power of Napoleon was so firmly established—France, as if sown with the dragon's teeth, and presenting the aspect of an intrenched camp, was so strongly fortified, as to induce the belief that no human power could penetrate her frontier; yet, notwithstanding this military array, notwithstanding the intrepid character of the French population, notwithstanding the super-human genius of the chief by whom they were led to battle, in the lapse of a few months this iron colossus was dashed to pieces, and France, whose influence had been felt from the Rhine to Lake Ladoga, was compelled to pass under the yoke, and to receive the same person as her master, whom, twenty years before, she had evicted from her soil as unworthy of her allegiance. Having performed these martial feats against a people so renowned, they were vain enough to imagine they could compass any thing. The year before the Message of Mr. Monroe, they had been in friendly and confidential consultation at Verona, and were suspected to have matured measures, hatched in secret and in the dark, against the liberty and independence of the Spanish American States; and a part of their system had been actually developed by the invasion of Spain under the banner of France. But, in consequence of the Message, and the protest, of a similar character, on the part of England, it is thought, by many, they were deterred from an armed interference in the affairs of Spanish America.

Mr. Chairman, the ostensible object of the Holy Alliance was, to manage the concerns they had in charge in conformity to the Christian religion. But, shortly after the formation of this league, symptoms of political regeneration made their appearance, and assumed an alarming aspect in all the west of Europe; and this sacred league, professing to have Christianity for its buttress and its guide, was suddenly diverted from its ostensible purpose, and directed against the progress of liberal principles; or, as they termed them, revolution and illegitimacy. At Troppau and Laybach, they openly avowed their determination to put down revolution wherever it should appear—even among nations of acknowledged independence. This system, it is true, was confined to Europe, but it was not known how soon it might be extended to the American continent; and hence the declaration of the late President, that we could not view with indifference the attempt, by any European power, to oppress our sister Republics, or interfere in their domestic affairs. This declaration ought not to have been viewed as a pledge. It is well known that the President has no authority to pledge this nation to any course of foreign policy, except through the treaty-making power. The declaration, then, however it might have been viewed by foreign powers, was, in reference to our constitution and laws, a brutum fulmen, and of no more binding effect upon us, than the edicts of Fez or Constantinople. In making this observation, it is not my intention to censure the late President for using this language, if it was intended by him that Congress should express an opinion upon the subject; or that foreign nations should be apprised of his individual opinion as to the course we ought to pursue in the contingency contemplated. But this declaration of his sentiments created no obligation on this nation. Had the contingency occurred, we would have been bound, neither in morality nor honor, to carry the declaration into effect, or to redeem any pledge, had he made one not sanctioned by the constitution. If any President were to make a pledge in a form unknown or unwarranted by the constitution, he would be obnoxious to just censure and the severest reprobation. But, in the present instance, Mr. Chairman, I conceive no pledge to have been given, unless the instructions to Mr. Poinsett will justify such an inference. In the letter of the Secretary of State, of the 28th of March, 1825, reference is made to the Message in question, and that Minister is instructed to call the attention of the Mexican Government to its contents. The manner of using the Message is left to Mr. Poinsett himself, who was a member of Congress when it was communicated to that body, and who was well acquainted with the circumstances and secret springs which had induced it. Mr. Poinsett knew the President could give no pledge, without the intervention of a treaty, sanctioned by the Senate; and he, therefore, could not have viewed the declaration in any other light than the opinion of a distinguished and influential individual, at the head of our Government, that such ought and would be our policy, should the contemplated contingency occur. Whether there was any just or rational apprehension of an armed interference of the Holy Alliance, in the contest between Spain and her former colonies; or that any trans-Atlantic nation meditated the establishment of new colonies on the American continent, it is not for me to determine. But the declaration of the President proceeded upon this apprehension; although, in truth and reality, it might have been groundless. It certainly would have been a mad project to transport forces across the great ocean for the subjugation of the new Republics, when it was certainly known that England would oppose the enterprise, with all her naval, fiscal, and military means. The other part of the declaration, that we would suffer no European power to colonize any part of North and South America—was, to say the least of it, rash and inconsiderate, and utterly incompatible with the pacific and unambitious spirit of our Republican institutions. There was no necessity to make it, as it regarded our own territory, and I cannot perceive the policy of making war in defence of foreign soil. I trust this nation will never wage war to maintain the territorial integrity of other nations, unless it should be absolutely necessary for our own safety. We can never hesitate to defend our own soil, but it would be highly impolitic and ruinous to embark our means and our lives in the defence of other nations.

But, Mr. Chairman, whether the events contemplated by the late President—European interference or colonization—will ever occur or not; or whether the present President intended, in his instructions to Mr. Poinsett, to make a pledge or not, it is very certain the Mexican Government cannot view it in that light, after the explanation of that Minister to the Mexican Secretary of State, as detailed by him, in his letter of the 21st August, 1825. According to this statement, he explicitly informed the Secretary, "that the declaration of the President, and the known friendly disposition of the Government and people of the United States towards the new Republics, did not confer upon them the privilege of demanding our interference as a right." Whatever impressions may have been entertained by the Mexican Government prior to this explanation, none could remain, as to the existence of a pledge, after it. The declaration, thus explained, amounted to this—that the Government and people of this country cherished the most amicable feelings towards the new States of the South, and that they ought to consider these feelings as a sure guarantee that this country would not be a cold and inactive spectatrix of any attempt to dismember their territory, or to reduce them to their former state of colonial vassalage. To any alliance, offensive or defensive, or any pledge involving our peace, I am decidedly opposed. If any European nation should attempt to put down the new Republics, it will be time enough, then, to act as our interest or policy may dictate; but let us not tie ourselves down by any stipulation, by which our peace may be in the power of any foreign nation. The Spanish American States may be involved in ruinous wars, not only with European nations, but with one another; and, if we once become entangled in their political systems, we shall find ourselves in the position of England towards the continent of Europe during the last and present centuries—constantly wasting our blood and treasure in maintaining the balance of power among these States. That they will be engaged in wars among themselves, there is no doubt. One already exists between Brazil and La Plata; and territorial disputes have already arisen between Mexico and Guatemala.

Mr. JAMES JOHNSON next rose, and thus addressed the committee:

It is not my purpose to treat with disrespect the opinion of any of the members of this House. They possess the right to enjoy their opinions: I possess the same right; and the right also to express it, as I trust I shall ever do, on all proper occasions, firmly and independently. Since I have had the honor of a seat here, I have often felt pleasant emotions. I see around me the Representatives of the great American family. I see those whom the members of that family have selected for their virtue and intelligence to deliberate on all subjects in which their interests are involved. I am bound to believe that we are aiming at the same great result, the honor and happiness of our country, although we widely differ on many subjects as to the proper means of obtaining it. Were we to pursue the policy recommended and advocated by some gentlemen, it would end, in my opinion, in the prostration of that liberty which they wish to preserve. Neither will I indulge any feeling of disrespect to the Chief Magistrate of this nation. I have too much respect for his person, for the high station which he fills, for the people, for myself, to indulge in any thing of the kind: although he was not my choice, yet, sir, he is the President of this people: yes, for those who voted against him, as well as those who voted for him. And I am free to declare, that I will support any measure which he recommends, which, in my opinion, comports with the interests of this nation. Yes, I will; and were it a Jefferson—who, I am free to acknowledge, is my greatest political favorite among all men who now live on earth—were he to propose a measure which would have an opposite effect, I would oppose it. Measures, not men, should pilot this enlightened assembly to proper and happy conclusions. The President has laid before this House the whole subject of the Panama mission. He has asked our opinion. I am now about to give it by voting for the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Delaware. And whether he had asked it or not, I would still give it, if, in my opinion, it was necessary. Yet, the gentleman from Virginia supposes we have no right to give our opinion—that, in so doing, we infringe on the rights and powers of the Executive. Yea, he goes further—that he would refuse to give any opinion to the Executive, even though he were requested so to do. For what do we come to this place! To unite with each branch of the Government, conjointly, for the purpose of deliberation; for the purpose of giving our opinions, and hearing others give their opinions, and arriving at a result which will promote the general weal; to mingle sentiments and opinions with each other. But no, says the gentleman from Virginia, I will not give any opinion, though solicited by a co-ordinate branch of this Government: and although the peace, the happiness, and the prosperity of this Government, are involved in the question, he would be silent—he would not obey this reasonable request. It really seems to me, that, when we meet at the seat of Government, we are taught from this doctrine that the different departments of Government, instead of forming one great whole, a unit, are placed upon the footing of strangers, of foreign nations, and must observe all the forms and etiquette which foreign courts do to one another. A co-ordinate branch of this Government requests the opinion of another on a great political question, to strengthen his hands. No, says the gentleman, I would refuse. "United we stand, divided we fall." But no: let the President act single-handed, and the Government moves on with more power than to act with the co-operation of this House. What is more common than a general council among all bodies of people? And the more critical and gloomy the occasion, the greater necessity for a general council. This is often practised by the best of generals in an army. It was intended to be practised by this Government when three separate bodies of magistracy were established. In the multitude of council there is safety: yes, safety—it is a true maxim. It may do much good: it cannot do harm, when there is a general council with the co-ordinate branches of the Government. If they agree, it is a happy circumstance; if they disagree, each party is left where it was, acting in the sphere of its own orbit. Each being responsible to that august tribunal for its opinions and its doings—the people—and from which responsibility ity this House ought never to shrink. From which I never will shrink while I have a vote in this Hall.

Much has been said in relation to that part of Mr. Monroe's Message of 1823, which stated that this Government could not look with indifference at the interference of any other power between Spain and her South American colonies. Nor for any power, except Spain, to occupy Cuba. This declaration was made, at the time, to meet a particular crisis, a particular occasion, existing at the time it was made; and also to meet all other occasions of a similar character, which may happen. It was understood, when made by this House, by the Republics of the South, by Europe, by the world. There was some hazard in using this language, when it was used. There was a hazard that it might be offensive to Europe; that it might cause us some difficulty; that they might view it as a menace that did not comport with their dignity to endure. It was, however, just, and received the sanction and approbation of the world. Heaven seemed to smile upon this eventful epoch. This nation took a high and elevated stand. It was sanctioned by the British Government in a most distinguished manner, highly honorable to this nation, and magnanimous in that in doing us justice, and which has been portrayed in such glowing terms by the gentleman from Massachusetts. The words of the President were correct as to time—correct as to form and substance: they were sanctioned by this nation, they were predicated upon correct principles. The words have issued from this nation, they will not be recalled. No, sir; I will not agree to recall them: neither will I agree to gasconade over them; neither will I give my consent for any of our Ministers to give their constructions of that declaration. They speak for themselves, and when it is necessary to give them their effect, it must be done by this Government. They are made, and there let them rest until a similar occasion occurs to those which gave rise to them, and then, and not until then, let the subject come before this Government, and nowhere else, to give the proper construction, and to adopt such measures as it may consider just and right. Sir, you may destroy any thing by nursing it. There was certainly a great fitness between the declaration of the President and the occasion which urged it. It was an elevated stand which the Government assumed. But to remain so, we ought to have the modesty not annually to declaim and boast on the subject. It is easy to destroy the constitution of the finest child by too much nursing; and it is more easy to destroy the happy effects of the stand taken by the Government in 1823, by recurring often to it unnecessarily. The possession of Cuba is of vital importance to this nation. It is the key to the mouth of the Mississippi. It lies directly in the route, from the mouth of that river, to the Atlantic cities. It is, however, not our property; it belongs to Old Spain. Neither can we obtain it upon any just and correct principle, without the consent of Old Spain. Unless we were at war, there is but one way to obtain it—which is by purchase. Spain, however, and the southern Republics are at war; and in order to cripple Spain in any way, which they have the power to do, these Republics have the right to conquer it and take possession of it, if it is in their power. If they possess the physical force, it is all that is required; and, according to the rules of war, it is right and just to make the attempt. It is stated that these Republics contemplate an attack on Cuba. Should they observe the rules belonging to honorable warfare, as settled in the civilized world, we cannot do otherwise than remain a spectator of the conflict, observing a strict neutrality. But, should a different course be pursued, which is entirely practicable, (I mean a servile war between slave and master,) then it would comport with the laws of heaven and earth to put a stop to it, if in our power. It would be only justice to ourselves. Human nature would hold in everlasting remembrance such interference, and would owe to us a debt of unbounded gratitude during time. This shows that the period is pregnant with great events. It is truly a crisis—we should not incur the charge of sleeping on our post. It is proper that we should have agents at the Congress of Panama. It attracts the attention of other nations. We should possess sentinels, then, near the post of danger. This would enable this Government to act early and promptly, if necessary. It will be ready to meet any difficulties, if any should arise, in our relations with them. From the best view of the subject which I am master of, it appears to me vitally important to send Ministers or agents to Panama: yet, to mark well every step they take, so as to secure this Government, in every point of view, blameless before the world.

THURSDAY, April 20.

Mission to Panama.

The House having again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the state of the Union, Mr. TOMLINSON in the chair, on the Report of the Committee of Foreign Relations, on the subject of the mission to Panama—the amendment of Mr. MOLLAN, as modified, being also under consideration—

Mr. BARTLETT said, he asked the indulgence of a word. His purpose was to separate his vote from the questions which had been argued, and to put it upon the questions to be decided.

Will this House, said Mr. B., assume to give instructions to our foreign Ministers? Will this House attempt to annex conditions to its appropriations for the support of Ministers? Is the proposed amendment for such purpose? May this House express its opinion in relation to our foreign policy? Is the policy indicated by the proposed amendment the true policy of this country? These questions, at this period, I do not propose to discuss. I will trespass only so far as to state the positions I hold in relation to them.

Is there an individual in this House who will pretend to the right of instructing Ministers, or of annexing conditions to appropriations for their support? I will do no such thing. I needed not the able arguments to which I have listened, to convince me of the impropriety of such pretence. But why have such arguments been urged against the proposed amendment? Can it bear such construction? If so, I would resist it. In my judgment, it cannot be forced to such purpose. Upon what are we acting? Upon an appropriation bill? No. Upon any legislative measure binding upon the Executive? No; but upon an abstract proposition, recommended by the Committee of Foreign Affairs, relative to the expediency of a certain contemplated mission; and in whatever words the resolution may be framed, its purport is no more or less than that; and when it shall have been adopted, nothing more comes of it: no money can be touched—no measure is hastened or retarded by the result. True, there is a bill reported by another committee, making appropriations for the mission to Panama; which bill is also referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; but that circumstance no more connects it with this resolution, in any legal affinity, than any or every other bill which is or may be referred to this committee. It is as independent of this resolution, as the bill providing for the Revolutionary Officers. Considering, then, this resolution and amendment not as an instruction or condition, but as an abstract expression of the opinion of the House, is it competent and proper for us to express opinions in relation to our foreign policy? We have been told, it is no part of our duty or our right; that it is even unconstitutional. I hold, sir, that it is at all times our right—often our duty. Yet the gentleman from Maine (Mr. SPRAGUE) has warned us, if we adopt this amendment of the gentleman from Delaware, it will lead to consequences which shall produce greater changes in your constitution, than the adoption of all the twenty amendments which have been offered at this session. Sir, if the principle contended for, by the friends of this proposition, be thus fatal, that gentleman's fears come too late—"the deed is done"—the constitution has long since been destroyed. From '89 to the present day, the right now contended for has been uniformly claimed and exercised. In the first institution of the Government it was exercised, in a much more imposing form, too, than is now proposed. Then, it was not in the comparatively inefficient shape of a resolution, merely entered upon your journals, but as a solemn answer to the President's Address, passed by the House, and formally presented by the whole House, with the Speaker at their head, in solemn procession. Let gentlemen who suppose this a new claim of power, turn to the records of former days, where they will find, in the answers referred to, and in resolutions, Congress have often spoken, and in language, too, of no equivocal import. But, say gentlemen, such expression of opinion imposes no obligation upon the Executive, and is, therefore, nugatory. I grant it has not the force of an enactment; and if it had, I would oppose it: and yet, even if entirely disregarded by the Executive, other results come of it, important to our welfare and our character. Some gentlemen, however, have admitted the propriety of a general expression of opinion, as to all our foreign policy, but deny the right in any particular case. I do not understand, either in logic or mathematics, how a part is greater than the whole—how we have a right to speak of all the nations of the earth, but not of any one of them. But, if gentlemen, who attempt this distinction, will open any volume of our Journals, from the organization of the Government, they will find enough of opinions partaking quite as much of individuality as the present. They will find the House saying what particular acts ought to be done by France, before a Minister should be sent at all. And the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. ARCHER,) who now encounters such constitutional difficulties, will find his own name recorded in the affirmative, with the name of every other member of the House, save one, upon a resolution expressing the opinion of the House upon a question of its relations with certain Governments of South America—a question, too, entirely within the Executive power and Executive discretion. And yet is such opinion nugatory, because it has no force of a legal enactment? No. Whatever forms our Government may possess, it is a Government of opinion. It rests on the opinion of the people, and if not sustained by it, it exists not a day. It may be, then, the duty of this House, as the Representatives of the people, to sustain the Executive by the opinion of the people; and if they misrepresent that opinion, the people themselves will reverse it.

War is a great evil, and should, if possible, be avoided; but even such an evil should not be avoided at the expense of a nation's liberty. It is an evil which this country has shown it is not prepared to avoid, at so great an expense. In the exercise of the discretion referred to, the circumstances under which the menacing nation is placed, should always be taken into view. If those circumstances clearly indicate an unfriendly design towards the third or neutral nation, delay on the part of the sovereign authority of such third or neutral nation in making resistance, is not only unwise, but criminal. With these principles before us, clearly prescribed in every code of international law, and as clearly sanctioned by every nation that has gone before us, what should be our course, were France, or any other great power of Europe, to attempt to subjugate, and plant its power either in Mexico, or on the island of Cuba, or Porto Rico? The circumstances under which they are placed, in relation to this country, I say, would render it criminal in the constituted authorities in this country, to stand by with folded arms, and acquiesce in such a movement. What are those circumstances? As far back as 1823, when this Government was negotiating with Russia in relation to the Northwest Coast, the principle had been assumed by this Government, as one in which we have a deep interest—that the American continents, by their free and independent condition, were no longer to be considered as subjects for future colonization by the powers of Europe. A principle not so broad, however, as had been supposed by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RIVES;) but it was laid down as a principle applicable to those portions of the two continents which had disenthralled themselves from colonial shackles, and was not intended to apply to those portions to which those powers had an undisputed claim. This principle had been assumed on the ground that we had a right to oppose the establishment, on our own borders, and in our neighborhood, of a power dangerous to our own liberties; and on the ground that, by the independent condition of the southern Republics, the United States enjoyed the right of commercial intercourse with them, and that the attempt to establish a system of colonization over them, would be to usurp, to the exclusion of the United States, a commercial intercourse which was the common property of all. The Government of Russia acquiesced in these principles, and has not said aught against them. The same principles, it has been already shown by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. WEBSTER,) were, in the most flattering manner to this country, sanctioned by the British Parliament; and even extended as they have been by the present Administration, so as to embrace Cuba and Porto Rico, they have been sanctioned and entirely acquiesced in by the then greatest powers of Europe—Russia, England, and France. The views of the Russian Government have been communicated to us in the letter of Count Nesselrode to Mr. Middleton; and those of the French Cabinet have been shown by the letter from Mr. Brown, our Minister to Paris, to Mr. Clay. It is also known that the British Government acquiesces in the same doctrine.

These, then, are the circumstances under which either of those powers would be placed, were they to attempt to subjugate any of the Governments of the South, or to seize upon Cuba or Porto Rico. And, should any such attempt be made under these circumstances, would we even be allowed to doubt that it was with views unfriendly to us? Could it be regarded in any other light than an attempt at dangerous aggrandizement, such as to enable them to give law to us? Could it be regarded in any other light than as manifesting a most deadly hatred of free institutions, and a fixed determination to arrest their further progress, if not finally to destroy them? And would not such attempt justify us, not only in speaking in decided language, but in taking decided measures to prevent it? He thought the people of the West, and the people of the nation, would say—yes. But it has been said there is no danger that any such attempt will be made. If that be true, he would ask, where was the necessity of saying any thing about it in the resolution before us? Sir, said he, the resolution itself implies that there is danger, and it is because of this danger that gentlemen are afraid our neutrality may be violated by entering into unwise alliances, and unwise joint declarations to avert it. He was opposed, he said, to the whole amendment, a part of which it was the object of the motion now pending to strike out. He was opposed to it, because he conceived it to be a most dangerous interference on the part of the House with the treaty-making power—an interference which he conceived more important in its tendency than the mission to Panama could be. But he was particularly opposed to that part of it which was proposed to be stricken out. He was opposed to it, not alone on the score of the manner in which it was presented, but upon principle. This Government had taken its stand several years ago, in relation to the policy it intended to pursue towards the South American Republics. That policy had met the approbation, not only of the people of the United States, but of three of the great powers of Europe; and that policy he was not willing to abandon. And if we send Ministers to Panama, he was not for sending them so much hampered as to be unable to discuss and fully consult on any proposition that may be submitted to carry that policy into full effect. Whilst he said this, however, he was free to declare, that he was not in favor of forming alliances with any power whatever. Such, he said, was not the object of the President. Any one who would read his Message with common attention, and common candor, he thought, would admit that such was not his object. In speaking of the subject of European colonization, and the means of resisting interference from abroad, with the domestic concerns of the American Governments, which is “offered as a matter for consultation at the Congress merely,” he says: “Should it be deemed advisable to contract any conventional engagement on this topic, our views would extend no further than to a mutual pledge of the parties to the compact to maintain the principle in application to its own territory, and to permit no colonial lodgements or establishment of European jurisdiction upon its own soil.” From this view of the President, it must be obvious, that no design is entertained to enter into any compact by which this Government will be pledged or bound, or could in any degree be required to interfere in resisting such encroachment upon the territory of any Government except our own—a pledge that I grant is not required for the defence of our own country. But if there should be any attempt to subjugate, by force or seduction, any of the new-born Republics of the South, a solemn declaration of each, that it would adhere to its integrity, and resist every such attempt, might not be entirely useless.

With reference to the declaration, that it is proposed to consider—for the President does not present it otherwise than as a subject for deliberation—he says: “With respect to the obtrusive interference from abroad, if its future character may be inferred from that which has been, and perhaps still is, exercised in more than one of the new States, a joint declaration of its character, and exposure of it to the world, may be, probably, all that the occasion would require.” The object of such a declaration, evidently, is not to form any compact or alliance with those powers by which our neutral relations can be changed, but is merely the exposure of the character of any interference that may be attempted in the domestic affairs of those Governments by the European powers. Such, for example, was the proposition made by one of the monarchies of Europe to one of the Republics of the South, to guarantee its independence if it would assume a kingly Government—a proposition that, however seductive in its character, was promptly rejected. Such a declaration, exposing the character of such interference, although it might do no great good, certainly could do no harm. But, whether the United States should, or not, be parties to such a declaration, may, in the language of the President, “justly form a part of the deliberation.”

And whether they shall, or not, I, for one, am disposed to submit to our Ministers, under their instructions from the Executive, whose situation will enable him to survey the whole ground, and to decide, under the state of things existing at the time, more correctly than we now can. And his decision, when made, will draw after it the same responsibility that attaches to his other official acts. In a word, said Mr. C., I am disposed to leave this whole matter under the constitutional control of the Executive, and leave him subject to that responsibility which the constitution imposes upon him. To place it on any other ground, is to subvert the constitution, and to throw on this House a responsibility which it ought not to bear. What course this Government should take in relation to matters that may arise in future, and which this House cannot foresee, is a question that, for one, I am not prepared to decide. Movements may be making by the allied powers of Europe, of which we and the Executive may both be ignorant. But the probability is, that the Executive, in due season, will be informed of all that is passing, and, when informed, the constitution supposes that he, as the Representative of the people of the United States, for this purpose, will adopt such course as is best calculated to promote their interests. To suppose otherwise, is at once to pronounce the failure of the constitution, in this particular, to answer the purposes for which it was intended.

It is our interest that the island of Cuba should be owned by a weak nation, or remain a colony. Its weakness would suit our convenience; but, he asked, does it follow that we are justifiable in resisting, by arms, a change of its condition? Certainly not, unless in conformity with the principle of self-defence, the first law of nature. When the dangers exist, which the gentleman now seems to imagine are even at our doors, his rule of action and my own will not be found materially different. When the interests of this country are, by the Holy Alliance, or any other power, so essentially disturbed as to require a resort to arms, with him he agreed the citizens of the West will not be found deficient in patriotism. That courage which nerved the arm, and prompted to deeds of "noble achievement" in the late war, will demand action.

When what is called the Holy Alliance was instituted by some of the most powerful nations of Europe, to sustain the "divine right" of kings, by repressing every effort which might be made in developing and fostering the rights of man, it cannot be forgotten what was the indignation of every patriot. So odious was it in this country, that it was everywhere execrated and denounced. Now, it may be asked, what is the object of the Congress to be held at Panama? Is not the inference strong that it is to operate as a countervailing body? Mr. Canas speaks of the European "Continental System," and that America should form a system for itself, and assemble, by its Representatives in Cortes, whenever circumstances might require; and Mr. Salazar indicates a secret "eventual alliance." It is far from me to say the Southern Republics ought not to form among themselves an alliance or combination for their own defence against Spain or any other assailing power. Their condition is very similar. They were all colonies, speaking the same language, and subject to the same power. Their struggles for emancipation have been produced by the same causes. Their enemy has been the same, and their toils and sufferings have been crowned by the same happy results—as Spain still refuses to recognize their independence, and flatters herself that their future reduction is certain, the acquisition of strength by a confederacy, is their undoubted right. In making this acknowledgment, he now and ever would protest against our becoming a party. We could gain nothing, and might put much at hazard. In strengthening them, we should weaken ourselves. Should the Holy Alliance make any movement in reference to this continent, affording satisfactory proof that the very annihilation of Republicanism, or Representative Government, was their object, then it would be our duty to adopt any measure in conjunction with our neighboring Republics, which prudence might dictate, in defence of the rights of man. Until the emergency happens, which may be viewed as very improbable, we should stand aloof.

If, Mr. Chairman, it were not the case that we can accomplish, through Ministers, in the ordinary way, every object which is common and fit to be accomplished, a Mission to Panama would be to me more tolerable. We have, at this time, diplomatic connections with the most of the new Republics. Three treaties have been negotiated upon unexceptionable principles. Our policy in relation to them has been dictated by prudence, and, so far, has resulted in mutual good will and advantage.

It seems to me the circumstances attending our invitation to send Ministers to Panama disclose, on our part, a want of delicacy. For so distinguished a favor, we have been too eager, and do not, as is my most deliberate opinion, know what they are to do. In one part of the President's Message we are informed our agents will merely consult—in another, consult and negotiate—and so says the report of the Committee of Foreign Affairs. To merely take counsel together, to deliberate, to interchange ideas on the topics introduced for discussion, would at least seem innocent. But who, in his sober senses, can believe this Congress is to be merely consultative, so far as we are concerned? To negotiate, will doubtless form a part of their duties. It is the character of the negotiation that he feared. But, say gentlemen, a treaty formed at Panama would not be binding without the approval of the President and Senate. This is granted. Would not, however, its rejection, particularly if made in pursuance of instructions, excite jealousy in the other contracting party? This would, he had no doubt, be most unfortunately the case, and the charge of infidelity to, and disregard of, our promises, be fixed upon us.

We have, said Mr. C., been informed by the President, our neutral character shall be maintained; and, that a compromitment of it is neither expected nor desired by the gentlemen giving us the invitation. To me, there is a paradox in this affair. These Ministers, in plain terms, point out what is to be done—the questions to be settled—some of which we cannot discuss without a forfeiture of our neutral rights; and yet, in the next sentence, they say our relations will not be changed. This is most strikingly the case in the letter of Mr. Obregon. I ask gentlemen who are versed in the mysteries of this novel project, to aid my understanding.

Much, sir, has been said of Mr. Monroe's memorable pledge, and our determination not to witness, with indifference, any interference of any European power, except Spain, with the independence of Spanish America. As for the pledge, the gentleman from Maryland, who spoke yesterday, (Mr. WORTHINGTON,) has very properly denominated it a mere brutum fulmen—an empty declaration; but which some think full of meaning and effect. It ought to be a matter of much regret that any of our Ministers should feel authorized to urge it as an argument, in negotiating a treaty. This, we are informed, has been done. Gentlemen frequently refer to the term "indifference." What do they mean by it? It is very indeterminate. If, by this expression, we are to understand concern, dissatisfaction, discontent, he had but little to say. But if, on the other hand, they mean a fighting "indifference"—a determination to court the bloody contest, he would not concur with them. If France should obtain a cession of Cuba, as we did of Louisiana, we would not be entirely indifferent. But could we legitimately wage war? Could we be justified before the world, in seizing upon that island and ourselves, and preventing the possession of France? This would seem to him a rash act, and wholly indefensible. The consequence would be hostility with two nations. Should such an unhappy state of affairs take place, he would ask the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. Cook) whether our countrymen of the West, brave and adventurous as they are, and much as they might desire to see our Southern commerce prosper, could be easily persuaded to buckle on their knapsacks, and shoulder their rifles, to fight battles in Cuba, under a vertical sun?

Mr. CAMBRELENG said: Connected with the last, sir, there is another, and not less interesting question, to which our attention has been called—the destiny of Cuba. It appeared to me somewhat singular, that two gentlemen from Louisiana, particularly one, (Mr. Livingston,) should have vindicated the policy of the Executive in its negotiations respecting the fate of that island. No one, it seems to me, can examine the diplomatic correspondence of 1825, without being made sensible that our rights have been voluntarily surrendered. What are our rights, sir? Next to Spain, our right over Cuba is paramount to the claims of every other nation. With Porto Rico we have nothing to do—it is far distant from us; but Cuba is on our border—we are vitally interested in its condition and Government; the commercial interest of the East—the agricultural interest of the West—the dearest and most valuable interests of the South—may, all the interests of every section of the Union are involved in the destiny of Cuba. The right of Spain once extinguished, from the nature of our position, and our peculiar and various associations with that island, our right becomes supreme; it resists the European right of purchase; it is even paramount to the Mexican and Colombian right of war. It is a right which should never have been surrendered to any power, whether belligerent or neutral. Yet what have been the declarations and the policy of the Executive? While the right of any European power to acquire Cuba by purchase has been denied—the belligerent right of Mexico and Colombia to invade the island, has been expressly acknowledged; it has been conceded; we have in our correspondence positively declared, that we cannot resist the right of war exercised by Mexico and Colombia—that we have no right to interfere, unless, indeed, they should "put arms into the hands of one race of the inhabitants to destroy the lives of another." And in such a crisis what would be the condition of the island? When is it, according to the policy sanctioned in our negotiations with foreign powers, and submitted to the inspection of the Colombian and Mexican Ministers, that we claim the right of interposing and resisting the invasion? When one race is armed "to destroy the lives of another"—when the standard of universal emancipation floats on the Morro—when insurgent fires are blazing on the mountains of Cuba, and gleaming along the shores of Florida, Alabama, and Louisiana! Then, and not till then, according to the concessions recorded in the short but comprehensive diplomatic history of the past year, do we claim the right of interposing to save Cuba and our own country from the consequences of the invasion! What our policy should be as it regards this island, presents a question of infinite difficulty. But whatever may be its fate, it is not only our interest to protest against the European purchase, but our right forcibly to resist its invasion by Mexico and Colombia. The arms of Spanish America can never be carried into Cuba, unless under her constitutional banner—the standard of universal emancipation. This island must remain under the dominion of Spain; if, however, its political position must be changed—if Spain must part with it—let it be independent—we want no colonies—let its independence be guaranteed by commercial nations. But, be its destiny what it may, we must resist its invasion by our neighbors—they cannot carry the war into Cuba without endangering the interests of our country. This is a question of too much importance to be surrendered by this House—let us pause before we consent to submit its decision to the Congress of Panama.

We have heard much, sir, of the "memorable pledge"—of the declaration of Mr. Monroe, in 1823—a declaration made in accordance with our true policy—a policy which would have been unquestionably ratified by the House, and responded by the nation. I concur most sincerely with the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. WEBSTER,)—it was the declaration of the Executive of our country to the world, made at an interesting crisis—I would not recall it—it shall never be "blurred or blotted," by any act of mine. But I cannot go as far as he does. I cannot agree with him, that this question "must be discussed," and at the Congress of Panama. The declaration revives and dies with the occasion—whenever that occasion shall arrive—whenever any European power shall interfere with the wars or independence of the nations of this continent—when the time arrives and we are called upon to decide the question of peace or war, "it must be discussed"—but not in the Congress of Panama. This is the only Congress in which that great question can or should ever be discussed and settled. The office of deliberating on the policy and justice of contingently engaging in war, should never be surrendered by this House—a right of this grave character should never be transferred to the Congress of Panama. I would not instruct our Ministers even to consult or deliberate on the propriety of entering into joint declarations upon questions of such magnitude. And although we are expressly called upon by the President to send Ministers to Panama, to consult and deliberate on the expediency of a joint declaration on this point, and of entering into a compact or mutual pledge on another, yet the gentleman from Massachusetts "sees nothing now which carries us beyond what was contained in Mr. Monroe's Message." I will not dispute with gentlemen about words; nor shall I adopt their construction of the President's Message. It is perfectly immaterial to me by what name these new and foreign associations or stipulations are to be called. I care not whether they are denominated "alliances, compacts, mutual pledges, or joint declarations." We are told expressly that our Ministers are to deliberate at Panama on the propriety of a mutual pledge or compact to oppose territorial colonization, and that it deserves the experiment of consideration, whether a joint declaration of our intention to resist the interference of any European power, with the domestic concerns of the American Governments, should not be made. Mere consultations and deliberations may appear to us to be small matters. Some may think that nothing injurious can possibly grow out of diplomatic consultations; and others may shelter themselves behind the contemptible argument, that, until the treaty stipulations are ratified, we are not bound by the acts of our Ministers at Panama. But, sir, we should recollect that this is not the policy of a wise and just people; that every thing depends upon the manner in which we make our first movements and advances towards the independent nations of America—the future destinies of our country are deeply involved in these, apparently, small matters; we should reflect that we are now laying the foundations of our American policy.

Mission to Panama.

Mr. FLEMMING said: We are told, by the gentleman from Maryland, that a pledge was given by Mr. Monroe, then President, to these Southern Republics, that we would defend and protect them from the assaults of European armies, or words to this effect; and that, since that period, this pledge has been renewed by letters from this Government to others, and particularly by our Minister to Mexico. Sir, when that Message was delivered to this House, I then rose in my place; and protested against that declaration of the President, as assuming an unwarrantable power, violating the spirit of the constitution; assuming grounds and an attitude in regard to European powers, calculated to involve us in a strife which there existed, and in which we had no interest; and indirectly leading to war, which Congress alone had the right to declare. We are now called upon to redeem the pledge given by Mr. Monroe, the parallel of Ferdinand; not only so, but the further pledge given by Mr. Adams, and that, too, by the correspondence of our Envoy with the Republic of Mexico. Here, then, the President has assumed to give support to these nations, even at the hazard of war, without consulting Congress or the Representatives of the people. The President has told us that we should not be "palsied by the will of our constituents." This bold claim to unlimited power, if acted upon, extinguishes, at one blow, the liberty of the nation. A claim so broad dare not be hinted at by the King of Great Britain; Alexander, Emperor of all the Russias, alone possesses such power.

The daring of this pledge, so contrary to the cautious indecision and irresolution of the former President, caused me to inquire how the circumstance happened; when a member of Congress, high in the confidence of the President, informed me that the British Government sought a conversation with Mr. Rush, our then Envoy and Minister Plenipotentiary at the Court of St. James, and proposed to him that they should unite upon the subject of South American affairs, and so shape their correspondence as to show to Europe the probable course these Governments would take in the cause of Spanish America. Mr. Rush, who is doubtless as able a negotiator as Secretary of the Treasury, (for the mistake he has made in his report does not exceed five or six millions of dollars this year; but, as it is his first attempt, there is reason to hope he may mend,) refused to accede to the propositions, unless the British would agree to enter into a treaty recognizing the independence of South America; this did not suit the views of England at that time. This was forwarded to the President, and was then lying on his table, when he issued that bulletin, pledging this nation to a course which is daily becoming dangerous to the peace of the country from without, and dangerous to the constitution from within.

This pledge, however it may eventuate through the medium of this mission to Panama, was, doubtless, at the time, considered safe, intended to astonish Emperors and Kings with the array of power, whilst the vast navy of Great Britain floated between us and danger. We are told, too, by the President, that the wholesome advice of Washington, to refrain from "entangling alliances," was intended to apply to the affairs of Europe; and he gives us to understand that a different state of things now exists, and that were he (Washington) now alive, he would entertain a different opinion. I have, sir, too high an opinion of the prudence, and patriotism, and wisdom of Washington, to believe he would hazard the peace of this nation for the fine

"spectacle" he might probably make in a "page of history."

By the adoption of this measure, so soon as these Ministers to Panama take their seats in that Congress, and join in the discussions of that body, that moment you commit an act of war against Old Spain. Is this just? Is it constitutional thus to take out of the hands of Congress, to whom alone belongs the power to say when this nation, of ten millions of people, shall be involved in war? If Spain is too weak to send an army to invade us, she can still declare war, as she will be compelled to do; our own act being, in fact, war against her. By this means, all the idle seamen of England, France, and the Low Countries, besides her own, will be placed on board of privateers, fitted out under the flag of Spain, to destroy our commerce in every sea. What good, then, can possibly result to this nation from this state of things? We are now about to adopt the discarded policy of Pitt, and Castlereagh, which for so many years desolated the British realms, which, if continued but for a few years longer, must inevitably have destroyed the energies of that nation, if not destroyed the Monarchy itself. Now, however, by the opposite course, she enjoys peace, and is daily reaping the fruits of good Government; extending her commerce, disbanding her armies, laying up her navy, increasing her manufactures, paying the national debt, and repealing many of her taxes; whilst we, to make a "figure in history," or exhibit a "spectacle" for Europe to look at, are involving ourselves in debt and interminable war—the ultimate end of which no human foresight can see or conjecture.

In what a strange attitude this Panama Mission places us. Whilst we are at peace with Spain, we are in conclave with her enemies, devising the best means for "carrying on the war" against her; not only to carry it on against her in America, but the expediency of carrying this war into her territory on the other side of the Atlantic Ocean, into the Canary Islands. Whilst we say to Europe we will not take part in this contest between Spain and her colonies, neither shall you, to subjugate these countries: we are mingling in the councils of Panama, planning war against Cuba and Porto Rico, the remaining colonies of Spain. A course of this kind is well calculated to bring upon this country the reproach of all nations having any regard for public faith. Instead of pursuing an open, ingenuous, manly course, thinking slowly, and acting prudently, firmly, and sincerely, we are engaged in all the insincerity and folly of Europe, at a period of their history over which themselves would gladly throw a veil. How different has been the course of the British Government! In the correspondence of her Minister with the Envoy of Spain, lately published in this country, we have seen all this diplomatic fog dissipated, which our own seems to delight in as the highest evidence of the talent and skill of the statesman. There, the story is told in a style so clear, simple, firm, and respectful, that none can misunderstand or doubt the meaning; here, the bad taste of the rhetorician is so intermingled with the affectation of the statesman, that you are in doubt whether it means this thing or something else; and this, too, by a Government whose duty it is, as being the oldest of the Republics, to give an example of candor and moderation. Not only this, but to expose to the people of this nation every transaction, in a clear and distinct point of view, that they may unhesitatingly decide upon their own affairs, and know the conduct of their Representatives.

This measure, fraught with so much mischief to this country, is one that ought to be avoided if possible. So far as I can see, in all its bearings, it looks to the conquest of Cuba and Porto Rico; or, at all events, of tearing them from the crown of Spain. The interests, if not safety, of our own country, would rather require us to interpose to prevent such an event; and I would rather take up arms to prevent than accelerate such an occurrence. These Republics have a mixed population, it is true, but the proportion of all others, when compared to the Spanish American, is but small. They, by a provision in their constitution, have abolished slavery, and placed every color on an equal footing, which may not be any great inconvenience to them. But what will be the state of the case should Cuba and Porto Rico be revolutionized upon their principles? It is well known that those colonies contain nearly five blacks to one white person; that in Cuba the proportion is this or more. It must then be a black Republic. The condition of Hayti is also to be taken into consideration at this Congress, to determine whether Hayti shall send Ambassadors to the different powers; and, if all questions are to be decided by a majority of votes, we must expect those Republics to act upon their principles, and compel us to receive a negro Minister; as the stipulations of this Confederacy of Republics are, to "interpret treaties," and coerce, if necessary, those who manifest an unwillingness to perform the task assigned to them by the Congress of Panama.

Why should we, then, engage in this moon-struck project, which threatens, at no distant day, a large portion of our country, embracing the whole of our Southern frontier? Cuba is scarcely more than eighty miles from Florida; the narrow sea between can be often passed in a few hours, in open boats; leaving the whole of Louisiana, Florida, and Georgia, open to sudden invasion from these black Republics at any time. Besides, the jealousy and discontent which this state of things would engender, must finally lead to rebellion and civil discord, should no immediate war be produced. Can there, then, be a man, who, viewing this subject in all its bearings, will not shudder at a picture like this, and abandon the project? A project which cannot, in any possible event,

Mission to Panama.

bring good to this country or that Republic, and may produce incalculable and irremediable evils to this Union. Surely it will be a bitter reflection, to those concerned in it, that, to "exhibit a splendid spectacle to the eyes of European Governments," or give those desiring it "a bright page in history," all these evils have been brought upon their country. Should the bold daring of this project be carried into execution, in all its parts, I am inclined to think that it will be discovered that we have withered the opening bud of our future greatness, and that "the bright page of history" will be crimsoned with the blood of our citizens.

If, however, we, reckless of consequences to our citizens and country, pursue this course, asserting, in the propagation of these principles, that men of every nation, kind, color, and degree, are entitled to the same usage, placed upon the same footing, participating alike in all the rights, privileges, and powers of Government, is it at all certain these visions may not be dissipated by the thunder of England? She has too deep a stake in the affairs of America, particularly the West Indies, to look on with indifference.

The moment these Ministers take their seats in the Congress of Panama, and begin to act upon the subjects proposed, as those which will engage their attention, that moment you will give just cause of war to any European nation which may think proper to declare it against you—France, Russia, the Netherlands—for, the act itself is, on your part, a declaration of war against Spain; and England, whatever may be her disposition at this time towards us, must declare war against us; she cannot avoid it; her interest is too deeply involved to remain an idle and inactive spectator. Were she to take this course, she would stand justified in the eyes of the world. I, too, could not otherwise than think she pursued the course I would have my own country pursue; and, doubtless, Governor Strong's "moral and religious" friends could find some excuses for her. Sir, I do not fear England; we have beaten her in two wars—one, at all events—though, in the last, we coped with fearful odds: with Britain from without, and a fearful opposition from within—an opposition now at the head of affairs. But, whilst I do not fear England, I know her power; it is vast; nor would I, for light causes, disturb that power. Her thousand ships of war, and hundreds of thousands of men, and millions of money, are not trifles to be overlooked in political arrangements.

Great Britain, I have said, will be compelled to wage a war against us, to preserve her own colonies, and her subjects from massacre. She has, in the West Indies, seventeen colonies; including, in this number, two in South America, that of Demarara and Berbice. Her territorial extent is vast, sending directly to Great Britain, annually, immense quantities of sugar, coffee, and rum, to say nothing of thousands of other articles of commerce, the growth and products of these colonies. Besides all this, she has from six to seven hundred thousand slaves, which, if the doctrine inculcated by these new Republics prevail, will be incited to rebellion, and England be doomed to witness the scenes of Saint Domingo acted over again, in her own colonies. Not less important is Jamaica, Demarara, Berbice, and Trinidad, to her, in the conduct and protection of her commerce everywhere. When she loses these, her commercial greatness is on the wane. It would be nothing short of folly to believe, that she would jeopardize these territories, or permit them to be torn from her by revolution, when we know that she taxes the same products higher from any other part of the world than from these colonies, by ten shillings a hundred weight. Let us not deceive ourselves, or be tempted to change our relations with other powers—we have prospered, we do prosper, and are at peace.

Loud cries for the question now resounded from all sides of the House.

The question was finally taken on the amendment of Mr. McLANE, and decided in the affirmative, by yeas and nays—yeas 99, nays 95.

The question then being on agreeing to the resolution reported by the Committee of Foreign Relations, as amended on the motion of Mr. McLANE—

Mr. STORRS demanded that it should be decided by yeas and nays; which was ordered by the House, pending which motion,

The House adjourned.

Mission to Panama.

After some observations, the question was taken on the resolution of the Committee of Foreign Affairs, as amended on the motion of Mr. McLANE, and decided by yeas and nays—yeas 54, nays 143.

So the resolution was rejected.

The question was then taken on striking out the enacting words of the bill, and decided in the negative, by yeas and nays—yeas 61, nays 184.

So the House refused to strike out the enacting clause.

The bill was then ordered to its third reading to-morrow,

And the House adjourned.

SATURDAY, April 22.

Mission to Panama.

An engrossed bill "making an appropriation for carrying into effect the appointment of a mission to the Congress of Panama," was read a third time.

Mr. BARNESY demanded that the question on the passage of this bill should be taken by yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered by the House.

Mr. McDUFFIE then rose and said :

Mr. Speaker : As we have at length reached the last act of this great drama, I cannot consent to take leave of this mission to Panama, without saying a few words, by way of parting benediction. As this House has solemnly resolved that it is inexpedient that our Representatives should take any part in the deliberations of the Council, on the only subjects on which we have been invited to participate, I take it for granted that Mr. Sergeant and Mr. Anderson will proceed, with all due "pomp and circumstance," to Panama; present themselves before the Council of Amphictyons; make a profound bow in the sacred name of liberty, bundle up their baggage, and return home with all convenient expedition. And, sir, having divested this mission of its tragical attributes, and left nothing but an empty pageant—a solemn farce to be acted by the Executive—I confess that I have no serious apprehensions that much evil will grow out of it. But still I cannot vote for this appropriation. For, though I never have been a stickler upon questions of proper expenditure, I am unwilling to pay forty or fifty thousand dollars per annum for the pleasure of being ridiculous, and the privilege of being laughed at. But, as the Administration have determined to go forth blindfolded, and with their hands tied behind them, tilting against—I will not say wind-mills, but the shadows of wind-mills—I have only to say, and I do it in all sincerity, God grant them a safe and a speedy deliverance.

The question was then taken on its passage, by yeas and nays, and decided in the affirmative, as follows :

YEAS.—Messrs. Adams of N. Y., Addams of Pa., Allen of Mass., Anderson, Armstrong, Bailey, Badger, Baldwin, Bartlett, Bartley, Barber of Conn., Barney, Baylies, Beecher, Boone, Bradley, Brent, Brown, Buchanan, Buckner, Burleigh, Burges, Cambreleng, Cassedy, Clarke, Condict, Cooke, Crowninshield, Dorsey, Dwight, Eastman, Edwards of Pa., Estill, Everett, Findlay of Penn., Findlay of Ohio, Foedick, Garnsey, Garrison, Gurley, Harris, Hasbrouck, Hayden, Healey, Hemphill, Henry, Herrick, Holcombe, Hugunin, Humphrey, Ingersoll, Jennings of Indiana, Johnson of New York, Johnson of Va., James Johnson, Francis Johnson, Kellogg, Kerr, Kidder, Lathrop, Lawrence, Letcher, Lincoln, Little, Livingston, Locke, Mallary, Markell, Markley, Martin-dale, Martin, Marvin of N. MONDAY, April 24.

Revolutionary Officers.

Pursuant to notice, Mr. HEMPHILL asked the House to take up the bill for the relief of the surviving officers of the army of the Revolution.

Mr. HEMPHILL addressed the committee as follows :

The officers of the army, independent of their military occupations, had, in common with their fellow-citizens, to bear losses, occasioned by the depreciation of the currency of the country, and the precarious uncertainty of the times. They had to bear more than their fair proportion of civil misfortunes, as their families and estates were left without their personal care and protection. After the declaration of independence, it was not long until Congress witnessed, in the progress of the war, that the army had suffered by bad appointments, and that it was essential to the successful issue of the contest that troops should be well officered; and they resolved that it be recommended to the several States to use their utmost endeavors that men of honor and known abilities be appointed to the service; and, on the 7th of October, 1776, they resolved, that, as an encouragement for gentlemen of abilities to engage as commissioned officers, in the troops to be raised to serve during the war, their monthly pay should be increased. Notwithstanding this resolve, dissatisfaction in the army, owing to wants and hardships, existed, and gradually increased, and Congress, aware that the preservation and subordination of the army depended mainly on its officers, resolved that those who should continue in service to the end of the war, should have half pay for seven years from the establishment of peace. The difficulties, however, remained, and still increased; as the army was not regularly paid, and, when paid, it was in depreciated currency. In this situation of affairs, the Commander-in-Chief, in his letter of the 29th of January, 1778, to a committee of Congress, at the camp, said that something must be done; important alterations must be made: for, without it, if the dissolution of the army should not be the consequence, at least its operations must infallibly be feeble, languid, and ineffectual. Without officers, he said, an army could not exist; and that, under their present embarrassments, few of them would be able, if willing, to continue in the service for the war. He then undertook to prove the necessity of half pay and pensionary establishments. Few men, he said, are capable of making continued sacrifices of all views of private interest; and that it was in vain to exclaim against the depravity of human nature on this account; we must change the constitution of man before we can make it otherwise. While an officer, instead of gaining any thing, is impoverished by his commission, there can be no sufficient tie upon him; and it would be a comfortless reflection to any man, that, after he may have contributed to securing the rights of his country, at the risk of his life and ruin of his fortune, there would be no provision made to prevent himself and family from sinking into indigence and wretchedness. Nothing, he said, in his opinion, would serve more powerfully to reanimate their zeal than half pay and pensionary establishments; as it would, in a great degree, relieve the painful anticipation of leaving their widows and orphans a burthen on the charity of their country; and it would dispel the apprehension of personal distress at the termination of the war, from having thrown themselves out of professions and employments which they might not have it in their power to resume. He urged his sentiments, he observed, with the more freedom, because he could not receive the smallest benefit from the establishment.

Congress being inspired with the same love of country, and seeing the actual necessity of the case, again, on the 17th of August, 1779, resolved, "That it be recommended to the several States to grant half pay for life to the officers who should continue in the service to the end of the war." But this recommendation was not complied with on the part of the States. At this period, the issue of the war was uncertain, and in great danger, and the uneasiness among the whole troops had become alarming. General Washington again, on the 30th of August, 1780, addressed a letter to the President of Congress, of which the following is an extract:

"I cannot forbear returning, in this place, to the necessity of a more ample and equal provision for the army. The discontents on this head have been gradually matured to a dangerous extremity; there are many symptoms that alarm and distress me. Endeavors are using to unite both officers and men in a general refusal of the money, and some corps now actually decline receiving it. Every method has been taken to counteract it, because such a combination in the army would be a severe blow to our declining currency; the most moderate insist that the accounts of depreciation ought to be liquidated at stated periods, and certificates given by Government for the sums due. They will not be satisfied with a general declaration that it shall be made good. This is one instance of complaint; there are others equally serious. Among the most serious, is the inequality of provision made by the several States. Pennsylvania maintains her officers in a decent manner; she has given them half pay for life. What a difference between their situation and that of the officers of any other line in the army! some of whom are so actually destitute of clothing as to be unfit for duty, and obliged, from that cause alone, to confine themselves to their quarters. I have often said, and I beg leave to repeat it, the half pay provision is, in my opinion, the most politic and effectual that can be adopted. On the whole, if something satisfactory be not done, the army, already so much reduced in officers, by daily resignations, as not to have a sufficiency to do the common duties of it, must either cease to exist at the end of the campaign, or it will exhibit an example of more virtue, fortitude, self-denial, and perseverance, than has, perhaps, ever yet been paralleled in the history of human enthusiasm. The dissolution of the army is an event that cannot be regarded with indifference: it would bring accumulated distress upon us; it would throw the people of America into general consternation; it would discredit our cause throughout the world; it would shock our Allies: To think of replacing the officers with others, is visionary; the loss of the veteran soldier could not be replaced."

Shortly after the date of this letter, paper money became so bad that it was no longer offered in payment; in this year, also, was the defection of Arnold, and the fall of Charleston. Under these circumstances, and in consequence of the recommendations to the States not being complied with, and the urgent solicitations of the Commander-in-Chief, Congress were induced, on the 21st October, 1780, to resolve, that half pay for life be granted to the officers in the army of the United States who shall continue in service to the end of the war. There were several intervening and subsequent resolves, all of which need not be referred to: the resolve of 1780 being the principal one by which the public faith of the nation was solemnly pledged, and on the faithful discharge of the duties to be performed by the officers under it, depended the liberties and salvation of the country. This compact of the Government was noble and just: it infused, for a time, a spirit of contentment among the officers, but that was all: their arrearages remained unpaid, and their accounts unsettled; their distresses and sacrifices daily increased, and their patience and patriotism had more difficulties to encounter than had ever before fallen to the fortune of any army. For upwards of two years the officers remained without any pay, and they had to procure their clothing by their own means, and through their friends. The situation of the soldiers was something better, as they were provided with clothes; though at this period, their supply was deficient, still there were instances of their refusing to accept of commissions, because it was not in their power to find their own clothing. A description of the situation of the army is given by the officers themselves. In December, 1782, the officers of the army addressed Congress, in behalf of themselves and their brethren, the soldiers, to make manifest to Congress the distresses under which they labored; that they had struggled with difficulties, year after year, under hopes that each would be the last, but they had been disappointed; that their embarrassments had thickened so fast that many of them were unable to go further. To prove their hardships, they referred to the Paymaster's accounts for the last four years; that, although the States had given certificates for pay due, for part of the time, they had sunk in value to little or nothing; and, as trifling as they were, many had been under the sad necessity of parting with them to prevent their families from actually starving. They represented that shadows had been offered to them, while the substance had been gleaned by others, and that their distresses had now been brought to a point; that they had borne all that men could bear; that their property was expended, and their resources at an end; and that their friends were wearied out with their incessant applications; that the uneasiness of the soldiers, for want of pay, was great and dangerous, and further experiments on their patience might have fatal effects. They described the deplorable situation of the army, as to rations, clothing, and pay. They spoke of the half pay as an honorable and just compensation for services rendered, and hoped, for the honor of human nature, that there would be none so hardened in the sin of ingratitude, as to deny the justice of the reward; but that, if objections to the mode only were raised, to preserve the harmony of the community, they were willing to commute the half pay pledged, for full pay for a certain number of years, or for a sum in gross. They entreated that Congress, to convince the army and the world that the independence of America should not be placed on the ruins of any particular class, would point out some mode of immediate redress.

The subsequent proceedings in relation to the officers are notorious. On the 21st of March, 1783, Congress resolved, that five years' full pay should be given to the officers, in money, or in securities, bearing an interest of six per cent. per annum, as should be most convenient to Congress, to be paid as other creditors of the United States, in lieu of half pay for life: provided, however, that this commutation be accepted by lines and corps, and not by officers individually, and that such acceptance or refusal should be signified by the Commander-in-Chief to Congress, from the lines under his immediate command, in two months. This resolution depended entirely on the success of applications to be made to the respective States to place funds in the power of Congress. And, on the 18th of April, the 2d of May, 1783, and 27th of May, 1784, resolves passed that requisitions should be made to the several States to provide funds to enable Congress to discharge the well-earned dues of the army. But these requisitions of Congress, on the several States, entirely failed: so that, contrary to the expectations of all the parties, Congress was without any means either to pay money for these commutation certificates, or to convert them into securities which would command money. The result was that nothing was paid, and the commutation certificates depreciated to about eight for one. This was a period in which the officers stood in the most urgent need of money; as, in October, 1783, Congress had discharged those who had been engaged for the war. Thus was an unpaid army dispersed, and all the cheering prospects with which they had been flattered, by the resolves of 1780 and 1783, at once vanished from their sight. Necessity obliged the most of them to part with their certificates at about one year's half pay. In this condition the situation of the officers remained for eight years, until after the constitution and the funding system were established, when the certificates were funded in the hands of the then holders, at three per cent. interest on the arrears of interest, and with a suspension of interest on one-third of the principal for ten years; so that the amount of stock received, reduced to six per cent., was scarcely equal to the sum which would have been payable at that time for half pay, under the act of the 21st of October, 1780. But even this security for their wages, on these unequal terms, came too late for the officers, as the certificates of most of them were then gone into the hands of speculators; and it was not in their power to regain them. The inability of the Government to perform its contract brought this distress upon them; their wants had to be complied with as far as the certificates would go: and to this, it is to be added, that, when the army was disbanded, two years of their pay remained unpaid; and the evidences of these arrears had to share the same fate with the commutation certificates. The officers had no control over necessity; and nothing of their two years' pay and the half pay for life has been enjoyed by them, except the mere shadow. This is the simple narrative of their case, as it has remained for upwards of forty years.

After a lapse of so many years, it will readily be perceived how difficult it is to settle the claims of the Revolutionary officers on any principle that may be deemed accurate, and corresponding with the various views that are entertained on the subject. The principle on which former committees have gone, is that of deducting from the arrears of half pay, computed from the cessation of hostilities to the present time, the full nominal amount of the commutation certificates, and paying the surviving officers the balance, if it did not exceed a million; and henceforward, during the remainder of their lives, paying the half pay stipulated by the resolve of 1780. Even this mode of settlement, which is the most favorable to the officers of any suggested, subjects them to all the losses occasioned by the depre-diation of the commutation certificates. Another mode suggests itself: that of paying the full amount of the five years' full pay, with interest, as the officers in reality never received it, and that owing to no blame on their part. The character of the services, and the happy consequences which have flowed from them, calls our attention to another mode, by which the Treasury of the country will lose nothing; and this can only be done by calculating, as nearly as possible, the amount which the Treasury has actually gained, and it will appear that it amounts, at this day, to a very considerable sum, out of the stipends of each surviving captain who served to the end of the war. And even this mode, which a high-minded Government cannot regard as unfair, leaves the officers to bear the losses of the commutation certificates, which they were obliged to part with in the hour of their urgent need, in reality for nothing more than about an anticipation of one year's half pay. But I will refrain, for the present, from any further remarks, or any endeavor to bring the case within the rules of acknowledged law. It must be manifest to every one, that the equitable circumstances in favor of the officers are strong and powerful; and if we confine ourselves only to the two periods of the commutation certificates, and the funding system, ample reasons may be assigned to support this equitable claim. By the funding system, the Treasury gained, by suspending interest on one-third of the principal for ten years, and by paying only three per cent. interest on the arrears of interest; but the principles of equity do not stop here; it was the understanding of the resolve of 1788, that the officers should receive money, or certificates which would be equivalent to money: this was their expectation; this formed the inducement for the acceptance, by lines and corps, of these certificates: for it is not conceivable that men in their senses would agree to receive a less sum for a greater, unless the lesser sum was to be paid in cash, or better secured.

The object was, to place some funds in the hands of the officers, who were then about to change their situation from a military to a civil life, to enable them to commence in civil occupations. This was their understanding; but this reasonable expectation was soon baffled. The money was not paid—the security was not increased—and the certificates sunk to a trifle. The officers had nothing in their power but to witness this new disappointment, which destroyed all hopes of their stipulated reward, which they had earned, by sacrificing the best part of their lives in an arduous and bloody war of eight years. The inability on the part of the Government to perform its contract, compelled the officers to part with their certificates, at the reduced prices that have been mentioned. To the gain of the Government, by suspending interest on one-third of the principal for ten years, and funding the arrears of interest, at an interest of three per cent., ought, on principles of fairness and equity, to be added a sum equivalent to their many disappointments.

The committee, in reviewing the various aspects which the subject presented, found a difficulty to determine what course to pursue; especially as the subject, on the ground of contract, had been twice reported to the House, and not sustained.

It was concluded, upon the whole, that it would be best to grant a sum in gross, to be divided among the officers who are living, and to close the doors against all future claims. This mode, it was thought, would, better than any other, accommodate itself to the various opinions entertained on the subject, some being founded on contract, some on the principles of equity, and some in favor of a gratuitous grant. This opinion was also strengthened by the circumstance, that all previous laws on the subject of pensions, had been confined to the living, and that nothing had been extended to heirs or representatives, which would lead to great extent and uncertainty; and, as the children cannot be young, they may be presumed to be able to maintain themselves, and can found no claim except on strict right. And in conversing on this subject with many, it seemed to be a prevailing sentiment, that a respectable sum in gross should be awarded, to be divided among them according to their continental rank and yearly pay.

Mr. HEMPHILL concluded by moving to fill the blank for the appropriation with the words "one million of dollars."

A debate now commenced, which continued till four o'clock, in which Messrs. ALSTON, MITCHELL, of Tennessee, and McCoy, opposed, and Messrs. SMITH, ANDERSON, REED, ESTILL, DWIGHT, BUCHANAN, and HUMPHREY, advocated the bill.

The following are the remarks of Mr. SMITH in support of the bill:

Mr. Chairman: Before the sense of the committee is taken upon this bill, I must be indulged with a very brief exposition of the reasons which have induced me to give it my support. The right of the claimants to its benefits, is founded upon a solemn contract, solemnly and deliberately entered into, between the officers of the Revolutionary army and their Government. The evidence of this contract (rendered peculiarly obligatory by the urgency of the occasion which produced it) is to be found in a resolve adopted by Congress in the month of October, 1780, granting to the officers of the army who should continue in service to the close of the war, half pay for life. This resolve constitutes the basis of the obligation of the Government to grant, and of the right of the officer to receive, the stipulated compensation. That we may, Mr. Chairman, form a juster conception of the solemnity of this contract, and the rights and obligations of the parties to it, it may not be improper, perhaps, to advert, for a single moment, to the circumstances which preceded and led to the adoption of the resolve just indicated. The pecuniary embarrassment of the Government, connected with our successful resistance to British tyranny and oppression, is a fact of universal notoriety. It forms a prominent feature in that ever-memorable struggle, and imparts additional lustre to its happy termination. Were it necessary to furnish evidence of the fact, I could appeal to the recorded history of that eventful conflict, and to the few surviving witnesses who yet linger among us, exhibiting, in their persons, the mournful evidences of departed strength, but whose memories still retain the strongest recollection of the deeply interesting events of a period infinitely the most important in the annals of the world. In their personal sufferings and privations, you would find abundant proof of the very limited means of the Government. It is true, their wants were but few, but, few as they were, they could not command the scanty means necessary to supply them. What were the consequences of this state of things? Resignations were frequent, the public service abandoned, and a dissolution of the army seriously apprehended. The crisis was truly alarming. The evil, big with danger to the best and brightest hopes of the patriot, demanded an immediate and efficient remedy. The Father of his Country, always cool and collected in the midst of difficulties, and equal to every trial, correctly appreciating the magnitude of the evil, and the fearful result it portended, suggested the proper corrective. He recommended to Congress the adoption of the very measure which is the foundation of the present claim. In obedience to this recommendation, which alike comports with the dictates of justice and expediency, Congress, in the month of October, 1780, resolved, "that such officers as should continue in the military service of the country to the close of the war, should be entitled to half pay for life." This provision was tendered to, and accepted by, the officers, individually, and thus was a contract, solemnly, deliberately, and voluntarily entered into, between them and their Government. The Government promised a compensation which would render the veteran in its service comfortable in the winter of old age, and, in consideration of this promise, he pledged the best services of his best days to the end of the contest. What engagement more obligatory! What contract could create a clearer right, or impose a stronger obligation! In my humble judgment, none. The services of the officer were indispensable in the vindication and maintenance of our just rights; his skill and experience necessary in conducting the war to a safe and honorable termination—the establishment of National Independence. On the part of the officer, the promised reward cheered his hopes, and animated his exertions. He looked with confidence to it, as the means which would protect him from penury and want, when time had wasted his strength, and disqualified him from engaging in the busy scenes and active pursuits of life. I repeat it, therefore, that no contract is more solemn, whether we regard the circumstances under which it was made, or the objects intended to be accomplished. Let us then briefly inquire into the manner in which this contract has been performed by the respective parties to it. By the officer, how has it been performed? Foregoing all the comforts of his fireside, and the endearments of domestic life, he has executed it to the very letter—he has executed it in toil and in suffering; many a well-fought battle, successive days, which ever found him at his post in the midst of danger, and sleepless nights, bear witness to the fact. His blood furnished honorable and impressive testimony of faithful service. Indeed, every leaf of our Revolutionary history discloses some splendid instance of his devotion to the great cause of Liberty. In a word, his services were not grudgingly contributed, but zealously and honestly rendered, not for a month or year, but to the end of the conflict. Permit me now to ask, whether the Government has performed its part of the contract? Has the original stipulation been carried into execution, according to its true intent and meaning? Has the pledged faith of the nation been redeemed? How can these questions be answered, without involving the Government and nation in a charge of the grossest injustice? Satisfaction, sir, has been too long delayed. Years have gone by, and most of our Revolutionary heroes have descended to the tomb: and yet the contract remains to be executed on the part of the Government. Can we shield ourselves against the demand, under the plea of the statute of limitations? It is not, and will not be pretended, that we can, and, if we could, who is there willing to rely upon it? Not one member of this committee, I am satisfied. Can we claim the benefit of a release? How, and in what manner, have we been released from our obligations? Does the resolve of 1788, substituting the five years' full pay for the half pay for life, operate a discharge of our undertaking? This resolve, at first view, certainly looks something like a discharge; but a little reflection will, I think, correct this first impression. The election given by it, either to take the five years' full pay, or the half pay for life, was to be made, not by the officers individually, but by lines and corps. This election by lines, I contend, is a palpable departure from the terms of the original contract, and furnishes no bar to the claim. I lay it down as an incontrovertible position, that the obligation of a contract can only be dissolved by the same power which created it. The parties must be the same, and in a situation to give, or withhold, their assent, as whim, or caprice, or their unbiassed judgments, may direct. This principle is too obvious to need illustration, and will not be denied here or elsewhere. Let, then, this universally admitted principle be applied to the present question, and, unless I am greatly mistaken, it will appear, conclusively, that the right of the surviving officers of the Revolution, to the half pay for life, is unaffected by the acceptance, by corps, of the five years' full pay. The original stipulation was with the officers of the army, individually. The provision was tendered, not to lines, but to officers, in their individual capacities, and, in that way, accepted by them. With what propriety, then, can it be said, that a contract, thus formed, can be dissolved in any other mode? How can the novel and extraordinary position be maintained, that A's rights may and can be surrendered by B, C, and D, without his consent and authority? The thing is impossible, sir. It cannot be done. Such a doctrine would countenance the grossest injustice, and do violence to every man's common sense. Yet this violence and injustice will be done, if it be admitted that the acceptance by lines has extinguished the individual right of each individual officer of the army, volens volens. But the committee will not, I am sure, lend its aid in bringing about so startling a result.

Mr. ANDERSON followed Mr. SMITH, and addressed the committee in the following terms:

I am well aware of the importance of time to the committee, at this late day of the session, and of their impatience, and shall content myself with a very few observations on the bill now before us, trusting it will find advocates on this floor, not only disposed, but far more able than myself to do ample justice to its merits. It would be a useless waste of words, and what now is much more important, of time, to go through a recitation of the sacrifices, sufferings, and gallant services of these worthy petitioners; they, in fact, constitute the history of our Revolution, and have become familiar to us all, even from our cradles. Nor will I detain the committee by any argument, to show the relative rights and obligations that attached to the claimants, and were imposed on the Government, by the resolves of 1780 and '83. All these rights, and the obligations, moral and legal, resulting from these resolves, were ably, and with great accuracy of detail, laid before us by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Chairman of the Select Committee.

We all admit their services; we admit they nobly earned the promised reward; and, sir, we are compelled to admit, too, that this reward has been to them, thus far, a reward of promises only—mere empty, unredeemed promises, and nothing else.

These men, or most of them, left the army poor—poor, too, in consequence of the very services they had so faithfully rendered their country; and have continued comparatively poor to this day.

And what, sir, is the cause of their continued poverty and distress? Not that they were destitute of talents, fortitude, and temperance; for all these they were eminently distinguished. Neither will it be denied that they are, and ever have been, among the number of our most worthy and industrious citizens. Why, then, have they continued laboring against the tide, and struggling with poverty, while all around them, of like praiseworthy habits, but of far less abilities, have placed themselves beyond the reach of want? The answer is obvious. That period of their lives, the period that fixes the habits and course of business on us all, and enables us, while our wants are few, to accumulate a fund that shall keep in advance of our subsequent increasing expenses, you required of them for your service; and for a service, too, that, above all others, peculiarly disqualifies men for the successful pursuit of the ordinary concerns of life. And, sir, had you, when these services were over—when you no longer had an enemy to meet—when they had achieved all you ever expected or wished—when the condition on their part had been faithfully performed, and their right to the reward had vested and become absolute—had you then made good your engagements, these men would now be in a very different situation. Their half pay for life would have rendered their journey easy, not only from the close of the war to this time, but through the remainder of their days. Let us look, for a moment, to the process by which they were divested of these annuities, to which they had become fairly and completely entitled. I mean the much-talked-of commutation act of 1783. In consideration that they would release you from these annuities, you promised to give them five years' full pay in money, or stock bearing interest, to be equivalent to money. The project was entirely your own, and these very petitioners, being the younger part of the officers of the army, were, in a measure, forced into its acceptance.

The act itself was arbitrary and coercive. It did not leave the officers free to act, to exercise their own judgment, and individually to decide whether they would accept or reject its provisions, but confined its acceptance to lines and corps—thereby placing it in the power of a few prominent commanders, in effect, to decide for a whole line or corps. Government well knew this five years' pay was altogether an inadequate consideration for the annuities to be relinquished; they knew, too, that the officers were destitute and their families suffering; and, above all, they and the world knew, that the recommendation of their great Commander had the force of law upon a majority of every line and corps in the army. Hence it was that this golden bait was held out to these half-famished men; it was to be cash in hand, or such stock as should be equivalent; it was to enable them at once advantageously to establish themselves in civil pursuits; it would afford immediate relief to their pressing necessities, and, more than all the rest, it had the approbation of their Commander, whose judgment they could not doubt. Still it was a sacrifice; even had it been punctually paid, it was well known to be far short of a fair compensation for the annuities; individual election was, therefore, taken away, and nothing but habitual compliance with the requests of their Government, and the well-known wishes of their Commander, together with an entire unshaken confidence and belief of immediate payment, could have induced them to part with a greater good for one so much less. Commutation certificates are at last accepted by lines and corps—Government, and not the officers, being judges of this acceptance. And how, then, did they stand? Why, Government had redeemed, or, rather, at a discount of two-sevenths, had purchased in, these promised annuities, by a new promise—which last promise was, at all events, to be cash forthwith.

The officers then held Government's notes for two, three, or nine thousand dollars, respectively, according to their rank, received in the full faith that they were to be immediately equal to so much specie. And what were they in reality worth? Scarcely as many hundreds as you had promised the thousands. They poor, and their families destitute and dependent, instead of their three or four thousand dollars, to relieve immediate wants, and establish themselves in civil pursuits, as you had promised, and they had every reason to expect, found, to their sorrow and utter confusion, that the whole was scarcely equal to their wants for a single year.

Such, in fact, was the operation of this commutation, that all they ever realized for their half pay for life, amounted to less than full pay for eight months.

All this they bore with scarcely a murmur; they had learned to be quiet under every sacrifice and privation; they thought Government then could do no better; they forebore in its need, and were silent from the purest motives. And now, shall we set up time in bar of their claim, and say to them, we hold you to the strictest letter of the contract? Although we run down our own paper, and forced you to part with it for a mere song; although we took advantage of its depression, and bought it in at an immense discount, and our Treasury holds over two millions of dollars speculated out of you, in these very certificates—yet, admitting all this, we will not pay you a single dollar. Will this be treating them honestly? To say nothing of gratitude or generosity, will it be treating them as one honest man treats another? Shall we, a rich, generous, and powerful nation, as we daily call ourselves—a nation, too, by the sacrifices, sufferings, and valor of these very men—because they have suffered under our injustice for more than forty years, now turn a deaf ear to their petition, and say, it is an old story; we have your receipts, and shall hold you to strict legal right? Might they not justly turn upon us and inquire, whether, in the hour of the nation's want and peril, when they were rich in all the wealth we wished to find in them—courage, patriotism, and strength—they ever held the Government to the letter of the contract with them? Did they ever refuse to march or meet the enemy, because they were not paid and fed as the Government had promised? It is true, General Washington informs us, that, so miserably were they clad, they refused to meet or see their friends, but never their enemy. And, sir, when the war was over—when they had conquered peace, and won a nation by their valor—when they had the power in their own hands—did they, even then, though insidiously advised so to do, hold the Government to the letter of the contract? In fine, sir, go through the history of the Revolution, you will not find an instance where the good of their country's service has not outweighed, with them, every private consideration. It exhibits a continued series of concessions on the part of the army, to the wants of the Government for promises never fulfilled. They uniformly yielded as the Government requested, and all they ever yet have received is unperformed promises and starving resolves of gratitude; and all they now ask is a part only of what your Treasury has made by a forced, unequal bargain; not what they have lost by your total failure to meet your engagements, but what your Treasury has actually saved and made at their expense. The country now is abundantly able, and, I am satisfied, is anxious, that these claims should be not only equitably, but generously adjusted. Suppose, sir, these certificates had not been funded, and the officers now held them, and had endorsed every dollar and cent Government ever paid for them, and yet a balance remained due—is there a man in this nation who would say such balance ought not to be paid? I believe not. And yet, as respects the Government and these certificates, this is the precise case. And a part only of this balance is all the petitioners now ask, and is what the bill now before us proposes to grant. It is, to be sure, but a mite compared with what they ought and would have received, had Government made good their contract by the honest payment of the annuities by a full and seasonable redemption of their certificates, as was promised and expected. It has been said, if we grant the prayer of these survivors, we shall have the widows and heirs of the deceased upon us. This, sir, is not an argument against the equity of the claim. The objection is imaginary; it is a consequence that may or may not result from the passage of the bill; and when the case shall come before Congress, it will be time enough to consider it. But even were it certain that we should be called on by the heirs of the deceased, to say nothing of the distinction between personal and hereditary merit, is it a sound reason for not doing justice to such as have already applied? It is saying we owe one thousand persons; four hundred have applied for pay; if we pay these, possibly some of the remaining six hundred may apply, and we shall be obliged to pay all our honest creditors; therefore, it is just, honest, honorable, and, above all, it is expedient, to pay none.

Revolutionary Officers.

It will be recollected that the whole army, including officers and men, at the close of the war, amounted to little more than thirteen thousand; and it is to these officers only that the resolve of 1780 extended. It is not, therefore, to be supposed, that more than one thousand claimants under this act, of every description, including survivors, widows, and heirs, could be found to apply; so that, should all come in, they will hardly take from the Treasury the sum it has gained by the commutation, nor will it be so greatly impoverished as gentlemen may imagine. And whatever debt it might leave us to pay, I would sooner incur it than let this opportunity of evincing the nation's justice and gratitude pass unimproved.

In advocating the claim of the officer, I am not unmindful of the private soldier. Most heartily shall I give the bill for their relief my support, when it comes before us; and such generous relief as may be consistent with our means, I trust will be extended to the deserving patriots of the Revolutionary armies.

Mr. BUCHANAN spoke as follows:

Mr. Chairman: It is with extreme reluctance I rise at this time to address you. I have made no preparation to speak, except that of carefully reading the documents which have been laid upon our tables; but a crisis seems to have arrived in this debate, when the friends of the bill, if ever, must come forward in its support. I do not consider that the claim of the officers of the Revolution rests upon gratitude alone. It is not an appeal to your generosity only; but to your justice. You owe them a debt, in the strictest sense of the word; and of a nature so meritorious, that, if you shall refuse to pay it, the nation will be disgraced. Formerly, when their claim was presented to Congress, we had, at least, an apology for rejecting it. The country was not then in a condition to discharge this debt, without inconvenience. But now, after forty years have elapsed since its creation, with a Treasury overflowing, and a national debt so diminished, that, with ordinary economy, it must, in a very few years, be discharged, these officers, the relics of that band which achieved your independence, again present themselves before you, and again ask you for justice. They do not ask you to be generous—they do not ask you to be grateful—but they ask you to pay the debt which was the price of your independence. I term it a debt, sir; and it is one founded upon a most solemn contract, with which these officers have complied, both in its letter and in its spirit; whilst you have violated all its obligations.

Let us spend a few moments in tracing the history of this claim. It arose out of the dis-treases of the Continental army, during the Revolutionary war; and the utter inability of the Government, at that time, to relieve them. What, sir, was the situation of that army, when it lay encamped at the Valley Forge? They were naked, and hungry, and barefoot. Pestilence and famine stalked abroad through the camp. The first blaze of patriotism which had animated the country, and furnished the army with its officers, had begun to die away. These officers perceived that the contest would be long, and bloody, and doubtful. They had felt, by sad experience, that the depreciated pay which they received, so far from enabling them to impart assistance to their wives and children, or hoard up any thing for futurity, was not sufficient to supply their own absolute and immediate wants. Placed in this situation, they were daily sending in their resignations, and abandoning the cause of their country. In this alarming crisis, Washington earnestly recommended to Congress to grant the officers half pay, to commence after the close of the contest, as the only remedy for these evils, within their power. The country was not then able to remunerate the officers for the immense and unequal sacrifices which they were making in its cause. All that it could then do was to present them a prospect of happier days to come, on which hope might rest. With this view, Congress, in May, 1788, adopted a resolution allowing the officers, who should continue in service until the end of the war, half pay for seven years. This resolution produced but a partial effect upon the army. The time of its continuance was to be but short; and there were conditions annexed to it, which, in many cases, would have rendered it entirely inoperative.

In August, 1779, Congress again acted upon this subject, and resolved, "That it be recommended to the several States to grant half pay for life to the officers who should continue in the service to the end of the war." This recommendation was disregarded by every State in the Union, with one exception; and I feel proud that Pennsylvania was that State. She not only granted half pay for life, to the officers of her own line, but she furnished them with clothing and with provisions. Thus, when the General Government became unable to discharge its duty to her officers and soldiers, she voluntarily interposed and relieved their distresses. Gen. Washington, when urging upon Congress the necessity of granting to the officers half pay for life, pointed to those of the Pennsylvania line, as an example of the beneficial consequences which had resulted from that measure.

Congress at length became convinced of the necessity of granting to the Continental officers half pay for life. Without pay and without clothing; they had become disheartened, and were about abandoning the service. The darkest period of the Revolution had arrived, and there was but one ray of hope left, to penetrate the impending gloom which hung over the army. The officers were willing still to endure privations and sufferings, if they could obtain an assurance that they would be remembered by their country, after it should be blessed with peace and independence. They well knew Congress could not relieve their present wants; all, therefore, they asked, was the promise of a future provision. Congress at length, in October, 1780, resolved, "that half pay for life be granted to the officers in the army of the United States, who shall continue in service to the end of the war."

Before the adoption of this resolution, so desperate had been our condition, that even Washington apprehended a dissolution of the army, and had begun to despair of the success of our cause. We have his authority for declaring, that, immediately after its adoption, our prospects brightened; and it produced the most happy effects. The state of the army was instantly changed. The officers became satisfied with their condition, and, under their command, the army marched to victory and independence. They faithfully and patriotically performed every obligation imposed upon them by the solemn contract into which they had entered with their country.

How, sir, did you perform this contract on your part? No sooner had the dangers of war ceased to threaten our existence—no sooner had peace returned to bless our shores, than we forgot those benefactors, to whom, under Providence, we owed our independence. We then began to discover that it was contrary to the genius of our Republican institutions to grant pensions for life. The jealousy of the people was roused, and their fears excited. They dreaded the creation of a privileged order. I do not mean to censure them for this feeling of ill-directed jealousy, because jealousy is the natural guardian of liberty.

In this emergency, how did the Continental officers act? In such a manner as no other officers of a victorious army had ever acted before. For the purpose of allaying the apprehensions of their fellow-citizens, and complying with the wishes of Congress, they consented to accept five years' full pay, in commutation for their half pay for life. This commutation was to be paid in money; or securities were to be given on interest at six per cent., as Congress should find most convenient.

Did the Government ever perform this their second stipulation to the officers? I answer, no. The gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. MITCHELL) was entirely mistaken in the history of the times, when he asserted that the commutation certificates of the officers enabled them to purchase farms, or commence trade, upon leaving the army. Congress had not any funds to pledge for their redemption. They made requisitions upon the States, which shared the same fate with many others, and were entirely disregarded. The faith and the honor of the country, whilst they were intrusted to thirteen independent and jealous State sovereignties, were almost always forfeited. We then had a General Government which had not the power of enforcing its own edicts. The consequence was, that, when the officers received their certificates, they were not worth more than about one-fifth of their nominal value, and they very soon fell to one-eighth of that amount.

Mr. HUMPHREY said, the subject under consideration, if not the most important, is certainly as interesting as any upon which we have been, or shall be, required to deliberate during the present session. It is, in all probability, the last demand that will be made upon the justice of this Government, and to gentlemen who are not disposed to regard the application in that light, I may say, it is the last appeal that will be made to its magnanimity and liberality, by a class of men endeared to us by some of our fondest and proudest recollections.

The memorialists ask for the equitable performance of a contract. The first proper subject of inquiry, then, will be, whether such a contract ever existed, and, if it did, whether the engagements of the respective parties, or either, have been performed—if the contract was fairly made—if the terms were fulfilled on the part of the memorialists, and not by the Government, in strict accordance with its letter and spirit. This being the only mode of redress within the reach of the injured party, as the Representatives of the people, on whom the duty rests, and clothed with the power of dispensing justice, we are under the strongest moral obligation not to withhold it. I will now proceed to a very brief examination of the facts of the case.

Was there a contract between the Government and the memorialists; and what were its terms? It is unnecessary to do more than merely advert to the condition of the country and army, at the eventful period of 1778. The spirit of enthusiasm which had animated the officers and soldiers of the army; which had induced them, regardless of personal consequences, to abandon their private pursuits and their domestic comforts, and, at the imminent risk of life, and of every thing dear to them, to engage in a desperate conflict, had begun to abate; and, sir, it is neither a matter of surprise nor of censure, that it was so. They had sustained nearly three years of civil war, marked by every species of horror and outrage. They had fearlessly obeyed every requisition of the Government, whether it required them to act amidst the frozen regions of the North, or on the burning sands of the South. They had endured nakedness and famine, and opposed themselves to danger and death, in all their terrible varieties. Their services and sufferings are matters of history, and familiar to us all. To have expected more from them, or a longer endurance of the extraordinary and peculiar calamities under which they labored, without the future prospect of indemnity or reward, would have been attributing to them powers and virtues with which mortal man has not been endowed.

It is almost needless to say, that the opinions of General Washington, on this subject, are entitled to implicit regard; and I beg leave to read, as an item of testimony, a single sentence from his letter to a committee of Congress, in which he represents the condition of the army. It is dated 29th January, 1778. He says: "It is not, indeed, consistent with reason or justice to expect, that one set of men should make a sacrifice of property, domestic ease, and happiness, encounter the rigors of the field, the perils and vicissitudes of war, to obtain those blessings which every citizen will enjoy in common with them, without some adequate compensation. It must also be a comfortless reflection to any man, that, after he may have contributed to secure the rights of his country, at the risk of his life and the ruin of his fortune, there would be no provision made to prevent himself and family from sinking into indigence and wretchedness."

In the same communication, he expressed his apprehensions that, unless something was done to "reanimate their languishing zeal," the total dissolution of the army would be the consequence. And he warmly recommended a half pay or pension establishment, as a desirable and salutary measure. What then was the condition of the parties? The officers had rendered vast and unrequited services to the country. In the language of the Commander-in-Chief, "an entire disinclination" to the service, in its then shape, had taken place. Frequent resignations, and more frequent applications for permission to resign, were daily happening, and from officers of the greatest merit. They were under no legal or moral obligation to continue. They could have quit the army, not only without dishonor, but entitled to the gratitude of the country. A laxness of discipline among the soldiers, owing to the depressed spirit of the officers, and the general distress of the army, was rapidly prevailing. Had the officers then abandoned the service, their places, if supplied at all, must have been filled by men without military skill or experience, who would have been, alike, the subjects of contempt to the enemy and to the troops over whom they were placed in command. In such a state of affairs, it requires no spirit of prophecy to predict a total destruction to the cause.

At this important crisis, Congress, with the view of retaining the officers in the service, and as an inducement for them to continue, resolved, "that officers who should continue in service to the end of the war, should have half pay for seven years from the establishment of peace." In 1779, by a resolution, they recommended to the several States to grant to the officers of the respective lines, who should continue in service to the end of the war, half pay for life. The State of Pennsylvania was the only one which made such a grant, and whether it was in pursuance of the requisition of Congress or not, I am unable to say. It was, however, totally neglected on the part of all the other States. In 1780, at the most gloomy period of war, Congress, in pursuance of the same system of justice and sound policy, resolved "that half pay for life be granted to the officers in the army of the United States, who shall continue in service to the end of the war."

We will now inquire, sir, how this contract was performed on the part of the Government. In November, 1782, the preliminary articles of peace were signed. Hostilities soon afterwards ceased. The independence of the colonies was acknowledged. The chain that bound them to the British throne was parted forever; and the United States took the rank of a sovereign nation. The engagement on the part of the officers was performed. Their duties consummated. No considerations of expediency or policy could then justify the Government in a failure on its part, or sanction an evasion of the obligation. I ask gentlemen to test the principle in this case by the sense of honor and probity by which, as honest men, they are governed in their own transactions. The fundamental principles of justice are universal; and though Governments have the power, they have not the moral right to disregard them. But we will pursue the history of the transaction to its termination. At the conclusion of the war, Congress, for reasons known to us all, was unable to provide funds for the payment of the arrears due to the army, or for securing to the officers the stipend promised by their resolution of the year 1780. A new engagement was then tendered to the officers in lieu of the provisions of that resolution. And here, sir, I beg leave to correct the honorable gentleman from Virginia, who says this engagement was entered into at the solicitation of the officers. I believe, sir, on recurring to the history of the times, he will find that such is not the fact. I think it more probable, sir, as stated by the honorable member from Tennessee, (Mr. MITCHELL,) that the measure was forced upon the consideration of Congress by the clamors of the citizens, who conceived a pension establishment to be inconsistent with the policy of a Republican Government. However this may be, it certainly originated with Congress, and was not adopted in pursuance of any request from the officers themselves. In March, 1783, Congress adopted a resolution in the following terms:

"That five years full pay should be given to the officers, in money or securities, bearing an interest of six per cent. per annum, as should be most convenient to Congress, to be paid as to other creditors of the United States, in lieu of half pay for life. Provided, however, that this commutation be accepted or refused by lines and corps, and not by officers individually; and that such acceptance or refusal should be signified by the Commander-in-Chief to Congress, from the lines under his immediate command, in two months."

To this offer the officers of the army acceded; certain certificates, on which I shall hereafter remark, were subsequently issued and accepted by them. This resolution was intended by Congress as a substitute for the resolution of 1780. It is now contended that the acceptance of the commutation by the officers, operated as a full and complete discharge to the Government from the obligations of the former resolution. To this it may be answered, that there was not a performance on the part of the Government of this new contract; and that the fulfilment of it was in the nature of a condition precedent, to the binding effect of the acceptance by the officers. By the resolution, Congress agreed to give in money or securities; and such were its terms at the time the commutation was accepted by the officers. I wish it to be borne in mind, that the agreement to the commutation and the subsequent acceptance of the certificates were distinct acts, and took place under very different circumstances. Congress, in pursuance of this new engagement, did not give in money. And it will not be pretended that the certificates which they afterwards issued even partook of the nature of securities. By securities, we understand some valuable property, some distinct fund set apart and specially appropriated as a guarantee for payment. The certificates which were issued were merely evidences of the debts which, by the resolution, they had agreed, as one of the alternatives, to secure; and that they were not securities in fact was proved by their almost total failure, in the hands of the unfortunate men who were deluded by the acceptance of them. In agreeing to the commutation, we are bound to infer that the officers understood and believed they were to receive what they had consented to regard as an equivalent for the valuable lien which they had on the public faith, for the provision of half-pay under the resolution of 1780; and such were undoubtedly the inducements held out to them by the Government. That the certificates which were issued as a compliance with the resolution, were of comparatively trifling value; and that, in most instances, the officers parted with them for sums infinitely less than their nominal amount, are matters of public notoriety. It is immaterial whether the depreciation was owing to inability, or want of due exertions on the part of the Government to provide such securities for their payment as would keep the certificates at their par value in the market. It is sufficient that it was not attributable to causes within the control of those who held them; and whatever may be the rule of law or morals that would govern an individual in a similar case, it is not for the Government, under such peculiar circumstances, to say that the holders parted with them voluntarily, and that they might have retained them until they were restored to their nominal value. In determining the rule of equity that ought to govern in such a case, a due consideration should be had to the situation and condition of the parties. Did the officers agree to accept the commutation voluntarily?

Influenced by the same feelings of patriotism that originally induced them to take up arms in defence of the liberties of the country, when the object was attained, they consented to lay them down and disperse. They thus abandoned the power which they certainly had, of controlling the operations of the Government, and compelling a redress of their individual grievances—a power to the exercise of which they were excited by the most powerful motives—and in refraining from the use of it, they gave an evidence of pure and holy devotion to the liberty and happiness of their country, which is without a parallel in the history of former ages. The Government was thus left secure in its power to act as circumstances or policy might dictate. The honorable chairman of the committee (Mr. HEMPHILL) has remarked that no censure is due to the Government in this transaction. I confess, sir, that on a critical examination of the whole affair, my mind had almost arrived at a different conclusion. The resolution of 1783 would almost seem to have been drawn in anticipation of such a state of things. I will not say that it was the work of a crafty politician—but I will say, that the terms of it were calculated most effectually to mislead the judgments of the class of men on whom it was intended to operate. The promise was, to pay in money or securities, at the option of Government. The resolution was passed in March; the agreement to accept the commutation made the Summer following—I repeat, sir, the agreement to accept the commutation—the certificates were issued the Winter following. It is a matter of demonstration by well-ascertained rules of calculation, that the amount thus offered, even if paid in its best terms, was not a fair equivalent for the right which the officers relinquished.

TUESDAY, April 25.

Revolutionary Officers.

The House, on motion of Mr. HEMPHILL, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. WEBSTER in the chair, on the bill "for the relief of the surviving officers of the army of the Revolution."

Mr. DRAYTON addressed the committee.

The object of this bill, said Mr. D., is to provide a compensation for a loss which the surviving officers of the Revolution have sustained in consequence of their not receiving what they were entitled to. The question to be resolved is, What were they entitled to? And the solution to this question will be afforded by a brief statement of the facts.

The honorable chairman of the committee, in explaining and enforcing the case of the claimants, was under the necessity of referring to a number of documents, letters, and resolutions of Congress; and also to enter into a variety of details and arithmetical calculations, which unavoidably rendered his statements long, and apparently complicated. From these causes, although his statement was clear and satisfactory, the points which should, exclusively, regulate our judgments, may have escaped some of the members of the committee. I shall, therefore, endeavor, in the remarks which I propose making, to confine myself to so much of the case of the claimants as is necessary to a perfect understanding of the grounds upon which it stands; and I feel assured, if its merits are perfectly understood, that a majority of the committee will be in favor of the bill which has been reported.

On the 21st October, 1780, Congress resolved that "half pay for life should be granted to the officers in the army of the United States, who shall continue in service to the end of the war."

On the 21st March, 1783, Congress passed a resolution, "that five years' full pay should be given to the officers, in money, or in securities, bearing an interest of six per centum per annum, as should be most convenient to Congress."

In November, 1783, certificates were delivered to the officers for arrears of pay, and for an amount equal to five years' full pay; but, when these certificates were delivered, no provision was made for the payment of the principal or the interest, nor was any interest ever paid upon them.

In 1791, when the funding system of the United States, after the Federal Constitution, came into operation, new certificates were delivered to the officers; but the arrears of interest due to them were funded at three per cent. instead of six, and the payment of one-third of the principal was deferred for ten years, without any interest. Such is the whole statement of facts necessary for the understanding of the nature and extent of the rights of the claimants.

From this statement, I think it is evident that the resolution of Congress, in 1780, was a conditional contract, which became perfect upon a compliance with the condition contained in it. The officers, by serving until the end of the war, did comply with that condition; having done so, under an executed contract for a full consideration, they were entitled to a compliance with its terms. If their case rested here, no doubt could exist as to the strict legality of their claim; but, as they accepted a substitution for this contract by acquiescing in the resolution of March, 1783, they would appear to be bound by this substitution. If, nevertheless, the circumstances under which they accepted, be taken into consideration, in equity and justice they ought not to be regarded as bound by it. The officers had recently left the army: they were in a state of utter destitution: delay in obtaining their dues presented to them the spectacle of ruin, and the prospect of speedy relief operated upon them with a force not to be resisted. Under these excitements, they could hardly be said to have been capable of exercising their judgments. When individuals have entered into bargains in similar situations, it is the ordinary practice of a Court of Equity to afford relief, and not to hold them bound under such contracts. But admitting these contracts to have been obligatory upon the officers, they were unquestionably entitled to a strict compliance with their terms: they were entitled to receive either money or securities, bearing an interest of six per cent., which interest ought to have been annually paid. No other meaning can fairly be annexed to the resolution of 1783, than that, under it, either money would be paid, or, that what was equivalent to money would be delivered. Money would have yielded an annual interest of six per cent., consequently, the securities given in lieu of money, to have been equivalent to money, should have carried an interest of six per cent., and that interest should have been annually discharged; but no interest was paid at all. Not receiving any part, either of principal or interest, most of the claimants, to relieve their pressing wants, were compelled to sell their certificates, and did not, upon an average, obtain more for them than about one dollar for eight dollars. But what was the condition of those who retained their certificates until 1791, when they were funded? Upon the certificates for interest due, no more than three per cent. was allowed, and the payment of one-third of the principal, without any interest, was postponed for ten years. By these proceedings, did the officers receive what they were entitled to? The departure from the intent and meaning of the resolution of 1783, is so obvious, that no comment or argument could render it plainer. I shall therefore resort to none.

Under these circumstances, is it not undeniable that the Government did not comply with their contract? Is it not a consequence, equally undeniable, that the Government is bound to make good any loss which has accrued to those whom they have injured by failing to perform their contract? Both these questions must be answered in the affirmative. Can any fact be more evident, then, than that the claimants are entitled to relief?

Mr. KIDDER followed on the same side of the question.

After a few remarks from Mr. BASSETT, in opposition to the bill, the question was put on filling the blank, which contains the appropriation, with one million of dollars, and decided in the affirmative—ayes 77, noes 48.

Mr. SPRAGUE addressed the committee as follows:

Mr. Chairman: Sufficient, perhaps, has already been said in behalf of the officers of the Revolution. I propose to say something for the soldiers also. I am in favor of the amendment which has just been offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. REED.) I believe that the soldiers of the Revolution have a just claim upon us for a much larger amount than any that has been proposed to be given to them. We owe them a just debt, and it arises from our violations of our engagements to them.

In the first place, as to their wages. We were bound to have paid them in money. This we did not do; but delivered them merely paper, or certificates of debt, which were not money; they were not the measure of value: but their own value fluctuated, according to the varying opinions of the times. They were an article of trade in the market, and, like every other kind of merchandise, their real value was their market price; which was from an eighth to a tenth of their nominal amount. The soldier, then, was compelled to receive an article at eight or ten times its real worth, so that, in fact, he obtained, at most, but an eighth part of his wages. I say, at most; at times, indeed, it was far less. The gravest of our historians has told us, that, at one time, such was the depreciation, that the pay of a captain would not have furnished the shoes in which he marched against the enemy; and many expended their little all in supplying themselves with the humble accommodations which their stations required. We have thus paid to the soldiers but a small fraction of their wages. Our country was in the condition of an insolvent debtor, and made but a small dividend among its creditors. Why should we not now, when we have the abundant means, make payment of the residue? It has been said that we should pay nothing now, because it has cost the United States the full nominal amount, as the Government eventually redeemed the paper. If it were so, what matters that to the soldier? If a creditor is offered an article at ten times its value, in discharge of his demand, is it of any consequence to tell him how much it cost the debtor? Suppose we had compelled the soldier to take any other specific article at such an enhanced price, and he had remonstrated against being thus defrauded, would it be any answer to say to him, "We purchased the article on credit, and our credit was so bad, that it cost us much more than it was worth?"

Sir, that which we did deliver, in payment, rested wholly upon our credit. If that credit was so defective that it cost us ten times its real value, is the whole loss to be thrown upon the soldier? Was it his fault that we did not discharge our duty, and sustain our credit?

But again, it is objected, if he had retained the paper long enough, he might have obtained full payment. That is, if he had kept the article on hand for a series of years, it might have risen in value. And what if it had? Does not every one know, that the price which a thing bears, when it is received in payment, determines the amount of the debt thereby discharged, and that its subsequent rise or depression, cannot increase or diminish it? And, besides this, are we to say to the poor soldier, who expended his last farthing in our defence, who could not even reach his home without charity, and was compelled to part with his certificate to save himself and his children from starvation—shall we say to him, you ought to have kept your paper ten long years, and then you might have obtained the full amount? It is but a mockery of his wrongs to tell him—if you had done what was impossible, you might have been paid. I will not pause to estimate the amount of loss sustained by depreciation, because the reflection of a moment must satisfy every one that it very far exceeds the sum named in the bill and the amendment.

But, sir, independently of the depreciation, we have never yet paid the full amount of the paper or certificates which we compelled the soldier to receive. It is well known that, in the funding of the public debt, which took place nearly ten years after the close of the war, and more than ten years after much of the debt was contracted, the interest was not paid, but funded on interest of three per cent. payable at the pleasure of the Government. The principal was not paid; but two-thirds was funded at an interest of six per cent., and interest on the other third was deferred for ten years. From this statement merely, the loss of the creditor does not appear to be great; but in order to exhibit it truly, let us take an example, and compute the loss sustained by the holder of paper for one thousand dollars. The simple interest for ten years, was six hundred dollars, which was funded at three per cent. Such was the pressure of the times, and the high rate of interest, at that period, that it has been estimated that the amount thus funded, was worth but fifty per cent. To be within bounds, suppose the difference to be one-third, then the six hundred dollars thus funded, was worth but four hundred dollars, and the loss was two hundred dollars.

One-third of the principal bore no interest for ten years. Simple interest for that time, on one-third of a thousand dollars, amounted to two hundred dollars more, making the loss four hundred dollars. Simple interest upon this sum, for thirty years, exceeds seven hundred dollars, which, added to the four hundred, makes the loss which the holder of paper, to the amount of one thousand dollars, has suffered, by the mode and time of payment adopted by the Government, to exceed eleven hundred dollars; so that the sum which we withheld, out of that which we had solemnly promised, in writing, with simple interest only, is now more than the original amount of the debt.

Again, sir: the soldier had a right to demand money of us; and that, too, at a time when he was in the utmost distress for it. If we could not pay it, we should, at least, have put the debt on interest, payable quarterly, as a fund debt from the beginning. This we could have done; and as we did not, we are now bound to place him in as good condition as he would have been in if we had performed our duty. And, if we had paid interest quarterly, could he not have realized as much as interest compounded, annually? Would not every honorable man pay so much to an individual whom he had thus wronged? And if gentlemen will make the computation by this rule, they will find that we should now pay more than three thousand dollars to every one who was an original creditor to the amount of one thousand! A startling amount truly! Gentlemen, however, need not be alarmed; they are not asked for such a sum, nor any thing like it. Only a small part, even of the simple interest, is now requested. But I thought it not amiss to suggest to them how much might be demanded, upon principles which it would be difficult, in fairness, to contest. So much for the loss to our creditor. Was there not a corresponding gain to ourselves? I know it has been said, that we paid and redeemed our paper. But, sir, it is a matter of history, that, by the mode of payment, as it has been called, or rather, by the non-payment of our domestic debt, we saved the full amount of thirteen millions of dollars out of the sum which we had expressly promised—out of the face of our bond! If this sum had been paid or funded, then we must have paid interest upon it until the present time; for we have never yet been out of debt; and our national finances are now in a better condition, by at least fifty millions of dollars, than they would have been if we had fully paid our domestic debt. We have, then, in our hands, fifty millions of dollars which belong to our creditors, and which sum we have no right to retain, if they come forward to claim it. And now the most meritorious of those creditors ask for less than one year's interest of that sum, and yet we are told that we ought to reject their demand.

The soldiers of the Revolution might present still further claims upon us. When we enlisted them into our service, we entered into other engagements with them besides the payment of their wages. We bound ourselves to furnish them suitable food, clothing, tents, and medicines, and all the necessities of a soldier's life. How was this stipulation fulfilled? Let our history, let Washington himself answer this question. How often, and how feelingly do they repeat and reiterate the wants and sufferings of the army, through our violation of our engagements! They declare that "actual famine" existed in the army; that the soldiers "had been half the time without provisions," and had "no magazines, nor money to form them;" that they "were bereft of every hope from the Commissaries; and, at one time, the soldiers ate every kind of horse food but hay, and were perpetually on the point of starving." As to clothes, they declare, that "neither the bodies nor feet of the soldiers were protected from the frosts and cold of the inclement season; and, after being exposed through the day to the rigors of Winter, night brought no relief;" that "they were without clothes and without blankets, and at one time, amid the frosts of Winter, nearly three thousand men were bare-foot in camp, besides the number confined to the hospitals for want of shoes." And Washington describes their distress in these emphatic words: "Our sick, naked! our well, naked! our unfortunate men in captivity, naked!"

Such, we are told by the highest authorities, was the lamentable deficiency of the primary articles of food and clothing; and that, as to all minor necessities, they were almost unknown. They tell you that, in every department, the utmost distress prevailed, and that many, very many, sunk under their accumulated hardships; that, from incessant toil, from insufficient and unwholesome food, from want of vegetables, want of tents, and want of clothes, great sickness prevailed; the hospitals were crowded, and the medical department being unprovided, great mortality followed, and unusual numbers were carried from the hospitals to the grave. Do not sufferings like these deserve some consideration? Will not the merest niggard of justice, calculating only dollars and cents, admit that they have a right to demand from us the value of the food and clothing, and other necessities, which we wrongfully withheld? And will not every mind, imbued with sentiments of moral right, spontaneously declare with Washington, that compensation ought also to be made to them for the tortures we inflicted, by our neglect, and violation of our duty? The amount I will not attempt to estimate. Let gentlemen recur to our Revolutionary struggle, and consult their own hearts and their own judgments, and then say what is due to the soldier, who, feeble, and sinking for want of food and sustenance, marched, during the day, through snow and ice, on naked feet, exposed unclad to the Winter's cold, with no resting-place at night but the earth, and no covering but the skies: passing through sufferings which human nature could not sustain unbroken; and falling a prey to pestilence, more deadly and far more terrific than the sword of the enemy. Cheerfully did he face the cannon's mouth, and dare a soldier's death on the field of honor; but what rewards, in your power to bestow, would have purchased his consent to meet all the loathsome forms of disease; to breathe the hospital's nauseous contagions, or the corruption of a prison ship, and linger through protracted tortures, unheeded and unknown, towards an inglorious death? Let him who has felt the withering hand of disease, say what atonement we should make, for causing horrors like these.

I have thus, sir, endeavored to state the grounds upon which I contend that injustice has been done to the soldiers of the Revolution. In the first place, making payment of their wages in depreciated paper. Secondly, withholding a part even of the nominal amount, which we had promised. And, thirdly, other breaches of contract, on our part, causing peculiar privations and sufferings to them.

And now I would ask, sir, who are the men whom we have thus grievously wronged? Are they mere hirelings, to whom we should be content to weigh out justice by the grain and scruple, or are they our greatest earthly benefactors? They were actuated by higher and purer motives than any soldiers that ever assembled, and exhibited a spectacle of unyielding fortitude, and self-denying magnanimity, unequalled in the annals of mankind. Others, under a momentary enthusiasm, or in the hurrying fever of battle, have fought as desperately. Others, when far from succor and from their country, have endured and persevered for individual self-preservation. But where, in all history, is an example of a soldiery, with no power to control them, who, in a single day, perhaps, could have reached their homes in safety, voluntarily continuing to endure such protracted miseries, from no motive but inward principle and a sense of duty? They were imbued with a loftier and more expanded spirit of patriotism and philanthropy, and achieved more for the happiness of their country, and of mankind, than any army that ever existed. And where is there an example of moral sublimity, equal to their last act of self-devotion, after peace and independence had been conquered? That army, who had dared the power and humbled the pride of Britain, and wrested a nation from her grasp; that army, with swords in their hands, need not have sued and begged for justice. They could have righted their own wrongs, and meted out their own rewards. The country was prostrate before them; and if they had raised their arms, and proclaimed themselves sovereign, where was the power that could have resisted their sway? They were not unconscious of their strength, nor did they want incitements to use it.

The author of the celebrated Newburg letters told them, your country disdains your cries, and tramples upon your distresses. He conjured them, in the most eloquent and energetic language, to exert the power which they held, and never lay down their arms until ample justice had been obtained. He warned them, if once disarmed and dispersed, your voice will sink; your remonstrances will be unheard; you will grow old in poverty, and wade through the vile mire of dependency. What was their answer, when thus urged and thus tempted? With one voice they spurned the dark suggestions, voluntarily surrendered their arms, and submitted themselves unconditionally to the civil power. It was then that their illustrious commander said, in the words read by the gentleman from Pennsylvania yesterday, "Had this day been wanting, the world had never seen the last stage of perfection which human nature is capable of attaining."

They quietly dispersed and parted for their homes, in every part of your wide domain, unrewarded, penniless, carrying with them nothing but the proud consciousness of the purity and dignity of their conduct, and a firm reliance upon their country's honor and their country's faith. And what return has been made to them? Have they not found your high-blown honor a painted bubble, and your plighted faith a broken reed? Have not those dark predictions of your ingratitude, which you then indignantly repelled, as slanders foul and base, at which you were ready to exclaim, "is thy servant a dog, that he should do this thing?"—have they not been too much realized? Have not the petitions of the soldiers of the Revolution been disregarded? Have they not grown old in poverty? Do they not now owe the miserable remnant of their lives to charity? Sir, if we change not our conduct towards them, it must crimson with shame the front of history.

Mr. EVERETT addressed the committee as follows:

Mr. Chairman: If I consulted only my inclination, I should certainly leave the cause of the Revolutionary officers in the powerful and eloquent advocacy of my honorable friend (Mr. SPRAGUE) who has just taken his seat. I should be desirous of avoiding the appearance of attempting to say over again, what he has so happily and so forcibly urged in their behalf. It is, however, a subject on which my sense of duty will not allow me to give a silent vote; and I must therefore ask the indulgence of the committee, while I endeavor, very cursorily, to answer some of the objections which have been urged to the passage of the bill, and while I briefly state some of the reasons for which I shall vote for the bill, and for the amendment of my honorable colleague, (Mr. REED.)

It has been objected, sir, to the claim of the Revolutionary officers, that it is one, not of justice, but of gratitude. This description of the claim does not, I confess, carry a very distinct idea to my mind. I understand what would be meant by saying, that it is a claim, not on our justice, but our generosity. This might be said of a claim founded on services not entitled to compensation, but presenting a fair occasion for the exercise of liberality. But a claim on our gratitude must surely be founded on real and important services. These services must, of course, create a claim also on our justice, which can only be discharged by full and ample compensation. That, certainly, has never been done in the case of the Revolutionary officers; and if their claim is, therefore, as is admitted, a claim on our gratitude, it is, for the same reason, a claim on our justice.

The respected gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. ALEXON,) said that he was one of those who, when an account had been paid, wished to have it closed, and hear no more about it. So am I, sir, but not till it has been paid. I am one of those who will not agree to an account's being closed, till it is paid, whether I stand in the relation of a creditor or a debtor. If I am the debtor, it shall not be closed till I have paid the uttermost farthing, which nothing but inevitable necessity shall prevent my doing. If I am the creditor, it shall not be closed till it is paid, unless my debtor be unable to discharge it; and then, if he is poorer than I, I will forgive the debt.

Revolutionary Officers.

[H. OF R.]

Sir, how was this account paid, which the gentleman wishes to consider as closed? It was paid after a total bankruptcy of the country. I do not reproach her necessities; God forbid! But I say, that, when the country settled with the Army of the Revolution, she was insolvent, she was bankrupt: she made a paltry dividend, 2s. 6d. in the pound. Now we have grown rich; we are rolling in wealth; our old creditor, in the extremity of age, and often in want, comes and asks for a little relief out of our abundance. We tell him we paid him forty years ago; that we have his discharge in our pocket, and bid him begone. The gentleman said, when an account was settled and paid, he wished to hear no more about it. Sir, I want to hear one thing more about it—that it was fully paid and fairly settled.

Mr. Chairman, it is objected to the passage of this bill, that some of those, for whom it provides relief, remained in possession of their certificates of final settlement, until they rose to the par value, or even above it. If I thought that any considerable number of the surviving officers of the Revolution were in this situation, I do not know that I should be unwilling to introduce such provisos and limitations into the bill, as would exclude such persons from participating in its benefits.

But, sir, I do not suppose that any gentleman who hears me, believes that the number of the officers of the Revolution who were thus able to reserve their certificates, and fund them at par, can be so considerable as to make it important to take their case into special consideration. Be they few or many, I am not prepared to allow, that even they ought, as a matter of justice, to be shut out from the provisions of the bill. They were entitled to money or available securities. You gave them no money, and securities worth but an eighth of their nominal value. They had, perhaps, a pittance which enabled them to live from day to day, without sacrificing their certificates at the market value. These they reserved, not knowing that they would eventually be worth the paper on which they were printed. They speculated in their own funds, not voluntarily, but by compulsion; and I cannot think that their having done so, unquestionably in a very few cases, of which it does not appear that any one is among those now presented to our consideration, ought to form a reason for excluding them, far less all the other surviving officers, from the benefits contemplated by this bill.

It has been made an objection to this bill, that it tends to enlarge the pension system of the United States. Sir, nothing is more decidedly in opposition to a Republican policy, not merely than the enlargement of a pension system, but than the existence of any thing which could be properly called by that name. But let us not be misled by a word, particularly in this case, in which a word, rendered odious by its abuses in other countries, is to be applied to objects in this country, of a nature totally dissimilar. My honorable friend (Mr. SPRAGUE) has already alluded to the definition given of a pension by the great English lexicographer, who unluckily found himself before long in the situation of a pensioner. Permit me again to draw the attention of the committee to this memorable definition. "Pension—an allowance made to any one without an equivalent. In England, it is generally understood to mean pay given to a State hireling for treason to his country."

Sir, I will drop the latter part of this definition, where the feelings of the partisan appear to have disturbed the judgment of the critic. I will take only the part of the definition intended to be exact: "An allowance made without an equivalent." Without an equivalent! And is this the character we are going to give to the frugal allowance proposed for those who led the Armies of the Revolution? Pensioner! Does any honorable man affect to give that name to one who, in his employment, exerts his talents, and spends his life zealously, faithfully, indefatigably? Is the fair compensation for services rendered, to be called by the odious name of a pension? Sir, pass this bill, adopt the amendment of my honorable colleague, (Mr. REED,) give the survivors of the Revolution all they ask, and ten times more than they ask, and which generation will still be in arrears; we to our fathers, or they to us? which will have done the most for the other; they, in achieving by their toils and blood, the independence we enjoy, or we in solacing their age by these poor gratuities? which generation is dependent on the bounty of the other? which is the pensioner of the other?

Sir, it is said that other classes suffered as much as those for whom relief is now asked; that the distress and privation were general, and that the Army bore no more than its share in the common calamities. There was suffering enough on all sides, Heaven knows, and it fell, it is true, not less on the citizen at home, than on the soldier in the camp. But the Army, in suffering as such, was not exempt from its share of the general calamity. They did not cast off the character and relations of citizens. No, sir, while they were suffering all the hardships of the camp and of the field, they were also suffering in all their interests at home, in common with the rest of the community. Sir, the wealth, or rather let me say, the frugal competence of the great mass of the citizens of the United States, then as now, consisted in the labor of the citizen's own hand, applied to the cultivation of a little farm, or the management of some other small property.

Such unquestionably was the case with those for whom relief is provided by this bill. They belonged to a class of society whose personal attendance, labor, and care, are their chief property. What brings the most grievous distress on such a class of society? Not the fluctuations and obstructions of the market; not the failure of crops of great staple products, which do not depend upon the presence or absence of an opulent proprietor. No, sir, the citizens of this class are most distressed when an industrious member is called away from the little circle; when an active son or brother is lost to the aged father or helpless sisters, who depend on his aid to carry on the frugal operations of that domestic industry, which is necessary to the common subsistence and comfort. The absence from home of those most needed, in this way, was the chief cause of that general wreck of small fortunes, which was one great feature of the universal distress. I myself, sir, know families, from which, not one alone, but two, and even three, who were most wanted at home, were yielded to the common cause; from which, when Joseph was not, and Simeon was not, the voice of a bleeding country called Benjamin away also. And however great the sacrifice, the call was obeyed, as is well known from many a touching anecdote of those eventful times. Let me quote but one from the memorials of that day on which the first blood of the Revolution was shed in that district of which I am the humble representative: "The day that the report of this affair reached Barnstable, a company of militia immediately assembled and marched off to Cambridge. In the front rank there was a young man, the son of a respectable father, his only child. In marching from the village, as they passed his house, he came out to meet them. There was a momentary halt. The drum and fife paused for an instant. The father, suppressing a strong and evident emotion, said, 'God be with you all, my friends! and John, if you, my son, are called into battle, take care that you behave like a man, or else let me never see your face again.'"

Yes, sir, the spirit of the day was equal to its trials; but let us not talk of the soldier as exempt in any degree from the common suffering of the citizen: when the fact, that he was absent from home in the Army, might be the heaviest blow to the prosperity of his family, and to his own prosperity as a member of it. It deserves also to be recollected, that the sufferings of the country, after the close of the war, were probably more severe, on the whole, than during its continuance. The burdens of the war were then consolidated on society; a considerable source of wealth, the expenditure of the foreign troops, was dried up; the ardor of the contest was gone, and ruin came home to almost every door. Tradition can tell us of instances where the farmer's oxen were unyoked by the tax-gatherer from the plough. Such was the state of things which drove a portion of the citizens of my own State to madness; such was the condition of the homes to which those, who had borne the hardships and perils of the war, too often returned. Let us not then imagine, sir, that the army, in the midst of its peculiar privations, was, in the least degree, spared from its portion of general calamity.

It is said, that the relief which this bill provides for the surviving officers of the Revolution, is a premium on old age. Sir, that expression sounds harshly to my ear. The term premium, when thus used, reminds me of those measures in political economy which are resorted to, in order to stimulate production. We say that heavy duties on foreign fabrics are a premium on domestic manufactures—that injudicious alms-giving is a premium on pauperism. The provisions of this bill are not to have the effect of multiplying the numbers of the aged and venerable persons to whom it looks. Sir, they are dropping fast into the grave; your bounty will come too late to produce that effect upon them, which, at an earlier stage, might have enabled them to bid defiance to the various foes of life. The most it can do will be to soothe their decline. At all events, it will not increase their number; and considering who they are, I would rather call it a solace and a comfort, than a premium for old age.

I am sorry, sir, that we cannot go further at this time; that in making provision for the surviving veteran, we cannot also make provision for the widow and children of those who are deceased. Nothing but the well-settled conviction, that the bill, as already proposed to be amended by my colleague, is the best bill which can be carried through the House, reconciles me to omit from it the amendment, suggested yesterday by another honorable colleague and friend, (Mr. DWIGHT.) But, sir, we must be contented to do what good we can, and not refuse to do any good, because we cannot do all good. The case of the survivors is a case by itself; it has been investigated; their number is nearly ascertained; and the appropriation proposed is calculated to afford a certain relief to those who share it. Whenever the case of the widows and children shall, by any honorable gentleman, be proposed to Congress in such a manner that we can also act with discretion upon it, it shall not want my feeble aid.

But, sir, we have a national debt to be paid off. The topic, in one view of it, was treated with great ability, by my friend from Maine; and it was also very pertinently observed by the honorable Chairman of the committee, (Mr. HEMPHILL,) in the able argument with which he introduced its discussion, that the provisions of the bill, if carried into effect, would not delay the payment of the national debt more than sixty or ninety days. This national debt is a standing theme. I do not remember a debate or a question of appropriation, this season, not even on poor Mrs. Denney's pension, in which the payment of the national debt has not been recommended to our anxious consideration. On this subject, therefore, I will ask to be pardoned a word. I know, sir, it is a sound Republican maxim, to pay off the national debt. I am no believer in the proposition, that a national debt is a national blessing. It is in the spirit of our institutions, that the Government should stand in as few and simple relations as possible to the people; that there should be as little Government as possible; that the people should do as much as possible for themselves. It is a violation of these sound doctrines, that Government should stand towards a portion of the citizens in a perpetuated relation of debtorship to a vast amount. For this reason, it is desirable to pay off the debt. But as a financial operation, to relieve or disembarass the people, it is, in my present view of the subject, little better than a farce; almost as much so as the operations of the English sinking fund were at a time when vast loans were annually made; in other words, when the money was borrowed to place in the hands of the commissioners. Sir, you pay off five millions of the national debt, we will suppose, this year. What is gained by so doing? You are relieved, it will be answered, from the necessity of paying the interest on five millions of dollars. Granted: but where do you get five millions, by which you pay off so much of the debt? You take it, of course, by taxation, direct or indirect, from the pockets of the people. In other words, you deprive them of it, and the interest on it, forever. What, then, have you gained by the operation? You have taken a sum of money out of one pocket, and put it into the other. I said this grave procedure was almost a farce. In its direct operation, it is; in its remote results, it is a great loss to the country. The debt is now about eighty millions. Twenty-five years hence, our population will be doubled; our wealth, no doubt, much more than doubled, but, to be within bounds, let us say it will be doubled. A nominal debt of eighty millions, twenty-five years hence, will be no more burdensome than one of forty millions now. In other words, time, and the happy progress of the country, would of themselves reduce the debt, if you would leave the thing to their silent operation, as fast, perhaps, as the public welfare demands. By hastening to pay the debt, we therefore increase the country's burden. No member of this committee will doubt that, if the debt were not redeemable, it could be funded at four per cent. This would be of itself paying near twenty millions out of the eighty; this would be a gain indeed. But, no, Mr. Chairman, we insist upon paying it off now at six per cent. However, sir, I do not wish to pursue this subject. I am content to have suggested a reason, why the national debt may be left to be considered at the proper time, when the reports of the Committee of Ways and Means are before the House. I will only add, that there is no analogy between the national debt and debt between man and man. The national debt is the evidence of a capital consumed in the public service. No operation of finance can restore what has thus been destroyed. If the objects for which this capital was consumed were good, the expenditure was wise and proper; if not, it was improvident; but the paying, or leaving it unpaid, in no degree affects the wealth of the nation, except as I have already represented it; and ought not, therefore, ever to come into consideration, to prevent our making further expenditure for necessary or laudable objects.

Revolutionary Officers.

There is one consideration, Mr. Chairman, which, as often as I have revolved this subject in my mind, has seemed to call upon us, for very shame, to do something for these men. It is this, that liberal provision has been, and continues to be made, by the English Government, for those who, in that country, are called American loyalists—in this country, refugees and tories. Sir, I have myself seen the contrast to which I allude; I have seen the declining days of a person, who had filled a very subordinate post in the public service before the year 1775, made comfortable by the liberal provision of the British Government. Yes, sir, I have seen the imperial arm of her charity stretched out across the Atlantic, to support him in the winter of life, while the veteran of the Revolution was absolutely suffering, in the same neighborhood, for the want of such relief as this bill would afford. Gentlemen all know, that the provision for the American loyalists still forms an item in the annual budget in Great Britain; that a portion of the bounty is dispensed in this country; while, even in his amendment, my worthy colleague has thought it necessary to make residence in the United States a condition of receiving this late and poor provision. I do not object to this practically, I presume it will deprive no one of what he would otherwise receive; but I would willingly have emulated the bounty which knows how to pursue its rightful objects to the end of the earth.

Consider, for a moment, the amount of the expenditure for the military service of the year on our present establishment. The entire annual cost of the military defence of the country, including, indeed, the expensive articles of fortifications and engineering, is five millions of dollars. Sir, I make no unfriendly reflections on any part of this expenditure, either for the permanent and durable objects, or for the annual service of the military force of the country. I voted, carefully, for the whole appropriation. But I pray you, sir, remember that, at the rate of five millions per annum, we have paid, since the year 1817, forty millions of dollars; while the entire war debt of the Revolution—the whole debt for military and naval, domestic and foreign service, was but forty-two millions, as estimated in 1788. While, then, in eight years of these piping times of peace, we pay, for the various objects of military expenditure, an amount nearly equal to the whole war debt of the Revolution, can it be said that we ought not, or cannot, make this poor appropriation, to pay a part of that unliquidated debt of honor and justice, which is now urged upon us? Can we, sir, but three months after voting these great appropriation bills for the military expenditure of a season of profound peace, can we turn from our door the scarred and gray-haired veteran of the war, which gave being to our nation? Sir, I cast no imputation on our Army, or its Officers. They do all that can be done in time of peace; as some of them, in our last struggle, did all that could be done by gallant men, in time of war; but I know they themselves would be the last to say, that they deserved an earlier and prompter provision, than the heroes of the Revolution.

Sir, if this act of grateful justice is ever to be performed, now is the time for its performance. The present year completes the half century since the Declaration of Independence; and most devoutly do I hope, that, when the silver trumpet of our political jubilee sounds, it may be with a note of comfort and joy to the withered heart of the war-worn veteran of the Revolution. Our tardy provision will, indeed, come too late to help him through the hard journey of life; it will not come too late to alleviate the sorrows of age, and smooth the pillow of decline. Sir, it is the fiftieth year of our Independence. How much we shall read, how much we shall hear, how much, perhaps, we shall say this year, about the glorious exploits of our fathers, and the debt of gratitude we owe them. I do not wish this to be all talk. I want to do something. I want a substantial tribute to be paid them. Praise, sir, is sweet music, both to old and young; but I honestly confess that my mind relucts and revolts, by anticipation, at the thought of the compliments with which we are going to fill the ears of these poor veterans, while we leave their pockets empty, and their backs cold. If we cast out this bill, I do hope that some member of this House, possessing an influence to which I cannot aspire, will introduce another, to make it penal to say a word on the fourth of July, about the debt of gratitude which we owe to the heroes of the Revolution. Let the day and the topic pass in decent silence. I hate all gag-laws; but there is one thing I am willing to gag—the vaporing tongue of a bankrupt, who has grown rich, and talks sentiment, about the obligation he feels to his needy creditor, whom he paid off at 2s. 6d. in the pound.

Mr. ALSTON made some explanations, in reply to Mr. EVERETT, when the question was taken on filling the blank in the amendment with “twelve hundred thousand dollars,” and carried—ayes 81, nays 39.

Mr. WARD then offered the following, to be added as a sixth section:

“Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That each survivor in the militia, during the Revolutionary war, being now a resident of the United States, for the period of nine months in one term of service, shall, if a commissioned officer, receive twenty dollars per month; and, if he served in any other capacify, shall receive eight dollars per month, during his life.”

Mr. COOKE now suggested to Mr. WARD to modify this section, by inserting “three,” instead of “nine” months.

Mr. WARD accepted the modification, and the question being put on the section, as thus amended, it was adopted—yeas 66, nays 57.

Mr. MARTIN, expressing a desire to address the committee, but referring to the lateness of the hour, (it was now half-past four o'clock,) moved that the committee rise.

After a desultory conversation, the motion prevailed, and the committee rose.

Mr. BUCHANAN then moved to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the “bill for the relief of the Revolutionary officers,” with a view that its farther consideration might be conducted in the House.

Before any decision was had,
The House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, April 26.

The New Creek Treaty.

The following Message was received from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

WASHINGTON, 25th April, 1826.

I now transmit to both Houses of Congress, copies of a treaty with the Creek nation of Indians, concluded on the 24th day of January last, with a supplementary article, signed on the 31st of last month, which have been, with the advice and consent of the Senate, duly ratified. I send, at the same time, copies of the treaty superseded by them, signed at the Indian Springs, on the 12th of February, 1825. The treaty and supplementary article, now ratified, will require the aid of the Legislature for carrying them into effect. And I subjoin a letter from the Secretary of War, proposing an additional appropriation for the purpose of facilitating the removal of that portion of the Creek nation which may be disposed to remove west of the Mississippi; recommending the whole subject to the favorable consideration of Congress.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, April 24, 1826.

SIR: I have the honor to represent, that, from information lately received, a further sum of twenty thousand dollars, over and above that provided for in the 9th article of the late treaty with the Creeks, judiciously applied in indemnifying emigrants for their improvements in the unceded part of their Territory, as well within the limits of Alabama as of Georgia, (should indeed any portion of their land be found within the latter State in this predicament,) will tend to increase the number of emigrants, and thereby, to the extent of its influence, to promote the general policy of the United States, and I submit to you the propriety of communicating this subject to the consideration of Congress.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,
JAMES BARBOUR.

The President of the United States.

School Lands.

[H. OF R.]

School Lands.

The House then took up the bill "to appropriate lands for the support of schools in certain townships, and fractional townships, not before provided."

This bill had been before a Committee of the Whole; and the question now being on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading—

Mr. VINTON said, one word of explanation might be necessary to enable the House to understand the object of the bill. The ordinance of the 30th of May, 1785, which is the basis of the land system, had made provision for the support of schools, in the territory owned by the United States, and directed one thirty-sixth part, or one section of land, being section No. 16, to be reserved and set apart for the support of schools within each township. It was the evident intention of that law to make a general provision for the support of schools in the whole country owned by the United States; and constitutes one of the inducements of the settler to buy of the Government. Owing, however, to the manner in which the public lands are surveyed, this inducement is not always held out to the emigrant, and the intention of the ordinance is thus partially defeated. The public surveys are, in general, based on the navigable rivers, such as the Ohio, Mississippi, Missouri, &c.; the consequence of which is, that most of the townships situate upon the rivers are fractional townships, and, in very many of them, by a bend or turn in the river, section No. 16 is cut off, and the township, by this accidental circumstance, deprived of its school land. A denser population is generally found on the margin of these streams, than in any other part of the country, and hence it happens, that, in these fractional townships, where there is a greater necessity for schools than anywhere else, no provision at all has been made for their support. This bill proposes to place these townships upon a footing with the entire townships, by giving to them a quantity of land bearing the same proportion to a whole section of land, that the fractional township bears to a whole township. The bill further proposes to make provision for such entire townships of land as have been heretofore unprovided for. Of these, there are a few that have been granted by Congress without the reservation of a school section—among which, the township of land recently granted to General Lafayette is one, the inhabitants of which will be without any provision for the support of schools. The French grant, in the State of Ohio, is another tract of land in the same situation; to make provision for which, Mr. V. said, he held an amendment in his hand, proposing to appropriate one section and a quarter for the support of schools in that grant.

Mr. V. said it might be proper for him to say, before he sat down, that the bill and amendment had the entire approbation of the whole Committee on the Public Lands.

[The amendment offered by Mr. VINTON, proposed that a section and a quarter of land be granted for the support of schools in that tract of country usually called the French Grant, in the State of Ohio.]

Mr. COCKE, after some general observations in disapprobation of the facility with which Congress is in the practice of granting away the public lands, and expressive of his doubts of the expediency of this measure, inquired, whether the provisions of this bill came within the compact between the United States and the State of Ohio.

Mr. VINTON said, in reply, that the gentleman from Tennessee had inquired whether the United States were bound by their compact with the State of Ohio, to give school lands to these fractional townships. His answer to the inquiry was, that the bill was not confined to the State of Ohio, but embraced all the Western States wherever the surveys were based upon rivers or other public waters, or where, from any other cause, there might be a fractional township destitute of provision for schools. But, since the gentleman had spoken of the compact between Ohio and the United States, which, under the same terms, has been entered into with the other new States which have been admitted into the Union, he would say, that those fractional townships had a fair right to ask for the benefits of this bill, on the ground, that a compliance with the spirit of the compacts required it at our hands. Section No. 16, in each township, was given by the compacts with those States, in consideration of the promise by those States not to tax the public lands for five years after being sold. Now, sir, the fractional townships, as well as the entire townships, are not subject to the taxing power of the States where situated, until the expiration of that period after sale. The same remark is applicable to grants of land for any purpose lying within these States. They have no power to tax, whether the disposition of the land by the United States be by gift or sale, until five years shall have elapsed. The States having agreed to forego the right of taxation for the benefit of education, the equivalent given ought to be co-extensive with the right surrendered in favor of the United States; which surrender of the taxing right, as already observed, extends to all the lands embraced by the bill, and which ought, therefore, in justice and equity, to receive the benefit of the compact in common with all other lands.

But, Mr. V. said, if these considerations were wanting, he presumed the House would feel no reluctance in making this small appropriation of land for such an object, when we had already, this session, and every other session since he had been a member, given away far greater quantities of land, to men who had no other merit than that of having taken possession of the public lands, without any claim or shadow of right or authority, and in the face of the law to the contrary. Whereas, the provisions of this bill are intended to promote an object of the highest value and importance.

At this stage of the proceedings on the bill, a motion for adjournment was made and carried.

WEDNESDAY, May 8.

Case of Mrs. Decatur.

The House went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. BUCKNER in the chair, on the bill "to compensate Mrs. Susan Decatur, widow and representative of Captain Stephen Decatur, and others."

[The bill provides that — dollars be appropriated as a full compensation and remuneration to Susan Decatur, widow and representative of the late Captain Stephen Decatur, commander, and to the officers and crew, of the schooner Intrepid, for the capture and destruction of the frigate Philadelphia, before Tripoli; to be divided among the said Susan Decatur, the officers and crew aforesaid, or their representatives, in such manner that each individual shall receive such proportion thereof, according to his grade, as was paid to the captors of the Guerriere, Macedonian, and Java, of the same grade, of the compensation appropriated to them.]

The report of the Committee on Naval Affairs was read, together with sundry documents, relative to this case.

Mr. HOLCOMBE rose, and stated, that he had been authorized by the Committee on Naval Affairs, to move any sum for filling this blank with, which he might think proper. That, after a full examination of the claim, he had determined to propose the sum of one hundred thousand dollars. He, therefore, moved to fill the blank with one hundred thousand dollars; and immediately proceeded to state to the committee the facts and course of reasoning which had induced him to propose and defend this sum.

Lieut. Decatur could have removed the frigate Philadelphia from the harbor of Tripoli, after her re-capture, had not the peremptory orders of Com. Preble to the contrary, prevented him from making the attempt. This conclusion, Mr. H. said, appeared to him irresistible, from a variety of facts: the ship was carried with great gallantry, but without loss; and continued in uninterrupted possession of the captors for half an hour, in which time she was fired in various directions; and was not abandoned until the flames had involved the whole ship, even the rigging and tops, and were seen bursting (to use the language of Lieut. Decatur's report) from the ports and hatchways. Then, but not until the destruction of the ship had been made certain—not, indeed, until she had been placed beyond the reach of contingency to redeem—Lieut. Decatur and his brave associates boarded their gallant little ketch, (well named the Intrepid), and slowly and with much difficulty effected their retreat, by beating out of the harbor. The half hour consumed in destroying the ship was one of great interest. The wind (as Capt. Jones's letter and the pilot's testimony proves) which was entirely favorable (blowing off the shore) at the moment of carrying the frigate, and which continued so for nearly half an hour afterwards, suddenly veered about (such sudden changes are common to that region) and became decisively unfavorable—in fact, a head wind. The enemy, in the mean time, were in a state of perfect bewilderment. Boats filled with seamen and soldiers were seen rowing near the frigate. But not the slightest effort was made either to repulse the assailants, or arrest the retreat of the ketch. Not a gun was fired from the Tripolitan marine, which lay within pistol-shot distance from these vessels; and although the batteries finally opened upon them, their fire was so wild and irregular, as to take effect but in a single instance—a round shot passing through the top-gallant sail of the ketch! From the few facts thus loosely thrown together, Mr. H. considered himself sustained in the conclusion, that Lieut. Decatur, had his orders warranted the attempt, by cutting the cables of the Philadelphia immediately after carrying her, could have removed her in safety and triumph to a friendly port. Every thing was favorable to such a result. The wind was propitious—the pilot skilful and anxious for the enterprise; the ship, too, was ready for sea or for action, even to the loading of her guns and the bending of her sails. And the enemy were in a state of total incapacity either for pursuit or attack—panic-struck and paralyzed.

Mr. H. contended, if the ketch, scarcely a match for one of the smallest Tripolitan cruisers, after the enemy's first moments of dismay had subsided, with the wind ahead, were permitted to depart unmolested, that no attempt could have been made—no attempt would have been made, to have arrested the retreat of the frigate. The frigate was incomparably the safer place. Her defences were ample, and the crew of the Intrepid, unreduced by the gallant conquest which they had just achieved, were in sufficient numbers to have manned her batteries and made sail upon the ship. The half-hour consumed in her destruction would even have enabled the captors (so short was the distance, not two and a half miles) to have towed her into the open sea. But such an attempt would have been unnecessary: for the wind, as before observed, was favorable, and the pilot perfectly familiar with the harbor. From the whole history of this achievement, sustained by official documents, and reasoning from all analogy—all precedent—all probability—Mr. H. considered his first position as fully established: that Lieut. Decatur could have removed the frigate Philadelphia from the harbor of Tripoli, had not his orders prevented him from making the attempt.

Had the captors succeeded in removing their prize to a place of safety, they would have been entitled by the prize law of 1800 to the full value of the ship, to 250,000 or 300,000 dollars.

But, to obviate all difficulties on this point; to accommodate, as far as possible, all differences of opinion growing out of the question, whether she could or could not have been removed, the friends of the bill have resolved to consider her as worth to the captors one hundred thousand dollars in the harbor of Tripoli—which is the lowest sum, taking all risks—all probabilities of recapture, into consideration, at which they can consent to rate her. A regard for the memory of Commodore Decatur, and the honor of the brave men associated with him in this unequalled enterprise, Mr. H. said, forbade him to name a sum lower than this—a sum which might be defended, either upon the principle of right to which the captors were entitled by the law of 1800, or upon the principle of remuneration, as a reward for a meritorious and gallant action. And it was upon this mixed consideration, the consideration of remuneration and right, that this most interesting claim, in his opinion, was justly sustainable.

Mr. H. said he would now leave the defence of the bill upon the principle of right or capture, to its professional friends, and proceed to defend it upon other principles—upon the force of numerous precedents, and the uniform practice and policy of this country. For, if there be one principle, he said, more than any other, sustained by its uniform practice and policy, it was the principle of rewarding the captors of public ships of the enemy, or ships captured and destroyed at sea. The principle has obtained, in every case, since the organization of the navy, with this single, this remarkable exception. And gentlemen, he thought, would hardly presume to say, that the achievement under consideration was not at least equal in gallantry and merit to any other which has ever graced our annals: an achievement which, in the history of gallant actions, stands alone—“like the sun in the system, single and unapproachable.”

Mr. H. now asked the attention of the committee to the following precedents, as being among the most striking which sustain the claim. When Hull and Bainbridge sent the wrecks of the Guerriere and the Java to the bottom—burying with them the charm of English invincibility on the sea forever—they received 50,000 dollars, with the thanks of Congress, in each case; when Blakely—the ill-fated Blakely—in the language of a popular song of that day—

“Stopped the Avon’s course,
And overhauled the Reindeer;”— when the lamented Lawrence sunk the Peacock—exhibiting the most perfect specimen of marine gunnery which the world had ever seen; when Jones captured the Frolic; when Biddle closed the catalogue of our naval victories, by the capture and destruction of the Penguin, they all received the thanks of Congress, (and most richly—most gloriously they earned and deserved them,) various sums appropriated to the relative value of the ships captured and destroyed. In no case, I repeat, has remuneration ever before been withheld.

There are other precedents, Mr. Chairman, which go still further to establish the right of the captors of the Philadelphia to remuneration. I will briefly notice several of them:

1st. An act for the relief of Col. Lawrence, the officers and men, composing the garrison of Fort Boyer, in the year 1814.

This act allows them the same sum as prize money, for the destruction of the British sloop of war Hermes, as would have been allowed, if the said sloop of war had been captured by an equal naval force.

2d. An act for the relief of Pharoah Farrow and others.

This act distributes to Pharoah Farrow and his associates, the proceeds arising from the sale of two armed boats of an English ship of war, captured by them, during the late war.

3d. An act for the distribution of $100,000 among the captors of the Algerine vessels, captured and restored to the Dey of Algiers.

This act appropriates and distributes the above sum among the captors, after the mode prescribed by the law of distribution.

This act constitutes a strong precedent—remuneration having been demanded and made, although neither of the vessels in question had passed through the formalities of condemnation. The moment the American ensign is displayed over an enemy’s vessel, the right of the captors becomes perfect. Condemnation is a mere formality. The whole history of our maritime warfare sustains this doctrine. It has no exceptions.

Mr. H. also read several other acts of similar import.

Thus, sir, it appears, from the capture and destruction of a squadron, to the capture and destruction of the smallest armed boat of the enemy, the captors, in every instance, have received from the Government, with this signal exception, a liberal remuneration. Sir, I recall the assertion; they have not received a liberal remuneration. Their remuneration, on the contrary, has been a mere pittance—a miserable nothingness, compared with the glory of their achievements, and the public benefits which have resulted from them.

Liberal remuneration! Was Hull liberally remunerated, with fifty thousand dollars, and the thanks of Congress, for the capture and destruction of the Guerriere? An event which carried dismay into the bosom of a gallant people—and caused the trident to tremble in the hands which had swayed it, without a rival, since the days of Alfred.

Liberal remuneration! Was Bainbridge liberally remunerated for the capture and destruction of the Java? The most brilliant and decisive sea-fight, perhaps, ever fought between two single ships; and which settled, for one age at least, the question of superiority upon the sea.

Liberal remuneration! Was the gallant victory of the Cyane and Levant liberally remunerated? But, sir, it is useless to multiply instances; in no one case have the captors of the public ships of the enemy been liberally remunerated. Their remuneration, I repeat, has been signally incommensurate with the glory of their achievements, and the public benefits which have so largely resulted from them.

The policy of our country upon this point, has always been a most mistaken one. No nation ever has been, or can be, either beggaried or embarrassed, by an opposite course—by a system of munificence to its military benefactors. Liberality, in such cases, is the true economy of public expenditure. It is what Burke has strongly denominated the cheap defence of nations.

The captors of the Philadelphia are further entitled to remuneration, from the public benefits which have resulted from the achievement. It was an exploit, of all others, calculated to impress deeply and lastingly the policy of the Barbary States in their subsequent negotiations with this country.

Had Lieutenant Decatur succeeded in capturing or destroying, at sea, the whole of the Tripolitan fleet, the impression would have been comparatively transient—other nations had done the same. Had Lieutenant Decatur succeeded in silencing their batteries, or even in laying Tripoli itself in ruins, the impression also would have been comparatively transient—other nations had done the same. But, to descend in the silence of midnight—to burst in the very centre of their entire armaments, with the suddenness and shock of a thunderbolt, wrapping their proudest trophy in flames, and retreating from the presence of a whole nation in arms, unassailed and unpursued, was an exploit, so novel, so imposing, and so extraordinary, as to sink deep into the memory, as well as imagination, of the Mahometan, and leave impressions upon his fears and policy, which are as operative and vivid this day, as they were in the first moments of its consummation.

A striking illustration of this fact is afforded by Lord Exmouth's operations before Algiers. After negotiating for months; and after one of the bloodiest victories of modern warfare, he barely succeeded in extorting terms—the same terms which were instantaneously granted to the destroyer of the Philadelphia, by his mere presence before that city.

An American citizen who has resided for many years in one of the Barbary States, (Tunis,) and whose opportunities of observation and correct knowledge on this subject, are, perhaps, more ample than any other person's living, has volunteered, in the handsomest manner, his strong testimony in favor of this claim. He refers us to a novel and unexpected witness,—to Caramelli himself—Bashaw of Tripoli—as one ready and willing to testify to the immediate and lasting change in the policy, not of Tripoli alone, but the whole of the Barbary States, towards this country, effected by the capture and destruction of the Philadelphia.

The captors of the Philadelphia are further entitled to remuneration, from other and more important public benefits, which have grown out of this achievement. I pass by its immediate and ordinary results.

It was an achievement which fixed the naval character of the country. It gave the nation confidence in the Navy: it gave the Navy confidence in itself. It infused into it a spirit of enterprise and love of glory, from which resulted, in no inconsiderable degree, the victories of the late war, upon the favorite element of the enemy. And, lastly, it added largely to our stock of national glory, which alone, in the language of a distinguished modern statesman, is above all price, and, to young and popular Governments like ours, the richest of all acquisitions.

The word glory seems so natural to this question, and will necessarily occur so frequently in the discussion of it, that I must be permitted to furnish the committee with my definition of the word, for I would not be misunderstood in the meaning which I attach to it. I would not stimulate unnecessarily the military spirit of my countrymen. It is always excessive. On the contrary, there is no personal sacrifice which I would not cheerfully submit to, to avert at all times, from the land I live in, the last appeal of nations—a war upon the land or the sea. But, sir, as long as military establishments are required by our necessities, it should be our study, it is, indeed, the imperative duty of this House, to give them all the efficiency of which they are susceptible; to infuse into them that high professional spirit, and those chivalrous feelings, without which they are a mockery and a curse. The glory of which I speak—the legitimate glory of this bill—is not the glory of conquest nor ambition; but the glory which pursues illustrious actions, achieved in the prosecution of a righteous warfare, in defence of the rights, the privileges, and the independence of nations. The glory, not of the son of Philip, nor of him who fell amidst the ruins of his country, in the Senate House, but of Camillus and Cincinnatus, in the old world—of Washington and Bolivar, in the new. He who gives glory like this to his country, says the distinguished statesman to whom I have already referred, gives it that which is far more valuable to it than any acquisition whatsoever. It is that fine extract, that pure essence, which endures to all ages— which lasts forever.

And who, Mr. Chairman, I ask, and ask with confidence, since the last standard was struck from the last citadel of York Town, has added more largely to the real glory of his country—with one single and unapproachable exception—than the distinguished subject of this bill—the hero, (for hero he was in name and deed,) the hero of two wars, and the conqueror in both?

The captors of the Philadelphia are entitled to remuneration, from the extraordinary gallantry of the achievement. No nation, either ancient or modern, has ever before permitted an act of such surpassing heroism to pass by unnoticed and unrewarded. A Roman citizen, who had achieved an enterprise of uncommon gallantry, was rewarded with a golden wreath. A Roman citizen, who, by his bravery and good conduct, had raised the siege of a post in imminent peril, or had succeeded in releasing his fellow-citizens from actual bondage, became entitled to the highest military distinction among those brave and sagacious people. Lieutenant Decatur, Mr. Chairman, by one brave feat, in one gallant, glorious hour, entitled himself to both distinctions—to the union of both wreaths. The admiration of his countrymen, during his life, and history, faithful to her trust, since his death, have awarded him the one—the laurel wreath, the symbol of immortality. Let us hasten to bestow the other. And, though the brow of the hero which it should encircle, be mouldering beneath the turf of the valley, our munificence, if munificence it be, will be bestowed neither unwisely nor unworthily. A thousand gallant spirits will applaud the act—a thousand gallant spirits will respond to its justice and generosity. For the Navy, believe me, is looking with intense anxiety to the progress and issue of this bill.

Allow me another view of the subject before I close. In legislating, Mr. Chairman, on a bill like this, we should seriously inquire what effect its passage or rejection is calculated to exercise upon the highest interests of the Navy.

Let us test it by this principle. Suppose it announced (for I will imagine possible what I cannot believe possible) that this bill, embracing the most affecting and interesting considerations—a bill for the relief of the widow of Decatur—for the relief of the infant children of two of the favorite sons of the Navy, (Lawrence and McDonough,) after a brief discussion in the House of Representatives, has been coldly rejected! What would be—what must be the effect of such an annunciation upon the highest interests of the service—upon its spirit of enterprise and love of glory? Upon that unwavering confidence—that affectionate regard towards the Government, which always should, and which always has distinguished the Navy? I cannot presume to answer such a question. But I do say, for we can all imagine, that it would fall like a bolt of ice upon the sensibilities and patriotism of a band of as gallant and deserving spirits as ever sustained the chivalry of any country's marine—of men who, at all times, in all places, and under all circumstances, have sustained the honor of the flag, gallantly and gloriously. Cherish the seaman in peace, says a modern maxim, and when war involves the country, his spirit will blaze forth. The spirit of the American seamen has blazed forth. From the earliest records of the service—from that midnight hour, when he, the illustrious subject of this bill, burst through the entire array of a whole nation in arms, and tore from the diadem of Tripoli the richest gem—the proudest trophy, which the most cruel of all chances had planted there. Through the long line of victories which graced the late war, until the last pirate was swept from the accursed seas of Cuba, the Navy has stood the same adventurous devoted band of citizens and soldiers, ready to plunge, Roman-like, into the very abyss, if necessary, to save their country; or literally go down, like Somers, with friend and foe, rather than live and be a slave.

I appeal to you, sir, I appeal to this House, and this country; I appeal to England herself, and to all nations, whether the high, the lofty pre-eminence to which the national character has been elevated by the late war, be not mainly attributable to the glory of our naval victories? I would not disparage the Army. I could not if I would—I certainly would not if I could, disparage by invidious comparisons, the glory of those who fought at Erie and Chippewa, Oswego and the Thames, at Bridgewater and New Orleans. But it is notorious that the Army throughout the late war, sustained, and only sustained its own honor; and by the bloody victories of the last campaign, washed away the deep stain which a succession of defeats had impressed upon its history, during the first.

A moment more of the Navy—for its eulogium I regard as intimately as indissolubly connected with the bill before us.

During the gloomiest moment of the war—when all seemed wrecked and lost—when all, at least, was ruin and disaster—when all was mortification and dismay—when the high-minded and ingenuous American citizen hung his head, and almost forswore his country, who brought us succor and consolation?—who rallied up the desperate fight?—who cheered us in the struggle?—who poured into the streaming wound of our country's honor, the sovereign balm—the oblivious antidote of twenty victories? Let history answer these questions. History has answered them. And if history has recorded that one Hull struck the flag of his country without a blow, on the land, history also recorded that another Hull struck such a blow upon the sea, as shook, but with opposite emotions, two proud and powerful nations to their very centres. If history has recorded that the red cross of England has floated over the ruins of this sacked and violated temple, history has also recorded that Perry triumphed on Erie, and McDonough on Champlain. If history has recorded a succession of deep disgraces on the land, history has also recorded a succession of brilliant victories on the sea. And the war closed by advancing the national honor, and leaving it a distinguished privilege to live, and move, to be an American citizen.

I have done, but I entreat the committee to recollect (before the question be taken to fill the blank) the unextinguished, the unextinguishable debt of gratitude and admiration which we still owe, and shall always owe, our gallant Navy.

Mr. HOLCOMBE was followed by Mr. TUCKER, of N. J., who took the same side of the question, and concluded his speech by moving to fill the blank for the appropriation with the sum of $200,000.

The question being taken on this motion, it was decided in the negative.

Mr. HOLCOMBE then moved to fill the blank with the sum of $100,000, which was carried—ayes 56, noes 55.

A debate now arose upon the principle of the bill, which occupied the House till three o'clock, and in which Messrs. WHIPPLE, FOSYTH, HOLCOMBE, WEEMS, MALLARY, POWELL, FRANCIS JOHNSON, WEBSTER, STORES, DWIGHT, WHITTLESLEY, MOLANE of Del., HAMILTON, and DRAYTON, took part.

The grounds on which the bill was advocated were principally these: that it appeared from the circumstances of the case, that the attempt of Lieutenant Decatur to get possession of the frigate Philadelphia, while lying under the battlements in the harbor of Tripoli, having succeeded, it would have been in his power to have brought the frigate out, had not his orders from Commodore Preble been peremptory to destroy her, in which case, by the law of 1800, which regulates the distribution of prize-money, a right would have vested in him and his crew, to the full value of the frigate thus recaptured.

In support of the position that the frigate might have been brought out, the opinion of the pilot, and of Commodore Bainbridge were quoted.

Besides this ground of legal claim, the bill was advocated as an act of gratitude richly merited by the valor of the achievement—by its effect upon the naval character of the country, and on our subsequent negotiation with the Barbary Powers; and lastly, on the ground of policy, as being calculated to encourage a spirit of daring enterprise among the officers of the Navy.

The bill was opposed on the ground that no legal claim could have vested, because the Prize Law requires that the vessel should be condemned as lawful prize, and sold, before any distribution of prize-money can take place.

The frigate Philadelphia was never condemned nor sold, nor could she have been, even if she had been brought out of the harbor, because she was an American frigate, and not a vessel of the enemy.

The doctrine of vested rights was also opposed, inasmuch as all captured property belongs to the Government, and if given at all, is given as a gratuity.

It was further objected, that if this claim had been a valid one, it would have been presented at the time, and not suffered to sleep for so many years—that it was very improbable the frigate could have been brought out of the harbor, because the wind chopped about as soon as the ketch had entered the harbor, and the seventy men who formed the crew of the ketch, supposing them to have been sufficient to work the frigate out against a head wind, would have been so occupied in this, as to be unable to work the guns. It was further contended that Lieut. Decatur had done no more than his duty, and had been sufficiently rewarded by a public vote of thanks—the presentation of a sword, and the offer of two months' extra pay to himself and his men.

The bill was advocated by Messrs. HOLCOMBE, TUCKER, DWIGHT, MOLANE, HAMILTON, and DRAYTON; and opposed by Messrs. WHITTLESLEY and MALLARY.

Mr. STORES disavowed taking either side of the question, but the general course of his observations seemed directed against the bill.

An amendment was suggested by Mr. FOSYTH, and agreed to, to strike out the word "representatives," and to insert "widows and children."

Mr. POWELL proposed to add to this amendment, that if there be no widow or children, the money should then go to the father or mother, if living; but this was objected to by Mr. WHIPPLE, and the amendment was withdrawn.

When the committee rose, and the question to fill the blank was taken up in the House,

Mr. LATHROP demanded that the question be taken by yeas and nays; and they were ordered by the House.

Mr. MALLARY concluded the debate for this day, by a motion to lay the bill on the table; which was carried—ayes 61, noes 50.

And then the House adjourned.

MONDAY, May 8.

The Creek Treaty.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. CONDICK in the chair, on the bill "making appropriations to carry into effect the treaty concluded between the United States and the Creek Nation, ratified the 22d April, 1826;" and the bill from the Senate, "to aid certain Indians of the Creek Nation, in their removal to the west of the Mississippi."

The bill relating to the Creek Treaty having been read through—

Mr. MOLANE, of Delaware, stated, that the Message of the President, on the subject of this bill, had been accompanied by a letter from the Secretary of War, recommending that a compensation be allowed for certain improvements made by these Indians, on the unceded lands in Alabama and Georgia. The Committee of Ways and Means (he said) had been disposed to promote that object, which they considered a good one, and had directed him to move the following amendment to the bill:

"For indemnifying emigrants for their improvements in the unceded part of their territory, whether in the limits of Alabama or Georgia 20,000 dollars."

Mr. FOMERY then said: the whole subject of the Creek difficulties came before the House in a very curious manner. The President in his Message, at the beginning of the session of Congress, had told both branches of the National Legislature that he should, on the matter of the Creek treaty, send a special Message. During the last Summer, the President had, through the Secretary of War in two instances, stated formally to the authorities of Georgia, that the whole subject would be presented to Congress, with a view to ascertain the opinions of Congress on the validity of the treaty itself, as well as upon the conduct of the Administration, on all the questions arising out of it. These promises are not yet performed, and Mr. F. took it for granted every thing was before the House intended by the Executive to be communicated to it. Congress is now asked to appropriate money for the execution of a contract whose avowed object is, at an additional expense of near half a million of dollars, to set aside a previous contract, made under the authority of the United States. The contract now before the House (he would not abuse language by calling such instruments treaties) had indeed been approved by the Senate, and ratified with their approbation, and was, as gentlemen were pleased to call it, a law of the land; that which is to be set aside, had met a like good fortune—had received the same approbation and ratification. Were gentlemen satisfied that all was correct because it had been done? The President and Senate, who had approved the first, are now content that it shall be annihilated. On what ground rests their last determination? So far as an opinion can be formed from the contracts themselves, both of which are communicated, unaccompanied by any other document or explanation of them, the first contract is to be set aside in consequence of the refusal of one of the parties to execute it, on the allegation that the persons who made it, had not competent authority. Was this the fact? Was there any proof of it before the House? That the new contract is preferred by a majority of the Creek tribe, to the old, cannot be doubted. Eight hundred thousand dollars will be more acceptable certainly than half that sum. But how stood this question when the first contract was made? The Commissioners of the United States who formed it, believed, or asserted if they did not believe, that the persons with whom the arrangement at the Indian Springs was made, had full power to bind their tribe by its stipulations—the chiefs who made it, asserted their right to act, and alleged, that what was done by them would meet the approbation of the great mass of their tribe. The agent of the United States denounced the contract, as made by persons unauthorized—as made contrary to the instructions of the United States—and as calculated, if ratified, to do infinite mischief to the Creek nation. The President and Senate were perfectly aware, as was every person the least acquainted with the subject, that, on the proposed extinguishment of their claim to the lands occupied by them, there was a great division among the Indians. The person who ought to have been best acquainted with their sentiments, was the agent residing among them. If he was worthy of credit, his opinion must have controlled the judgment of the Executive on this point. Was he believed or discredited? It is but just to the late and present Chief Magistrate to suppose, that they believed him. If not, how happens it that an agent of Government, who gave officially false information, is retained in office—has enjoyed the confidence, the full confidence of the Administration—has been used by them from that hour to this? The President and Senate were forewarned that difficulties were opposed to the formation of the contract, and they disregarded them. They were forewarned that the power of the persons signing it was disputed; this, also, did not arrest its ratification. Difficulties were anticipated to the execution of the arrangement, but it was believed that the chiefs who made it, aided and protected by the United States, would be able to overcome all opposition to it, and that the purposes of the Government could be accomplished without injustice or violence. These anticipations would have been realized, if the act of Congress, under which the contract was made, had not been, in forming that contract, utterly disregarded. Instructed by what has since occurred, by the declarations contained in the new arrangement, we now know that the chief obstacle to the ratification of the first arrangement, was the repugnance of many of the Indians to go to the region west of the Mississippi.

The act of Congress appropriated money to extinguish the Creek title to land within the limits of Georgia. The negotiation was for all the land occupied by them in Georgia and Alabama; and nearly all in both States was ceded. But these cessions were subordinate to the prominent object of furthering a project of the then President—the congregation of all the Indians beyond the Mississippi, to establish a great Indian Government, for the purposes of Indian civilization—a project not approved by Congress, and deemed, by many of the most prudent of our statesmen, wild, visionary, and impracticable. Suppose the intentions of Congress had been fairly executed, is it not now obvious that any difficulty which would have arisen would have been, by the exercise of ordinary prudence and firmness, tempered by a kind consideration of what is due to our dependent Indians, easily overcome. For its own purposes, the United States, by the Executive Magistrate, created this obstacle—an obstacle we are now officially told, insurmountable—every exertion to overcome it having been made, and made in vain. Let us see (said Mr. F.) upon what foundation rests this assertion. What exertions have been made to execute a contract thus made, contrary to the intentions of Congress, and embracing objects in which the State of Georgia, for whose benefit Congress acted, had only a common interest with the other States. The ratification of the agreement of the Indian Springs was scarcely complete before the President was formally cautioned against trusting the Creek agent for the execution of it. He was informed that, as his hostility to the agreement was notorious and persevering, it was apprehended that, pursuing the same policy which had governed his previous conduct, he would throw obstacles in the way, instead of promoting the execution of the agreement. It was believed that he had been in Washington for the purpose of preventing the ratification of the contract, and, failing, he would return to the Indians with feelings of increased bitterness against those who had participated in its formation. This apprehension was prophetic. He returned to the Indians. What immediately occurred need not be told. What effort was used by him to reconcile the Creeks to the agreement that had been made? What effort to prevent the assassination which followed? Did he dissuade the Indians from violence? Did he menace the irritated with the indignation of the Government, if either of those chiefs, who had lent themselves to its wishes, should be molested? If he did, sir, the evidence of his exertions have not yet reached the public eye, and not a suspicion is entertained that it exists; but it is known that he was the enemy of the chief who fell, the vindicator and friend of his assassins, the calumniator of his followers, and of the Commissioners of the United States, with whom the agreement was made. Passing over all that occurred in the Creek nation, as not necessary to be now discussed; throwing a veil over those bloody transactions which have been called by citizens of the United States—men of peace and order, too, and the especial haters of violent language—executions under criminal laws; let us come to the consideration of what has been done here for the execution of the first contract. Sir, your Secretary of War did not even attempt the execution of it. He considered, on the report of General Gaines, that, as a great majority of the nation was against it, it was hopeless even to propose it to the Creek delegation, who came here to discuss the whole matter. This report we have not; but it is stated that 1,890 chiefs and warriors declared against it, out of a population of about 20,000 souls, and this, too, after the principal chief of the friendly party had been massacred; his followers driven by violence from the nation; and their friends in the nation terrified or purchased into silence. No effort was made here to effect the execution of the old contract. By way (Mr. F. presumed) of securing the best possible arrangement, the idea of its execution was abandoned altogether, and the Indians soon saw that the whole game was in their own hands, and a negotiation was formally opened for a new bargain. The Executive, we are told, wished a cession of all the lands in Georgia; the Indians would not cede beyond the Chatahoochie. After exhausting all his diplomatic skill, aided and assisted, no doubt, by the Creek agent, and certain other agents of other Indians, the Secretary, acting under the authority of the President, applied to the delegation of Georgia to know whether Georgia would prefer a cession to the Chatahoochie, or a reference of the whole subject to Congress, with a view to investigate the validity of the agreement, which had, by the President himself, been ratified and proclaimed, affirming that, to procure a cession beyond the Chatahoochie, was impracticable. The delegation of Georgia, not choosing to divide responsibility with the President, it was found practicable to procure a cession of a very large portion of the lands in Georgia, the boundary being established beyond the Chatahoochie, notwithstanding what the Secretary had been pleased to consider a very reasonable determination of the Indians, to adhere to that natural boundary. This contract was submitted to the Senate, and the injunction of secrecy having been taken off their proceedings, Mr. F. said, he was able to state how it had been received. The committee to whom the new agreement was referred, recommended its rejection. In this unexpected state of things, the boundary line, the best that could be obtained from those obstinate Indians, was again changed, and by an additional article, nearly all the land in Georgia was given up. Thus altered, the new contract was approved by the Senate, under a conviction (which, Mr. F. feared, was not well founded) that in fact all that Georgia had a right to demand, under the first, was substantially secured by the second. These two contracts are now before the committee. To refuse the appropriation now asked, is scarcely a matter of discretion. The Indians will be, without doubt, attached to the new bargain. They are too well bribed for their opposition to the old one, not to adhere to the stand they have taken in favor of the new. Although thus trammelled by Executive mismanagement, the principle upon which the President has acted is too important to be passed without notice. It was, indeed, most worthy of the deliberate consideration of the Representatives of the people. The President seems to have considered that the subject of the contract of the Indian Springs, was one wholly under his control—to enforce, alter, or invalidate it, if not by his own authority, certainly with the aid of the Senate. He has applied to it the doctrine of treaties, which may be altered or annulled by the subsequent agreement of the parties. He has entirely overlooked the doctrine of treaties and of contracts, where they affect the interests of third powers, or third persons. Neither treaties nor contracts can be changed, to the prejudice of others, who hold rights under them. Their consent is as necessary to the validity of a new agreement as the assent of the parties to the first. Georgia has not been considered at all, except from respect to her rights, under the compact of 1802. She has been treated as if having no authority to interfere in the arrangements proposed and made. How far this doctrine has met the approbation of the Senate, does not appear; but Mr. F. was justified, by what he had already stated, in believing that such was not the opinion of that body. What is the amount of the interest of the State is not important. The two contracts differ in these particulars: By the first, all the Creek lands in Georgia were ceded; by the second, all the lands are not specifically ceded; and whether all are ceded or not, is a matter of opinion. In the opinion of the Indians, if their Secretary of Legation is good authority, all the land is not ceded. By the first, the Indians were to remove by the first of September, of the present year; by the second, they remain till January, 1827. Although the principle involved is important, the interest is trifling. As it is the intention of the delegation from Georgia to present a written protest, Mr. F. would not touch further on this topic. The interest of the State, in the question before the committee, was not the moving cause of his address to the House. The interests of the State could not be injured by any bargain the United States might choose to make with any Indian tribe. Congress cannot touch the rights already vested in Georgia, whose constitutional organs would do their duty in asserting them. His object in addressing the committee, was to explain what were the real questions between the State authorities, and the Executive of the United States, growing out of the contract of the Indian Springs, so far as they had any relation to that contract, and to expose the gross misrepresentations which had been used to impose upon the people of the United States. It has been asserted again and again, in newspapers, pamphlets, and reviews, spread with malignant industry to every corner of the Union, that a serious controversy existed between Georgia and the Creeks; that Georgia had, by artifice, fraud, and corruption, procured the formation of a treaty, for the execution of which they were eager, and ready to annihilate those poor Indians whose interests had been betrayed; that the benevolent interposition of the President had prevented the accomplishment of this nefarious design. Those who hear me, Mr. F. said, need not be told that Georgia never has had any controversy with the Creeks or Cherokees—no connection with the formation of what was called the Treaty of February, 1825. It would not escape the observation of the people, that the frauds and briberies, and corruptions and villanies, so eloquently denounced during the preceding Summer, and so falsely imputed to the State, were not even among the inducements to the new arrangement made in Washington. The only controversy in which Georgia has been concerned, was one between Georgia and the Executive of the United States, touching the execution of the compact of 1802. The State Government did not think the President was disposed to use all the means necessary and proper for its fulfilment. Appeals were made to Congress, and the wishes of the State were met by requisite appropriations for holding meetings with the Indians. As soon as the agreement of the Indian Springs was proclaimed, the Legislature of the State passed the usual act for the distribution of the land, directing surveys to be made of it, preparatory to the immediate occupation of it, as soon as the Indians should remove. The right of the State to make this survey was disputed by the President, and the only question was, Had Georgia the right to survey the lands within her limits, although occupied by the Indians? The Governor of Georgia thought this right perfect, under the contract with the Indians, and especially as he had obtained the consent of those Indians with whom that contract was made. Mr. F. considered the right as perfect, independent of the contract. It is a right which belongs to every State, to order or to prohibit surveys of its Indian lands—a right never before disputed or denied; one exercised constantly by Georgia, and by every other State. The Supreme Court has, more than once, decided that a State could grant its Indian lands, and that the grant would be perfect. If the right exists to grant, how can the minor power to mark artificially, in the absence of natural boundaries, the limits of the granted lands, be denied? The Indian lands were constantly surveyed by citizens of the State, until such surveys were prohibited by a State statute. This right was, by the United States, tacitly admitted to exist. During the last year, the State applied to the President to join the State in ascertaining and marking the division line between Georgia and Alabama, a line passing through the Creek and Cherokee lands. The President declined, not on the ground of Indian occupation of the land through which the line was to pass; not on the pretext that the Indian consent was necessary—such an idea was not hinted at—but, on the ground that the United States had no interest in the settlement of that boundary line; it was a subject for the consideration of Georgia and Alabama only. A strange assertion! The land in Alabama belonging to the United States, the General Government has certainly some interest in having the boundary of that land accurately ascertained. The President conceived himself authorized to interfere to prevent this survey under the contract of 1825. This contract was obligatory when it operated against the wishes of a State, but doubtful when it operated in favor of the McIntosh Indians, and against the wishes of those hostile to it. This determination of the State peaceably to survey its own lands, was the pretext for one of the most high-handed measures ever witnessed in a free Government. The right was unquestionably with Georgia. Admitting it to have been doubtful; allow even that the President was correct; that his obligation was to interpose; see, sir, how that obligation was performed. No judge was called on, no magistrate sought to command the services of the marshals, sheriffs, or any other civil officer; but a direct appeal was made to force, in the most odious of its forms—military force—a portion of the standing army, of the hired soldiery, were the instruments ordered to be used against a State law—a military force, previously carried to the scene of action, with the design of preserving peace among the Indians! I ask, by what authority the President employed this military force, in a time of profound peace, against one of the Confederacy?

Mr. TATNALL said he had risen for the purpose of explaining to the committee the course which he had prescribed to himself, and, at the request of his colleagues, who (with the exception of his friend who had just sat down) concurred with him, that which they had prescribed to themselves. It was not our intention (said Mr. T.) to enter into a discussion of the facts involved in the subject before the committee—nor was it our intention to say any thing which could be, in any manner, calculated to touch or excite the feelings of gentlemen on that floor. We were not disposed to enter into the discussion of the merits of the “old” and of “the new treaty,” as they were styled; because, we were not prepared with the necessary testimony to sustain ourselves. Not being prepared for such investigation, we had determined to use no expression reflecting either upon the General Government or upon the agents employed by it, which might be calculated to produce angry feelings or recriminating expressions. Should we do so, the gentlemen on the other side would have a right to call upon us to substantiate any accusations we might make. Now, if called upon for evidence, we had it not. We were not even in the possession of the official documents, and papers alluded to by my colleague. In fact, even if in possession of them, it was proper to say we should not consent to rest our case upon them. They contained ex parte testimony, against the use of which, in any manner, so as to affect the rights of Georgia, we were ready to solemnly protest. We were, therefore, wholly unprepared for trial, and were consequently unwilling to use expressions which might be offensive. I am not in the habit of shrinking where it is my duty to advance forward; but I never will consent to make an accusation in any case, until I have the proof within reach. My colleague, said Mr. T., believed he had sufficient proof to stand upon. We thought we had not. We therefore hoped that gentlemen, in any remarks which they might think it proper to make, would studiously avoid, in the slightest degree, reflecting upon the character or conduct of the Executive or of the citizens of Georgia. Whilst we abstained, under the circumstances, from giving vent to our feelings, by expressing, in strong terms, our disapprobation of the conduct of the General Government, we should promptly and severely repel the slightest imputation cast upon the citizens of Georgia, or the Executive. Whilst, however, we declared our determination to avoid unpleasant or exciting expressions, we wished it to be distinctly understood, we were far from being insensible to the treatment our State had received. We wished it to be understood that we were far from expressing approbation of the General Government or disapprobation of our own.

In regard to the immediate subject before the committee, I would frankly observe, that we should have no very serious objections to the passage of the bills under consideration, provided the constitutional difficulty were out of the way. We believed that the “new treaty,” with the provisions contained in the supplemental bill, would afford to Georgia every material advantage secured under the “old treaty,” and in regard to the McIntosh Indians, the advantages held out to them were far beyond what the old treaty entitled them to. The fact was, the General Government had gotten into a dilemma, and we must pay pretty dearly to get out of it.

The State of Georgia was prepared to execute the “old treaty.” The ceded country will be occupied under it; but it would be a want of candor in us to say, that we did not rejoice that the provisions of this treaty, so far as Georgia was concerned, could be carried into effect without materially conflicting with those of the “new.” All apprehension, therefore, of a collision between the General and State Governments, was at an end. A civil war was, in all cases, horrible, and every patriot should desire to avoid it. In this case, if the General Government had persevered in its course, it would have been inevitable. Nothing but a measure of the present kind could avert it, unless either party had yielded to the threat of force from the opposite side. Our pride, as Georgians, would prevent us saying that we would have been unwilling to have met such a crisis, and to have maintained our rights under every hazard. That condition would be a dreadful one indeed, however, when the point of the bayonet alone could settle the controversy. We approved of the bills as calculated to prevent a civil war between the United States and the State of Georgia, and also to avert an internal war between the two opposing parties in the Creek Nation. These parties had been restrained from hostilities which would have seriously affected the safety and quiet of the frontiers of Georgia, Tennessee, Alabama, and Florida, only by the interference of General Gaines, under the orders of the General Government. Both parties were induced to submit to the General Government their differences. The result of this interference is now the subject of our consideration. If we passed these bills, there would be satisfaction on both sides. If we did not, I felt it my duty to state, that the McIntosh party would return home with the most determined hostile intentions. It was with much difficulty this delegation had been kept here. Upon representing their feelings to the War Department, and explaining what they required to be done, I was promptly authorized by the Secretary of War to give them every assurance that they should be satisfied. Without this, they could not have been kept here.

The Creek Treaty.

Mr. MINKS rose, as a member of the Committee of Indian Affairs, to express a hope that the appropriation would pass without opposition.

Mr. OWEN said, that this was a subject which did not affect Georgia only, or Alabama, or the Creek nation, but had a bearing on every individual in the nation; every friend of the form of Government under which we live. He had not risen to make a protest against the treaty, and to support that protest by a lengthy argument; but to say that if the bill should pass, a greater innovation would be made than ever had taken place before, in the policy and principles of this Government. If the principle to which the bill directly led, should receive the sanction of Congress, State rights were gone forever: the treaty-making power would ere long swallow up all the rights of this people; no rule would remain by which acts of the Executive could be tested, and no liberty would be enjoyed, where the Government might accomplish whatever it pleased under the cover of a treaty-making power. He considered the superseding of the old treaty as a violation of the constitution. The President and Senate had no such power by the constitution. If a treaty is made by which a third party obtains rights, they are vested rights, and the treaty cannot be repealed without the consent of that party. He was opposed to the bill, on the ground that it was unconstitutional; the original treaty is now the law of the land: it has received the constitutional sanction, and been promulgated. He was of opinion that the State of Alabama possessed the power to act on the original treaty, and might extend the municipal regulations of that State over the lands now ceded. He thought gentlemen ought to reflect well on what they were about to do, and think what a principle they were about to sanction. He wished to record his vote against it, and should be glad to see the House reject the bill.

The question being on ordering the bill from the Senate to be read a third time—

Mr. STRONG moved to strike out the first section of the bill—in effect, to destroy the bill: and followed his motion with a number of remarks, in support of it, and in explanation of his objections to the bill, which were, generally, that he was opposed to a partial commencement of a system, which ought to be general, if acted on at all.

Mr. COCKE opposed the motion, and replied to Mr. STRONG, and read the 6th article of the late treaty with those Indians, to show that this bill was required by the stipulations of the treaty.

Mr. STRONG then moved to amend the bill, by striking out the enacting clause: which was negatived; and

The bill was then ordered to a third reading. And the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, May 9.

The Creek Treaties, &c.

The bill from the Senate, "to aid certain Indians of the Creek nation, in their removal to the west of the Mississippi," was read a third time; when Mr. STRONG demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill. The House sustained the call, and the bill was passed by yeas and nays—158 to 15.

Mr. FORSYTH rose in his place, and desired that a paper which he held in his hand might be received and read.

Mr. WEBSTER desired of the Chair to be informed whether the compliance with such a request was in order?

The Chair replied, a gentleman desires that a paper which he holds may be read to the House. If no objections are offered, the reading will be ordered.

Mr. WEBSTER said, that if the paper related to any subject before the House, he supposed it might properly be read; if not, he should suppose it out of order.

The Speaker desired the gentleman from Georgia to state briefly the nature of the paper he wished to present.

Mr. FORSYTH stated that it was a protest, drawn up by the Delegation from Georgia, on the subject of the late treaty with the Creek nation, the object of which was to save the rights of the authorities of Georgia, which might be interfered with by that instrument.

Mr. WEBSTER objected to its being read at this time.

Mr. FORSYTH then said he should accompany the paper by a resolution, in which case its reading would be in order.

The Chair replied that the hour for the presentation of resolutions had elapsed.

Mr. FORSYTH then desired leave of the House to present the resolution. The question on suspending the rule was then put, (which requires two-thirds to carry it,) and decided in the negative—Yeas 80, Nays 67.

When the bill came up, Mr. STEVENSON, of Pennsylvania, said:

Mr. Speaker: This morning, a member from Georgia presented to this House a paper or a protest, on behalf of the delegation from Georgia, which he declared contained the views of the delegation from that State, on the subject of the treaty with the Creek Indians, and asked that it might be read, it having reference to bills which would come up to be decided immediately. The reading was objected to by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. WEBSTER,) and the hour having elapsed that is devoted to resolutions and motions, it was decided by the Speaker that it could not be received. A motion was then made to suspend the rule limiting the hour, for the purpose of receiving this paper. This was also objected to by the gentleman from Massachusetts; and, by a rigid application of a rule requiring two-thirds to suspend the rule, the delegation from Georgia was prevented from offering their declaration or protest, although eighty voted for its reception, and only sixty-seven against it. And now, sir, the bills referring to the Creek treaty come up on their third reading, and are to be passed, without the members from Georgia having an opportunity to present to the House a paper which they think an act of duty to their State to have read, before the passage of these bills. Sir, I know not the contents of that paper; but I am satisfied, from the character of those who offer it, that it is couched in respectful terms. It is just that they should have an opportunity of being heard, before the question on the passage of these bills is decided. Surely the measures of this morning seem to justify the charge of an unkind course having been pursued towards Georgia. It offers some proof that there is a spirit of severity exercised by some towards her. Sir, I cannot be satisfied with this. I will feel for every member of this nation. No State can ever show that injustice has been done her, and appeal to the people of this nation in vain. I fear that injustice has been done to Georgia; there are, at least, some evidences of it. The nation may be slow to believe her story, but, once convinced, it will redress her wrongs. What, sir, has it come to this, that the delegation of a State, and one of the old States, too, has asked the reading of a paper presented by them to this House, and this has been denied?—denied by a minority of the House, too? It is not merely an act of courtesy, it is an act of justice, to hear the State, and before the passage of these bills too.

I, therefore, move that the question on the passage of this bill be postponed until to-morrow; in order that the delegation of Georgia shall have an opportunity to lay their protest before the House within the regular time, and before the question on the passage of the bills.

Mr. FORSYTH said he felt sensible of the kindness of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The protest had not been read, and from the general terms used in presenting it, might have been supposed to embrace both bills. It, however, relates to the next bill; to this, the delegation offer no resistance.

Mr. STEVENSON then stated that he should withdraw his opposition to the question on this bill, and renew it on the other, with the view he had stated.

Mr. WEBSTER said, that he presumed the motion and remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, had been called forth by the observations which he had made when the gentleman from Georgia had risen to present the paper. I understood, said Mr. W., that the gentleman was desirous to present a protest; the hour of the day, for the presentation of such a paper, was then past; and I could not suppose it to be the wish of the honorable gentleman to enter a protest with respect to a certain bill, till that bill should be at its passage, or should have been passed. He certainly had no objection to the gentleman's pursuing any course, in respect to this matter, which the constitution allowed. On the subject of protests, he believed, the constitution was silent; and the practice was unprecedented, except, he believed, in a single case, where a member had been permitted to enter on the Journals his dissent, with the reasons of it, to some act of the House. The practice was one, which might become very inconvenient, if frequently pursued. In the present case, he took it for granted, that the paper which the gentleman wished to present, was, both in matter and manner, all that it ought to be; his objection had only been to the time at which it was offered. Whether a protest might be entered on the Journals of this House, he did not know. He should presume, that such a practice might produce some inconvenience; but he had not the least desire to prevent the gentleman from taking any course, in respect to the paper, which might be allowed by the rules of the House.

Mr. FORSYTH said he believed it was strictly in order to present the paper now. As to its further disposition, it might be settled to-morrow, or on any other day. And as all he wished, with respect to this bill, was to have the opportunity of having this paper read, before it passed, he hoped the gentleman from Pennsylvania would withdraw his motion for postponement.

Mr. STEVENSON assented: and the following protest was then presented by Mr. FORSYTH, and read at the Clerk's table:

"The President of the United States having submitted to the House of Representatives, a contract made by James Barbour, Secretary of War, and certain Indians of the Creek tribe, dated the 26th day of January, 1826, which has been ratified, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, and having asked of Congress an appropriation to carry it into effect, the undersigned Representatives of the people of Georgia, feel it their duty respectfully to represent to the House:

"That, by a contract made at the Indian Springs, between certain Chiefs of the Creek tribe, and the Commissioners of the United States, on the 12th February, 1825, the claim of the Creek Indians to the land occupied by that tribe in Georgia, was extinguished, and provision made for their removal, by the 1st day of September, 1826:

"That this contract was, on the 7th of March, 1825, duly and solemnly ratified and proclaimed, by the President of the United States, acting by the advice and with the consent of the Senate; and that Congress, anticipating such contract, had appropriated the sum of 210,000 dollars, towards the execution of it. This contract partially fulfilled, on the part of the United States, their obligation under the compact with Georgia, of 1802; and removed every difficulty interposed by the occupation of the Creek Indians, to the full exercise of all the vested rights of the State, over a considerable portion of her soil and territory:

"That the undersigned are under the solemn conviction, that neither the President alone, nor the President and Senate conjointly, nor the Government of the United States, have any constitutional power, without the consent of Georgia, to interrupt or invalidate, on any pretence whatsoever, the rights secured to that State, by this contract, made in obedience to an act of Congress, and ratified with all due solemnity:

"That the new contract, for which an appropriation is now asked, differs from that of the Indian Springs, in this, that it does not provide for the removal of the Creek Indians prior to 1827, and does not expressly provide for their removal from all the lands occupied by them in Georgia. The undersigned are, therefore, compelled, by a just sense of what is due to Georgia, to protest, as they do most solemnly protest, against it, as violating the rights of that member of the Union of which they are the Representatives, leaving it to the constitutional organs of the State sovereignty to vindicate or to waive those rights, as their own sense of propriety, their duty to the people of the State, and their reverence for the union of the States under the Federal Constitution, may dictate.

ALFRED CUTBERT,
GEO. CARY,
JOHN FORSYTH,
EDW. F. TATNALL,
C. E. HAYNES, WILEY THOMPSON,
JAMES MERRIWETHER."

Mr. HAYDEN called for the yeas and nays, upon the passage of the bill. The call was sustained by the House, and the question being taken, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 167, nays 10.

So the bill was passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

WEDNESDAY, May 10.

Mr. FORSYTH submitted the following:

Resolved, That the following protest, presented by the Representatives of the State of Georgia, yesterday, be entered on the journal of the House.

Mr. WEBSTER made a number of remarks, tending to show the inconvenience of the practice of recording protests, should it become prevalent, and referred to the only two precedents extant.

Mr. CARY said he should have uttered nothing upon this question, but for the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. WEBSTER,) concerning the paper offered for admittance on the journals. That gentleman, said Mr. C., seemed to consider it as strictly and technically a protest; directly relating to, and connected with, the act appropriating money to carry into effect the Creek compact or treaty, lately solemnized at Washington. He had treated it as merely a detail of reasons, by a minority, for their votes upon the appropriation bill; and had, from that view, inferred his argument against the privilege sought: anticipating that great inconvenience might ensue from the establishment of such a precedent. Now, sir, by this criterion, the paper offered is certainly not regularly a protest. I voted affirmatively for the appropriation, and yet I have signed what is called the protest. In this course, which I have thought proper to take, I can see no inconsistency or contradiction. If the paper be considered what I think it is—not a protest, assigning the reasons for negative votes, but a substantive declaration by the Representatives of Georgia, that the State waives no rights which it may have legally acquired, by the compact of the Indian Springs, their silence and acquiescence might be construed into a waiver. Against that conclusion it was the design of the paper to guard. I defy any one to discover a repugnance between a signature to this protest, and an affirmative vote on the passing of the bill. I repeat, the paper in question refers solely to the conduct and views of the delegation, as integral and substantive members of a compound body, without any reference to the votes of either of them upon the bill, with which it is no otherwise connected than as the occurrence of the bill in the orders of the day has furnished a fit opportunity for its presentation to the House.

I supported the appropriation for the new treaty, without thereby yielding, or intending to yield, any sanction to the course which had aimed to abrogate the first, and consummate the last, compact. The President and Senate had acted in this affair within their own peculiar province; and upon their own responsibility. The Representatives of Georgia had been, and were, placed in a singular and delicate situation. For one, I thought it my duty to aid in realizing to my State, all the advantages which the second treaty might produce, and at the same time to exercise the consistent right of protesting, in her behalf, as a sovereign community, against any implication of a surrender of the benefits she might be supposed to have acquired by the first. Whatever those rights, against the implied concession of which we ask to be permitted to guard, I hope they will be temperately asserted, and constitutionally secured. The Supreme Court of the United States may be competent to decide the unfortunate contest, if any shall arise. As to the objection to what we claim in this instance, on the ground of danger of inconvenience from the precedent, I esteem it inconsiderable. No such case had ever before occurred in the history of the country. None such is likely to occur hereafter. I hope the House will accord to us the privilege which we ask.

The question was then taken, and the resolution adopted—ayes 82, noes 61.

FRIDAY, May 12.

Accounts of Mr. Monroe.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the bill "for the relief of James Monroe;" which is as follows:

"Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to cause to be paid to James Monroe, out of any unappropriated moneys in the Treasury, the sum of fifteen thousand five hundred and thirty-three dollars and thirty-five cents, with interest from the third day of December, eighteen hundred and ten, until paid."

Mr. SAUNDERS proceeded to state his objections to several items of the bill, particularly the allowance of $2,750, for salary, from 1st January, 1797, when Mr. Monroe obtained his audience of leave at the Court of France, till the 20th of April, when he embarked for the United States; also, to the allowance of $437 68, for contingent expenses, while Mr. Monroe was detained in England, (after the attack on the Chesapeake.) He concluded by moving to strike out the sum appropriated, leaving the blank to be filled with some less amount.

Mr. MERCER advocated, with great warmth, the whole bill, replying, at length, to the objections, and strongly urging the justice of the claim. He eulogized the character of Mr. Monroe, and insisted on the value and importance of his diplomatic services, &c.

The question was then taken on striking out the allowance of interest, and decided in the affirmative, by yeas and nays, 90 to 73.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAUNDERS now renewed his motion to strike out the sum appropriated.

Before the question was taken, Mr. LIVINGSTON rose, and said:

Sir: While I feel grateful for the handsome, and I hope I may be permitted to say, the merited eulogium, which the gentleman from Virginia has paid to the character of my deceased brother, I must not omit to rectify one error into which the gentleman has inadvertently fallen, in stating the great services which the late President had rendered to his country—services which no one appreciates at a higher rate than I do, and in the performance of which, part of the debt which we are now about to pay was incurred. In enumerating these services, the gentleman adverted to his special mission for making the Louisiana treaty, and stated that, until his arrival, the resident Minister, with all his exertions, had been able to effect nothing; that the debts due to our citizens remained unpaid; and he gives us to understand that the acquisition of Louisiana must be attributed to the exertions and diplomatic skill of Mr. Monroe. Now, sir, with the most sincere desire to do justice to the important services that gentleman has rendered to his country, and with the greatest reluctance to say any thing that might seem to operate against the bill for his relief, which I shall support by my vote, and would by my arguments, if I could suggest any more convincing than those which have been so ably and eloquently urged by the gentleman from Virginia; I yet have a duty to perform, which obliges me to give to the House some account of the state of the negotiation with France at the time of Mr. Monroe's arrival. It may, besides the principal object I have in view, be interesting as a historical fact.

The statement made by the gentleman from Virginia, of the hopeless state of the negotiation, is perfectly correct, if applied to a time somewhat anterior to Mr. Monroe's arrival. An indifference to our complaints, evasions of the clearest claims upon their justice, inattention to the most urgent representations, for a long time characterized the conduct of the French Cabinet. Disgusted with all these diplomatic manoeuvres of the Ministers, Mr. Livingston resolved on a bold and unusual measure: the expression of a sincere admiration for the character of the extraordinary man who was then at the head of the Government of France; a prudent resolve to have no political connection with, and to give no countenance to any party there, more particularly to that which, calling itself Republican, naturally looked for aid from the Minister of a Republic. An established reputation for honor and integrity, and celebrity as a man of literature and science, had given him a personal influence with the First Consul, of which he was determined to try the extent. He had studied his character, and thought that, if he could enlist the military pride and love of fame which entered so largely into the formation of that character, on the side of justice, that much might be done. Leaving, therefore, the beaten route of official notes to Ministers, he addressed the principal himself. He made a short and plain, but forcible, statement of the claims of our citizens; he showed the injustice that had been done to them; he adroitly availed himself of the national interest that had been excited in favor of France; showed the value of the supplies (on which some of our claims were founded) to her colonies; contrasted the confidence and good faith of our citizens, with the rapacity and infidelity to engagements, with which they had been received, and the anticipated payment of our engagement to France, with her delays, and refusals to do us justice; hinted at the advantage which England might make of the unfriendly disposition which such conduct was calculated to excite; and concluded with a short appeal to the feelings of the First Consul, on those points in which he knew he could most sensibly be touched—his personal reputation, the dishonor of breaking engagements he himself had made, the reputation to be acquired by a strict performance of contracts, and the necessity of preserving the word of a soldier and a man of honor. After urging these considerations, in the strongest manner, it was suggested that, if the embarrassments of the Treasury, naturally resulting from a long and expensive war, just then closed, and the prospect of its renewal, should render the payment or the funding of the debt inconvenient, that means might be found, (evidently pointing to a purchase of Louisiana,) which would not only satisfy our claims, but relieve some of the exigencies of the State. To this was added, the risk of losing the colony, if war, then daily expected, should again break out. These, with other considerations, were strongly urged in the letter. This address, although not in the usual course of diplomacy, was well received, and seems to have had the effect that was expected: for a communication was immediately made to the Minister, in which none of the usual evasions or subterfuges were resorted to: it contained an explicit promise that the American claims should be honorably adjusted and speedily paid. To prevent speculation, as well as to create an additional tie on the French Government, Mr. Livingston immediately gave notice to the agents of the claimants in France, that he had received a promise, on which he relied, for their payment; and at the same time wrote to the United States, giving a similar notice, desiring it to be made public, and advising the creditors not to part with their debts. This was in the latter part of February or the beginning of March. Mr. Monroe did not arrive in Paris until the 12th of April following. After this promise of payment, Mr. Livingston did not cease to urge its fulfilment, and, besides the usual and obvious arguments contained in his former notes, he stated that he had the personal engagement of the First Consul, on which he had so much relied, that he had committed himself to his countrymen for its punctual performance; that the season for evasions and delays was past; and that he had the fullest confidence in the honor and faith that had been pledged for doing justice to his countrymen. Thus urged for the performance of a promise which he himself considered as an honorable one, but without the means of performing it in one way, the First Consul resolved to comply with it in the other, that had been suggested by the Minister; and there is the strongest reason to believe that a resolution to sell was taken in Council some days before Mr. Monroe arrived in France; but what is certain, is, that the day before his arrival in Paris, the cession of Louisiana was proposed to Mr. Livingston, by Talleyrand. Mr. L. had then heard, either that Mr. Monroe had arrived at Havre, or was hourly expected, with powers on that subject, and, of course, declined any explicit answer until he should arrive. Talleyrand then pretended that he spoke without authority. But, within two days after, so urgent was the French Cabinet to conclude the sale, that one of the French Ministry, an old and intimate friend of Mr. Livingston, called on him the day or the day after Mr. Monroe's arrival, but before he had presented his credentials, before he had taken, or could take, a single step in the negotiation, and explicitly offered, by authority of the First Consul, to cede the province, for a sum very little beyond that which was afterwards agreed to be given by Mr. Monroe and Mr. Livingston. The way was paved for this important acquisition, by official notes, indirect communications, and printed essays, showing the little value of Louisiana to France, the question that would arise with the United States relative to the navigation of the Mississippi, and the right of deposit secured to us by Spain, and the certainty of its conquest, if the war should be renewed with Great Britain. So that, when Mr. Monroe's health permitted him, after his arrival, to take part in the negotiation, every thing was done, but fixing the price. In this he co-operated with Mr. Livingston, and they produced a diminution from 12,000,000, exclusive of our own claims, which was the sum demanded, to 1,000,000, also exclusive of those claims. The results of that treaty have been most beneficial to the United States. The measures and arguments which led to it, have frequently been detailed to me by my deceased relation. He foresaw the advantages that must result to this country from the acquisition, and he felt an honest pride in having been instrumental in obtaining it.

The question was then put on striking out, and decided in the negative—ayes 50, noes 92.

The question then recurring on ordering the bill to a third reading, it was taken, at the request of Mr. Long, by yeas and nays, and decided in the affirmative—ayes 108, noes 57.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The House then adjourned, to meet at six o'clock. The remainder of the day was spent in the discussion of private bills.

TUESDAY, May 16.

Bahama Banks, Florida Reefs, and Hole-in-the-Wall.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the resolutions offered yesterday by Mr. LIVINGSTON, viz:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform this House whether any engagement has been made with the Government of Great Britain, in consequence of the resolution of this House, of the 23d December, 1823, requesting that a negotiation should be opened for the cession of certain Keys on the Bahama Banks."

[MAY, 1828.]

"Resolved, That the President be requested to open a negotiation with the Spanish Government for the cession of a proper situation for a Light-House on one of the Double-Headed-Shot Keys, to be used solely for the purpose of such Light-House."

Mr. FOMARTH asked for a division; and the question was accordingly stated on agreeing to the first of the resolutions.

The first resolution being under consideration—

Mr. LIVINGSTON said, that it grew out of a measure adopted on the 23d December, 1823, on which day, two resolutions, which he had the honor to propose, were adopted by the House. By the first, the President of the United States was requested to open a negotiation with the Government of Great Britain, for the cession of a part of the island of Abaca, near a place called the Hole-in-the-Wall, for the purpose of erecting thereon a light-house, and to be used solely for that purpose, and also for leave to place buoys on the Bahama Banks, for the purpose of marking the ship channel across them. In consequence of this resolution, the President gave instructions to Mr. Rush, our Minister in London, who immediately made the application; but, contrary to every reasonable expectation, it proved a fruitless one. Immediately after the acquisition of Florida, the Congress of the United States made provision for building light-houses and stationing floating lights, fixing beacons and anchoring buoys, along the dangerous coast of Florida, which forms the north and the west limit of the Gulf Stream, at the point where the irregularity and rapidity of its current makes it most dangerous. The advantages of these measures were not confined to our own navigation; that of all the world, trading to the West Indies, and to the ports of Mexico, were equally benefited by them; but no nation enjoyed this benefit in a greater degree than Great Britain; all her homeward trade returned through the Gulf; that trade was of immense value, and it was therefore reasonable to expect that, in consideration of our lighting one side of this dangerous passage, at our expense, she would make no difficulty of ceding to us a few yards square of barren rock, on which we might expend other sums of our own money, in making similar establishments on the other side of the passage. Contrary to every reasonable expectation, this was denied; but we were told that, if we would agree to pay them a toll, they would build the light-houses themselves. This, as they must have known, was, without hesitation, declined; and here the negotiation, as the result was communicated by the President to the House, rested.

The object of the first resolution, Mr. L. stated, was, to know whether any further progress had been made since that time. If, said Mr. L., it shall appear that Great Britain should persevere in the narrow, contracted policy, which dictated her answer to our application—if money is her object, it must be furnished; not in the shape of toll, that would be too degrading; but a sum in gross, equal to the cost of the buildings, and to the capital sufficient to produce an interest equal to the annual cost of supporting them, must be paid; and the House, on seeing such a state of things, would undoubtedly provide the necessary funds. Our increasing commerce in that quarter, renders it necessary that the outward bound passage, near the Banks, as well as the homeward course, through the Stream, should be lighted like a street. Let Great Britain, if she thought it consistent with her dignity, enjoy this advantage, at our expense. It is one we must incur, not only for the interest of our commerce, but for the greater one of humanity; and it would be no drawback on the satisfaction we must feel, from a knowledge that, by our care and at our expense, hundreds of valuable lives were saved—it would be no diminution, I say, of pleasure, this circumstance must afford, that many of those thus saved were subjects of the power that churlishly refused to concur in a work, equally demanded by humanity and interest. It would, perhaps, diminish the profits of some seventy or eighty owners of wreckers, and force some five or six hundred black or white British Bahama sailors to find other employment. But I cannot, sir, I will not, believe that this contemptible interest had any influence upon the measures of the English Government—I rather wish to believe that the subject was not fully understood, and that we shall soon hear that an answer, more conformable to the good intelligence that reigns between the two powers, has been given. I will only now remark, that the United States has provided for the erection and support of four light-houses and one floating light, besides buoys and beacons, on our side of the stream, and that all we desire is the liberty to erect one on a bare rock, on which nothing but a sea-bird can at present rest.

While I am up, in order to avoid again troubling the House, I will say a word or two on the subject of the second resolution, although it is not immediately under consideration. At the point where the Gulf Stream (which to this place preserves an eastwardly course) turns to the north, there are certain bare rocks, without a rood of earth upon them; some nearly level with the sea, others rising abruptly a few feet above it; separated from each other by very narrow but deep channels, and from the Bahama Banks by a wide, navigable passage, and from a sandy island called Key Sal, by a very narrow one. These rocks are called the Double-headed-shot Keys. Their position renders them extremely dangerous to navigation in their present state; but, at the same time, would make them an invaluable point of departure, if one of them was crowned with an elevated light.

At the time, before referred to, I had the honor of drawing the attention of the House

The late Commodore Perry.

to this position, and they passed another resolution, founded on the situation and nature of these rocks, unoccupied and unfit for occupation for any other purpose but that of a light-house, separated from the banks and islands by a deep channel—and they directed the Secretary of State to inquire whether they might not, according to the laws of nations, be taken by the right of occupation, and used for that purpose. In answer to this, we got no opinion, but a correspondence between Commodore Porter and the Captain-General of Cuba, by which it appears that the Double-headed-shot Keys were claimed by Spain, as an appendage to Key Sal; and, from the friendly disposition shown by that correspondence, it was hoped that Spain would prove more accommodating than Great Britain had shown herself on a similar occasion; and on this, was founded the second resolution.

Mr. L. said he was sure he need not urge the importance of the subject embraced by these resolutions, not only to the port he represented, but to the whole commercial interest of the Union. They had repeatedly shown that they felt this importance, and had acted, in consequence of it, precisely in the mode pointed out by these resolutions. It was in evidence before the House, that, in the last year alone, more than half a million of property, and many valuable lives, had been lost in this navigation, which, from being one of the most dangerous, could be made, by proper precautions, the most safe on the ocean.

The first of the above resolutions was then agreed to.

The second of these resolutions being under consideration—

Mr. FORSTYH said, the resolution related to a subject no doubt of interest to the section of the country represented by the mover, and to the navigators along the coast of the Gulf of Mexico. There would be no doubt of the propriety of Executive attention to it, but Mr. F. believed it was altogether irregular for the House to request the President to exercise any of his constitutional powers. It had been done, it was true, but very unprofitably. If we can properly request the President to negotiate in small matters, we can in great; if we can request him to negotiate with foreign powers, we can request him to perform any other of his Executive duties; remove an obnoxious officer; place a particular and favorite construction on an act of Congress; appoint a favored person to a vacant office, &c. It had even been doubted in the House, during the session, whether we could properly express an opinion on particular subjects of foreign intercourse. Mr. F.'s doctrine on this point had been fully explained, but, as he had been grossly misrepresented, he would state, in a word, what it was. The power of the House to express its opinion, was undoubted. Mr. F. thought it never should be exercised, to urge the Executive to negotiation. There was always a sufficient proneness to act in the Executive; it should be exerted to restrain Executive action, when it threatened injury to the public.

The second resolution was then also agreed to.

THURSDAY, May 18.

The Late Commodore Perry.

Mr. PERRY offered the following:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be instructed to cause the remains of Commodore Oliver Hazard Perry to be removed from the island of Trinidad, in a public vessel of the United States, and to have the same conveyed to Newport, in the State of Rhode Island.

The question of consideration being demanded, it was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. PERRY, in submitting the resolution, observed, that, as a gentleman from South Carolina, before him, had received a letter from the widow of Commodore Perry, written subsequently to the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs, in which that lady had expressed the most anxious desire for the removal of the remains of her husband to the soil of that country whose fame he had so highly honored and enriched, he hoped that the resolution would now pass without opposition.

Mr. HAMILTON said: I rise, sir, for the purpose of confirming what my friend from Maryland has stated to the House. It is true that I have received a letter from the widow of our lamented Perry, and I wish it were in my power, without violating the sacredness and seclusion of those griefs I am bound to respect, to read this letter to those who now hear me: for it would not only show the keen solicitude with which she cherishes the accomplishment of the purpose of the resolution, but of what sort of eloquence that is, which springs from the sorrows of a widowed heart.

I hope that the House will indulge me with one word more. The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom the resolution was referred which the gentleman from Maryland offered some weeks since, appear not to have comprehended the object which we had in view. My friend and myself knew, perfectly well, that, as neither legislation nor appropriation was required, it was fully within the competency of the Secretary of the Navy to have ordered some one of the vessels attached to the West India squadron to touch at Trinidad, and there to receive the remains of our countryman, that have so long slumbered under the protecting chivalry and veneration of those who were once that very enemy whom, for us, he conquered. But, we confess, we had a higher aim. It was, that this removal should not be done in secrecy, as a mere offering to private affection, but as a token of public gratitude and esteem; that we might obtain a distinct and feeling expression of the sentiments of this House; that we might here say to the Secretary of the Navy, go on, and discharge the duties of this pious office: for the little bark, however humble it may be, which sails in quest of remains as dear to this country as those of Patroclus to the son of Peleus, carries, with the cypress around its banner, the sorrows and the sympathies of a whole people.

I know, sir, that a cold philosophy tells us, it matters not where the poor dust, of which this body is composed, moulders into a clod of the valley; but the instincts and affections of the human heart instruct us in a more amiable and gratifying lesson. The spot which holds the ashes of the great and good man is not alone a landmark where private affection may pour forth even "the luxury of its woe," by cherishing such memorials "for secret looks and solitary enjoyment," but it is as it were a living school, where patriotism may learn something of its duties, and virtue some of its rewards. It is not, therefore, for the sole purpose that his widow may be permitted to weep over the urn of her departed husband—that the parent who gave him birth, stricken with grief and age, may bend over his tomb, and, in the bitterness of her heart, deplore the sad reversal of the order of nature, that had called her to mourn over the loss of such a child—or, that even his sons may lay their heads upon the verdant sod that rests upon his bosom, and, at once, in the sorrows of their bereavement, and in the pride of his name, bless the Almighty God that he had made him such a man. No, it is, that the grave of Perry may become one of the shrines of our country, where those who start in the race of honor and glory may go to pay their fond and useful pilgrimages—that they may learn how noble efforts are to be made, how the glorious palm is to be won.

Let us, then, give our cheering sympathy, with cordial unanimity, to this too long neglected purpose, and restore the ashes of our friend to that beautiful island, the spot of his birth, where they may sleep, guarded by the valor, and cherished by the gratitude of its people.

The resolution was agreed to.

Non-Residents' Land in Arkansas.

MR. STRONG moved to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the bill "concerning lands in the Territories of the United States, belonging to non-residents."

The motion prevailed; and the question being on ordering the bill to its third reading—

MR. CONWAY said he was sorry that the bill before the House had been called up out of its order. It was not expected by him, and he was, therefore, not prepared, at this moment, to present to the House his objections to its passage. Those objections could not be made properly, without a particular reference to the revenue laws of Arkansas; and he had not them here: they were at his room among his books.

Under these circumstances, said Mr. O., I can only submit to the House, in general terms, what I have to say upon the subject. The first and greatest objection that I have to the proposed law, is, that it will derange the whole revenue system of Arkansas, and consume, in its operations, the whole tax on non-resident lands; or throw upon the proprietors of those lands an expense much greater than they have now to pay. By the laws of Arkansas, the assessment is made in January of each year, and the sheriffs of the counties enter into bonds to collect and pay over the taxes to the Treasurer, and to settle with the Auditor by the first of December; and, if the tax on lands cannot be collected, without doing so, the sheriff is authorized to sell as much of the land as will pay the amount due, the sale to take place on the first Monday of November; sixty days' notice being given of the sale, by publishing a list of the lands in some newspaper in the Territory. Lands thus sold are redeemable for twelve months from the day of sale, by refunding to the purchaser his money, with interest, and one hundred per cent. per annum.

By the organic law of Arkansas, all the military bounty lands are exempt from taxation for three years, from the date of the patent, and not one tract has ever been sold under four years, from the date of the patent; and yet the Territory is charged with being cruel and oppressive in its revenue laws.

The General Assembly meets but once in two years: its last session was in the month of October of the present year. Pass this bill, and an extra session must be held to change the revenue laws to suit its provisions. This will cost some five or six thousand dollars—a sum which the Territory is unable to pay.

When the Committee on the Territories was instructed by a resolution submitted by the honorable gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. TOMLINSON,) to inquire into this subject, I submitted a resolution, which was referred, by order of the House, to the same committee, to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation to defray the expenses of the Legislative Department of Arkansas. The report of the committee, it will be recollected, was unfavorable; and yet an appropriation is made annually of more than five thousand dollars to meet similar expenses in Michigan and Florida. How it happens that this spirit of favoritism exists, I cannot tell. The General Government has never paid one cent of the expenses of the Legislative Department of Arkansas; the whole has been thrown upon the people of that Territory; and now it is proposed to add to that expense, by compelling the Territory, at an unreasonable time, to change its laws.

One provision of the bill before the House is, that the lands of non-residents, on which taxes have not been paid, shall be advertised once a week, for six months, in some newspaper in the Territory. This single provision will create an expense of about three dollars twenty-five cents per tract; the tax is two dollars and forty cents; and another part of the bill proposes to give to your agent one dollar as a fee for redeeming the land after it is sold: these sums, added together, make six dollars sixty-five cents tax on each quarter section of land, per annum. If this was all, it might be borne, perhaps, by the land proprietor without complaint; but your law will create other expenses which must be paid by him. You require the Government to transmit to this place a list of the lands taxed, and of those sold annually for taxes. Some person must be employed by the Territory to perform the labor of preparing those lists, and that person must be paid for his services. The agent, too, who is to reside at the seat of the General Government, is to receive three per cent. of the amount collected by him. Now, sir, put all these sums together, and it shows, conclusively, that your law will, in its operations, as I have before stated, consume the whole of the tax on non-resident lands, or throw upon the proprietors of those lands a great additional expense, which I should consider unjust and cruel on your part.

The New Creek Treaty.

[H. OF R.]

These objections alone ought, I think, Mr. Speaker, to induce the House to reject the bill; but there are others which should be conclusive in bringing the minds of the members to that determination. It is novel and unprecedented in its character. I will ask you, sir, when did Congress before dream of appointing a Collector of the Revenue for a Territory, to reside fifteen hundred miles from the Territorial seat of Government; and who, in his character as an officer, is to be perfectly independent of the Territory? It must be answered, that nothing of the kind was ever proposed until it was thought of for Arkansas. What would become of your law and your agent, if the Territory was to exempt the lands of non-residents from taxes? This power it certainly possesses; or do you claim the right to compel the Territory to continue the tax, to give your agent business and fees? I cannot think that such a claim will be set up, when it is known that you cannot, by a law of Congress, tax the people of a Territory without their consent: and here, on this floor, they are not allowed to vote.

The General Assembly of Arkansas might, I say, with propriety, appoint an agent, to reside at the seat of the General Government, or at any other point in the Union, to collect taxes from non-resident proprietors of lands in that Territory; but it appears to me that Congress cannot, with propriety, do so. You can, sir, exempt those lands from taxes altogether, if you choose to do so; and I should greatly prefer such a law, provided you will appropriate money out of your Treasury to meet the expenses of the Legislative Department of the Government of Arkansas. The bounty which you gave to your soldiers for their services in the late war, was a national one; and any extraordinary indulgence which is granted to them now, should also be national, and not at the expense of a few thousand inhabitants of one of your remote Territories. Pass a law making it the duty of the Commissioner of the General Land Office to receive the taxes on non-resident lands, without expense to the Territory or to the land proprietors, and I shall be satisfied. But, to a law so injurious to the interests of the Territory and to the soldier, as I think this will be, I can never consent; and I therefore move to lay the bill upon the table.

The motion was negatived.

After some amendments offered by Mr. STRONG,

The bill was further opposed by Mr. VANCE; who moved its postponement until the next session.

This motion was negatived.

Mr. SCOTT now renewed the opposition, and closed his speech with a motion to postpone the bill to Monday next.

Mr. CONWAY urged the postponement: but it was negatived, and the bill was ordered to its third reading this day.

FRIDAY, May 19.

Accounts of Mr. Monroe.

The amendment of the Senate to the bill "for the relief of James Monroe," being taken up, and the question being on concurring with the amendment of the Senate, which goes to increase the amount of appropriation from $15,583 to $29,513, Mr. WHITTLESEY demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered by the House, and were—Yeas 64, Nays 66.

So the amendment of the Senate was disagreed to.

SATURDAY, May 20.

The New Creek Treaty.

Mr. DWIGHT, from the Committee of Conference, on the part of the House, on the disagreeing vote of the two Houses, on the bill "making appropriation for carrying into effect the treaty concluded between the United States and the Creek nation of Indians," made a report; which was ordered to lie upon the table.

Mr. FORESTH said: A stupendous fraud, it seems, was intended by the delegation who had formed, with the Secretary of War, the new contract. The chiefs composing the Creek diplomatic train, assisted by their Cherokee Secretaries of Legation, had combined to put into their own pockets, and those of a few select friends, somewhere about three-fourths of the first payment to be made for the second cession of the lands lying in Georgia. The facts connected with this transaction, although concealed from the Senate when the second contract was before them for ratification, and from the House when the appropriation bill to carry it into effect was under consideration, were perfectly understood at the War Department by the Secretary, and by his clerk, who is called the Head of the Indian Bureau. The Senate having, by some strange fortune, discovered the intended fraud, after the ratification of the contract, and before they acted on the appropriation bill, wished, by an amendment to the bill, to prevent the success of the profitable scheme of villany. The House, entirely ignorant of the facts, and not suspecting the motive of the amendment, had rejected it, insisted upon their disagreement to it, and a Committee of the two Houses, as usual, had conferred on the subject. Now, that the facts are ascertained by the separate reports of the committees, there can be no difference of opinion on the great point of defeating the intended treachery of the delegation and secretaries to the Creek tribe. The only matter which can bear discussion, is, how shall the treachery be punished?—how shall the Creek tribe be protected from the abominable designs of their worthless and unprincipled agents? Will the amendment proposed by the committee reach their object? The plan is, to pay the money to the chiefs, to be divided among the chiefs and warriors, under the direction of the Secretary of War, in a full council of the nation, convened for the purpose. Suppose the council in solemn session, the money before them, and the division about to be made, under the direction of the Secretary of War—may not the chiefs and their secretaries claim the money, as promised to them under the treaty, and how will the Secretary or his agent resist the claim? To show how the claim would stand, Mr. F. called the attention of the House to the statement from the Indian Bureau. Mr. F. regretted that the godfather of this new office had given it a Parisian name. It would be seen, if gentlemen would take the trouble to run their eyes over the statement, that Messrs. Ridge and Vann, sometimes called Clerks, at others Secretaries, to the Creek delegation, two Cherokees, paid by the United States to take care of the interests of the Creeks against the United States—(Mr. F. could not help thinking that it would have been quite as decent, and somewhat more economical, to have detailed a clerk or two from the War Department, to perform that service)—made known the intention of the chiefs to require reservations of land for them. This was “rejected promptly,” but “they were told by the Secretary, that, although no locations would be allowed, a fair equivalent, in money, might be added.” Money, however, they replied, “was no object.” As land could not be had, they finally agreed to take money, ten thousand dollars each. “They were, however, put right, by an assurance that no such sum was intended, nor could be thought of; and that five thousand dollars each, was the extent that could be allowed.” They assented—the House will perceive that the only difficulty was the amount of the bribe. The Secretary was willing to go as high as five thousand dollars, but could not stretch to ten thousand dollars. Notwithstanding the assent of the Cherokees, and the declaration of the Secretary, that five thousand dollars each was the extent that they could be allowed, Ridge and Vann, after the treaty was signed, and before it was acted on by the Senate, or submitted to that body, brought a paper, the precious list of the price of each traitor, for the inspection and information of the Head of the Bureau and the Head of the Department; and what answer did they receive from both? The Head of the Bureau said it was their own affair. The Secretary said he presumed it was their own affair. And, however proper a more general equalization of it through the nation might be, he supposed it must rest with them. Had these two head advisers forgotten the assent of the Creeks to receive five thousand dollars each, and their own assertions that no more could be allowed? But I ask this House, if the engagement for the five thousand dollars, and the list of the sums to be distributed, may not be claimed as part of this new contract? If these persons have not a right to claim, in the face of the tribe, these sums, as promised to them by their Great Father? Ay, sir; and, if they are powerful enough in the tribe, they will enforce their claim. Under what pretext will your Secretary of War direct a different disposition or division of the money, after his often repeated declaration, “it is their own affair”—the affair of the delegation? Yes, sir, so happily has this business been managed, at the seat of Government, under the Executive eye, that this division which the negotiators proposed to make of the spoil, may be termed a part of the consideration of the contract. It must be confessed that these exquisite ambassadors were quite liberal to themselves, their secretaries, and particular friends: one hundred and fifty-nine thousand seven hundred dollars, to be divided among some twenty persons, is pretty well! What name shall we give to this division of money among them? To call it a bribe, would shock the delicacy of the War Department, and possibly offend those gentle-spirited politicians, who resemble Cowper’s preachers, “who could not mention hell to ears polite.” Let us borrow a term from foreign language, and call it a douceur, or an empeno. Call it what you will, every honest mind must be struck with the desperate infamy of the transaction. It cannot be contemplated without horror at the depravity of the savages, and indignation at the criminal imbecility of the Administration. Your Secretary of War made no effort beyond advice, dwelling on the danger, not the turpitude of the scheme, to prevent this detestable conspiracy against a dependent and distant tribe. Why did he not drive the reptiles from his presence—send them back to the nation; expose their villany; and appeal to the tribe itself for the fulfilment of such an arrangement of the old contract, as would have been just to them, satisfactory to Georgia and Alabama, and honorable to the United States? Who can doubt that this manly and direct course would have secured the respect and gratitude of the tribe, and a ready acquiescence in the wishes of the Government? But no, sir; such an idea does not appear to have passed through the brains of the War Department. It would have deprived the Administration of the glory of settling the unfortunate controversy, by an "arduous and anxious negotiation." It would have vindicated the character of the murdered McIntosh, and of the calumniated Commissioners of the United States. It would have insured the punishment of the treacherous delegates, and the pet Cherokees, their guardians and secretaries. None of which were within the scope of the policy of the Executive. The transcendent criminality of this design cannot be well understood, without recalling to recollection the dark and bloody scenes of the year past. The Chief McIntosh, distinguished at all times by his courage and devotion to the whites, deriving his name of the White Warrior, from his mixed parentage, had formed, with his party, the treaty of the Indian Springs. He was denounced for it. His midnight sleep was broken by the crackling flames of his dwelling burning over his head. Escaping from the flames, he was shot down by a party acting under the orders of the persons who accused him of betraying, for his own selfish purposes, the interests of the tribe. Those who condemned that chief, the incendiaries and the murderers, are the negotiators of this new contract; the one hundred and fifty-nine thousand dollars, is to be the fruit of their victory over the assassinated chief. What evidence of fraud, and selfishness, and treachery, has red or white malice been able to exhibit against the dead warrior? A reservation of land for him, in the contract of 1821, was sold by him to the United States, for twenty-five thousand dollars; a price he could have obtained from individuals, if his title had been deemed secure. This sale of property given to him by the tribe, was the foundation of the calumnies that have been heaped upon his memory, and the cause which, in the eyes of our Administration, newspaper editors, scribblers, and reviewers, justified his execution. Now, sir, the executioners are to be rewarded by pillaging the public Treasury. I look with some curiosity for the indignant denunciations of this accidentally discovered treachery. Perhaps it will be discovered that all this new business of the Creeks is "their own affair," with which the white editors and reviewers have nothing to do. Fortunately, Mr. F. said, Congress had something to do with this affair. We owe a justice to the tribe. This amendment, he feared, would not do justice. The power of Congress should be exerted, not only to keep the money out of the hands of these wretches, but to secure a faithful and equal distribution of it among the whole Creek nation. The whole tribe hold the land; their title by occupancy resides in all; all are rightfully claimants to equal portions of the price of their removal from it. The country is not aware how the Indian annuities are distributed, or the moneys paid to the tribes disposed of. They are divided according to the discretion of the Indian Government, completely aristocratical—all the powers vested in a few chiefs. Mr. F. had it from authority he could not doubt, that the Creek annuities had, for years past, been divided in very unequal proportions, not among the twenty thousand souls of which the tribe was believed to be composed, but among about one thousand five hundred chiefs and warriors. Our committee express great unwillingness to go counter to the treaty—the treaty—the treaty! Are not this tribe dependent upon us? And shall we, while we never hesitate to legislate about their commercial intercourse—their conduct to the whites—be deterred by this cry of "Treaty," from protecting them from the violence, the injustice, or the frauds, of their petty tyrants? But it is only for the new treaty such solemn regards are felt. That formed here, is a sacred affair—that formed at the Indian Springs, had no such hallowed character. Strange, sir, that the President and Secretary of War, with regard to the old contract, should exercise, with impunity, a latitude of construction the Representatives of the people fear to use, even to prevent fraud, under the new! Strange, that the Senate, a branch of the treaty-making power, should be willing to legislate more boldly than we, who have no power but legislative, over the subject!

The New Creek Treaty.

There is an expression or two in the report of our committee, which deserved notice, as it was calculated, however without intention, to mislead the people. It is said, by the committee, that the reservations of land wished by the Creek Delegation and the Cherokee Secretaries, were refused by the Secretary of War, and that their efforts were afterwards confined to benefit themselves and friends by a distribution of the money, over which the Secretary had no other control than is to be found in the third article of the treaty. From this, the public would infer, that it was the deficiency of power in the Secretary which prevented him from refusing the money, as well as the land. The committee had not distinguished accurately, or inquired why the reservations were not allowed. They were not allowed, Mr. F. presumed, because Georgia denied the authority of the General Government to make them within the State, and Congress had sustained this doctrine of the State. Former reservations had been bought up at large prices, in consequence of an application from the State. But for this, the Secretary had the same power to refuse or to promise land to the Creek negotiators, as money. The money was offered and accepted as an equivalent for the land asked for, at least the five thousand dollars a head. With regard to the list, the arrangement proposed by it was a gross departure from the provisions of the contract, which both duty to the United States and to the Indians, required the Secretary to prevent. His power for that purpose was ample; yet, we see the Head of the Bureau, (Mr. Thomas L. McKinney,) while refusing the request of the conspirators, to have the money counted and divided, and sealed up in the Department, suggesting how it could be done without scandal—"the cashier of the bank would, no doubt, oblige them by seeing it so counted and sealed"—affording all possible facilities to their arrangements. There is something in the Secretary's letter of the 15th May, to the Committee of Conference, that merits a passing remark. He says: "For, although I was advised, as Colonel Benton is aware, to approach the influential chiefs with secret gratuities, justified, as it was urged, by the usages of the Government, I peremptorily refused to do so; and determined that, whatever was given as the price of the land, should appear on the face of the treaty." Now, Mr. Speaker, what mighty difference can any honest mind discover between these secret gratuities, which were peremptorily refused to be used, and the five thousand dollars a-piece, promised by the Secretary to these savages, and the payment of which, to them, was intended to be kept secret? Where is the stipulation for the payment of these five thousand dollars in the treaty? It was to be taken out of the gross sum, as was also the balance to make up the one hundred and fifty-nine thousand seven hundred dollars, and no one was to know, but the Secretary of War, the Head of the Indian Bureau, and the parties profiting by the arrangement, what became of it. I am no casuist, said Mr. F., in these nice questions of delicacy, but, to me, it appears, this affectation of fairness, to cover fraud, this pretence of acting openly and above board, when such strange things are closely kept in the dark, are quite as worthy of peremptory refusal, as the use of secret gratuities, aye, and quite as offensive to the moral sense of the people.

Before taking his seat, he asked the indulgence of the House, while he made a few comments on this list of worthies, and the prices to be paid to each. At the head of the list stands Mr. Ridge, with the sum of $15,000 opposite to his elevated name. This man is no Creek, but a Cherokee, educated among the whites, allied to them by marriage—has received lessons in Christianity, morality, and sentiment—perfectly civilized, according to the rules and customs of Cornwall. This negotiation, of which he has been, either as actor or instrument, the principal manager, is an admirable proof of the benefits he has derived from his residence among a moral and religious people. Vann, another Cherokee, half savage and half civilized, succeeds him with $15,000 bounty. A few inches below comes another Ridge, the Major, father to the Secretary—a gallant old fellow, who did some service against the hostile Creeks, during the late war, for which he deserved and received acknowledgments—but what claims he had to this Creek money, Mr. F. could not comprehend. Probably his name was used merely to cover another gratuity for the son, whose modesty would not permit him to take more than $15,000 in his own name. These Cherokees were together to receive $40,000 of Creek money, and the Secretary of War is of opinion it is quite consistent with the contract, which provides for the distribution of it among the chiefs and warriors of the Creeks.

Mr. F. said he had, on a former day, shown what influence had been exerted by the Cherokees in the Creek nation; their insolent interference between the United States and the neighboring Indians, which led to the defeat of the projected contract at Broken Arrow, and to the death of McIntosh. To this intermeddling spirit of the Cherokees might be traced the selection of the Cherokee secretaries. It was not to have been anticipated that the real and selfish motive of this intermeddling would be so soon and so palpably established. This Cherokee influence in the Creek nation is so strong, that the payment of their $40,000 will be made, unless Congress act decisively to prevent it. Look, sir, at the distinction made for these exquisites. Yopothle Yoholo, whose word General Gaines would take against the congregated world, is set down for but $10,000. The Little Prince but $10,000. Even Menawee, distinguished as he is as the leader of the party who murdered McIntosh and Etome Tustunnuggee—as one of the accursed band who butchered 300 men, women, and children, at Fort Mims—has but $10,000. A distinguished Red Stick, in these days, when kindness to Indians is shown in proportion to their opposition to the policy of the General Government, might have expected better treatment—only ten thousand dollars to our enemy in war and in peace!

Mr. DWIGHT observed, in reply to Mr. F., that the House was now substantially debating whether it would carry into effect a treaty, constitutionally made by the President of the United States; and whether it would or would not invade the limits of the treaty-making power. The Senate had made an amendment to the bill as at first proposed, which required that the money paid under the treaty to the Creek Delegation, in this city, should be distributed to the nation as annuities are distributed; but the treaty said that the money was to be paid to the chiefs and warriors, and the Senate had no power to say that the money should be paid, per capita, to all the members of the nation, in the manner that annuities are paid to them. The House knew very well that they could not violate the treaty. It was, therefore, proposed by the House, that the money should be paid in full council, to the members of the Creek nation, not on the principle of annuities, but on that of the treaty. The treaty could not be altered by Congress; and the act to carry it into effect must conform to its provisions; but, instead of paying the money here, where its operation would be to corrupt the delegation, and to defraud the body of the nation, it was proposed that it should be paid in the midst of the nation, after due notice given, that they might convene to receive it. The honorable gentleman from Georgia thinks that the amendment will not effect this object. I am of a different opinion; but we agree perfectly as to the justice of securing the payment of the money to those for whom it is intended. The gentleman supposes that the Senate will adhere to its amendment, but they appointed a Committee of Conference; and when that committee got the ultimatum of the House, they reported it to the Senate, and the Senate, by a large majority, agreed to accept it. If we shall now reject the report, we shall reject the proposition of our own conferees, to which the Senate have acceded.

There may have been, as the gentleman believes, a stupendous fraud contemplated. I am not in full possession of the facts of the case. It does not, however, appear to me so very surprising, that two Indians, not themselves members of the Creek, but of the Cherokee nation, should demand to be paid for performing the duties of diplomacy for the Creeks. They are educated men, competent to perform those duties, and they have performed them. Have they not a right to ask compensation? What is the nature and extent of the evidence of this stupendous fraud? I do confess, that on some other points connected with this affair, my mind misgives me; but, as to these Cherokee agents, did not our own diplomatic agents receive $18,000 for their services, on a mission to make a treaty? and have these agents of the Creek nation no right to stipulate for $15,000? When the Secretary was urged to give a douceur to Ridge and Vann, he rejected the suggestion, as proposing a dishonorable course; and, afterwards, when the chiefs had been assembled at his request, he made a speech to them, dissuading them from their intended disposition of the money. There are no circumstances of concealment in the case. The honorable gentleman seems to suppose that there was a discovery; that the Senate, by accident, discovered the true state of the matter; but the House has heard that the Secretary, so far from having any plan or purpose of any clandestine arrangement, disclosed the whole of the facts to the chairman of the committee of this House on Indian Affairs, and this before the ratification of the treaty by the Senate.

When the Indians applied to him to make the division of the money among them, according to a schedule furnished, he told them expressly he had no power to do any such thing, and referred them to the third article of the treaty, in support of the declaration. Here was nothing but the most open and upright conduct.

If the House shall refuse the report of the Committee of Conference, the appropriation must, of course, fall, and the treaty with it; but, if the House shall assent to it, as the Senate has already done, the money will be sent, and the treaty will be carried into effect.

Mr. WICKLIFFE agreed in the opinion, that the Secretary of War was not chargeable with any improper conduct in the conducting of this affair; but stated facts which went to show that there had been concealment and unfair dealing on the part of Ridge and Vann, as the proposal made by them for a division of the money, according to a certain list submitted by them to the Secretary, was a matter of surprise to Opothle Yoholo, the principal Creek chief, when he was told of it; and he declared that it had been done without his knowledge.

Mr. COCKE (chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs) confirmed the statement made by Mr. DWIGHT, and stated the circumstances of the interview he had with the Secretary before the confirmation of the treaty by the Senate, in which interview the Secretary had fully informed him of the facts now referred to.

Mr. BRIGGS went into a vindication of the conduct of the War Department, in the several stages of the treaty negotiation; and denied all purpose of concealment or indirection.

Mr. OUTHERBT said, that, were it even his inclination, the state of his health would not permit him, at this time, to address the House otherwise than with extreme brevity; and he should be believed, when he said, that a strong sense of duty only could urge him to rising on this occasion.

For more than a year past, said he, a violent and unceasing torrent of abuse has been poured on the State I represent—on Georgia—of which I am proud to be, and to pronounce myself, a citizen and a native; whilst developments are this day made, secrets are now transpiring, which must arrest the course of calumny and confound the calumniators.

What has been the charge against Georgia? That she has vehemently claimed the benefit of a treaty alleged to be vitally tainted by fraud and corruption in the negotiators. Whence has this charge originated, or whence derived that weight and sanction which have afforded it a general currency, and enlisted the feelings and the interests of so many in supporting it by calumny, and enforcing it by invective? From the Executive Government of the United States. From this Government, I say, which, on the ground of this charge, has even proceeded to the alarming extreme of procuring the annulment of a treaty which had been solemnly ratified. And what is the important secret so long held from light, and now providentially revealed to-day? Why, that this Executive Government, negotiating, not by intermediate agents, but in its proper majesty, and here, in its own capital, has concluded a new and superseding treaty; has recommended, has strongly urged, has procured its ratification, knowing, and suppressing that knowledge from the world, and from the ratifying body, that the Indian negotiators in this treaty, abominably corrupt, atrociously perfidious, to sate their own abandoned lust of gain, were selling the people whom they represented, and that from the treasury of the United States was to proceed the reward of perfidy, the gratification of corruption. So utter were the perfidy and corruption of the Indian negotiators, that they could no longer be considered as representing the people by whom they had been delegated, and who were a thousand miles distant from the scene of negotiation. Of $217,000, the price of the territory ceded by the Creeks in this treaty, these men had determined to appropriate to themselves $159,000, leaving to the mass of the Creek people only $58,000.

But, to prove that no suppression or concealment has been designed, the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs having been called on, has just detailed to us a conversation which the Secretary of War held with him in relation to these transactions, voluntarily and before the ratification of the treaty. Ah! but the all-material, the only material circumstance, that which constitutes the essence of the charge now urged, was withheld by the Secretary from the honorable chairman in this same conversation. Not a suggestion was made to the honorable chairman, by the Secretary, of the profligate purpose of the Indian negotiators to appropriate to themselves almost the entire price of the territory ceded by the people whom they represented. Not a hint was intimated of the black list of corruption this morning exhibited to our eyes. Nay, the statement of the honorable chairman does most strongly support the charge of designed suppression. When the Secretary engaged himself in conversation on these transactions, with a gentleman who is in some sort the official organ of this House on Indian Affairs; when he even uttered certain complaints against the Indian negotiators, must not the intended embezzlement by these chiefs; the most important circumstance in the transactions; the all-absorbing complaint against the chiefs, have presented itself of necessity to his mind; ay, must it not have pressed conspicuously to his view, and even attended with some anxious feelings? How is it possible, then, that he should have avoided the mention of it, but in consequence of a predetermination? Well, indeed, might the honorable gentleman from Tennessee declare that, in the communication of the Secretary, he perceived naught to excite his suspicions—since, in that communication, what was innocent only was disclosed; and what was criminal was precisely that which was retained. As to the miserable Indian chiefs, they impudently attempted to make our Government direct co-actors with them in the villany they were perpetrating, by procuring a distribution to be made of the iniquitous plunder in the very office of the War Department, by its officers, and under the sanction of its stamp and seal. Thus were the Indian people at home to be abused with the notion that this division of the price of their territory was directed by the Government here, and thus were they to be overawed into an unquestioning submission to it. Could there be evidenced more deliberate and wicked contrivance of fraud? Fraud, did I say? Base and detestable treachery! Is this in the nature of a fraud committed on indifferent or hostile persons? No, but agents, charged with the confidence and entrusted with the affairs of a people a thousand miles distant, violate that confidence and betray that trust, and, proceeding to the extreme of human baseness, sell for individual gain—for a price paid to themselves—that people to whom their obligation was of so high and sacred a character. What heightens the strangeness and aggravates the infamy of this extraordinary transaction is, that Indians who are not even of the Creek people, men of the Cherokee tribe, are to participate in this corrupt division of the price of territory ceded by the Creeks.

Such, then, being the treachery and corruption of the Indian agents, who negotiated this treaty, and such the connivance of the Executive Government here at this treachery and corruption, such its suppression of facts, which disclosed, would have shocked the moral sense of all; would have blasted the credit of the superseding treaty, with the members of that body by which it was to be approved or condemned—what is the idea that presents itself simultaneously to all? Those with whom originated all the abuse and calumny against Georgia, the administrators of the Federal Government, are about to suffer the recoil of their own unworthy inventions. A day of retribution, of dreadful retribution, is come. Even-handed justice returns the poisoned chalice to their lips, who mingled venom in the draught. And what, indeed, is the extraordinary spectacle which now offers itself? In the exercise of some strange and anomalous power, unknown to the constitution, an entire treaty, under the pretence of fraud, has been utterly abrogated, and behold, the self-same Government by which this daring act has been done, are affecting the utmost scruple and delicacy at touching the mere form of a single article in another treaty, when the purpose is to prevent the success of a vile and deliberate fraud—of a damnable treachery. Have I been using any ingenious sophistries or subtle inferences? No: all that I have said is manifest as day. Can any one deny it? Will any one deny it? Does any one deny it?—My strength fails me.

Mr. TATNALL said he did not rise to enter at large into this discussion, as the approximation of the close of the session would seem to preclude this; nor, however strong his feelings were, (and they were strong,) did he rise to give vent to them. In fact, his colleague, who had first risen, had relieved him from the necessity of the one, and his friend who had succeeded him, had, in the burst of his indignation as a Georgian, rendered unnecessary the other. He rose simply to explain why he should vote differently from his colleague first alluded to.

He was as confident as his colleagues could be, that the foulest fraud had been projected by some of the individuals calling themselves a part of the Creek Delegation, and that it was known to the Department of War before the ratification of the treaty, and was not communicated by that Department to the Senate, either before or during the pendency of the consideration of the treaty by that body. Mr. T. said he would not, however, for the reasons just mentioned, dwell on this ground, but would proceed to state, that he was in favor of the amendment offered by the Committee of Conference, (and therein he differed from his colleague,) which, whilst it would effectually prevent the commission of the fraud intended, would, also, avoid a violation of the terms of "the new treaty," as it was styled. He, indeed, denied that this was a treaty, and the law of the land, so far, at least, as it conflicted with the provisions of the first, or "old treaty." But, sir, said he, the appropriation bill, an amendment to which is now the subject of consideration, has for its object the execution of this new treaty; and, if it be not for this purpose, it is for no legitimate purpose at all. This House has regarded this substitute for the McIntosh treaty as a treaty, and it cannot, therefore, with propriety, or consistency, disregard its provisions. I united with my colleague in voting against this entire appropriation bill, and I would again do so, if necessary. I denied that to be a treaty, which must be so regarded, if the appropriation contained in the bill were necessary and proper. But, sir, when the question is, not whether the instrument called a treaty is a treaty, but whether we are disposed to amend a bill previously determined upon, to carry into effect that treaty, it is altogether a different thing. At this stage of the matter, the fact is, on all sides, conceded, that this thing which is called a treaty, is a treaty, and that some bill making an appropriation to execute it, is inevitable. This being the case, no amendment of that bill can be made which has a tendency to a disregard of the terms of such treaty. Our object is to prevent the daring fraud which is meditated; but I contend that, in looking to that object, we must be governed by the terms of the treaty under which, and to execute which, this bill has been framed. We have no right to alter these terms. I deny that the Government had a right to set aside the first treaty. This my colleague also denies; and how he can deny this, and yet maintain that the present treaty might be altered by Congress, I cannot understand. It is not that I do not go as far as my colleague. I go farther. I say that this Government not only has no right to alter or do away with a whole treaty, but I also say it has not a right to alter or expunge a single word—a single letter. I do not mean to charge my colleague with inconsistency. I was not aware of his intention to introduce his motion, or of his objection to the report of the Committee of Conference, until after he had risen to address the Chair. I have had no opportunity of hearing his explanations. But, it does seem to me, sir, that, if this anomalous instrument is to be regarded as a treaty, it cannot be altered, except by the consent of the parties to it, and not even then, if it conflicts with the rights vested by it in a third party. For my own part, sir, I consider Georgia as having acquired vested rights under the first treaty—rights which the General Government constitutionally could not, and, standing as things now do, will not, dare to touch, or attempt to destroy. If, however, the strong arm of power shall be raised against the rights of my native State—if force shall be resorted to to prevent the execution of the old treaty—I, for one, shall be ready (and I shall not be the only Georgian who will be ready to move in so holy a cause) to shoulder my musket to defend, at every hazard, these rights, and to enforce this treaty. However, sir, I will say nothing more on this point. When the time shall arrive—if ever that dark hour shall arrive—I trust in God I shall be prepared to act as every Georgian should act.

The New Creek Treaty.

I shall give my vote for the amendment proposed by the Committee of Conference.

Mr. Cook, in a brief speech, vindicated the moral character of the Secretary, and denied that the facts referred to by the gentleman from Georgia were known and concealed by him.

Mr. TATTNALL requested Mr. Cook to yield the floor for a moment, and stated, that the list which he held in his hand, was, itself, conclusive evidence of a corrupt intention to divide the greater part of the money among the few persons named in it. In this list, different sums were written opposite the names of different individuals, such, for instance, as the following: "John Ridge, $15,000—Joseph Vann, $15,000," (both Cherokees, and not Creeks, and, therefore, not entitled to one cent.) The next, a long and barbarous Indian name, which I shall not attempt to pronounce, "$10,000,"—next, "John Stedham, $10,000," &c. This list, as it appears in the documents received from the Secretary of War, was presented to the War Department by Ridge and Vann.

Mr. Cook resumed. The Secretary had been told that land was wanted for Ridge and Vann, but had replied that he could not consent to allow any. Money, indeed, had been given them, as had been customary from the foundation of the Government—yet, this was not the act of the Secretary; he told the Creek ambassadors that such a sum would be granted them, and that they might pay it to Ridge and Vann, if they thought proper; but no such arrangement should appear on the face of the treaty. As to the list or schedule, according to which the money was to be divided, it was not presented at the War Department till the treaty had gone to the Senate. [Mr. TATTNALL here referred to documents, and Mr. C. acknowledged that, in this particular, he had been under a mistake.] But, though the proposition for a corrupt partition of the money had been made, it had not been assented to; and this, therefore, fixed no immoral charge on the Secretary or the Administration. The treaty does stipulate that the money mentioned shall be paid "to the chiefs and warriors"—whether we can alter that arrangement in this House is a very serious question. But, however this question might be settled, it was doing great injustice to the country and its Government, to say, without better proof, that the Department had connived at a foul fraud.

Mr. MERZER, having before sought in vain to obtain the floor, next addressed the House. If, as a great poet had proclaimed, "an honest man's the noblest work of God," then, said Mr. M., is James Barbour entitled to that high eulogy. No man on earth would more proudly scorn to commit, or to conceal a fraud, than the present Secretary of War. He had witnessed his conduct, in all the relations of life, public and private—in peace and in war—in the tented field, beneath sultry skies—in the dead of Winter, amidst frosts and snows—as Governor, legislator, soldier, and citizen, of Virginia. A purer or more patriotic heart than his beats not in the breast of man. It is no light matter, said Mr. M., in a desultory debate, at the very close of a long protracted session of Congress, to insinuate that such a man has concealed, or connived at the commission of, a "stupendous fraud." Mr. M. denied that the House is bound to carry a treaty into effect, which had been negotiated or consummated by fraud. Prove this of the present treaty, and he would regard it with as little respect as the blank sheet that he held in his hand, [tearing it and casting it on the floor.] Such a treaty, considered as a private contract, would be, in law, not merely voidable, but void. Void, ab initio. So should he regard the treaty of the Indian Springs, if made with incompetent persons, whether fraudulently or not. Had it been submitted to this House for an appropriation, with satisfactory evidence that the Indian negotiators were destitute of authority to make it, he would not have voted a cent to give to it effect.

So would he decide in relation to this treaty, if it were or could be proved, that fraudulent means had been employed for its ratification. But where is the evidence of such fraud? Does any concealment mark this transaction? The fact supposed to warrant the insinuation which has been made is stamped on the very face of the treaty. What says its third article?

"Immediately after the ratification of this treaty, the United States agree to pay to the chiefs of the said nation the sum of two hundred and seventeen thousand and six hundred dollars, to be divided among the chiefs and warriors of the said nation."

Shall be immediately paid to whom? The chiefs assembled here, asserted that they had authority to receive the stipulated consideration. Is that authority doubted or denied? It rests, as they truly say, on the same evidence with their unquestioned power to treat at all. Their subsequent agreement, among themselves, relative to the distribution of a part of the consideration, constitutes no link of the preceding negotiation, no feature of the treaty itself. It is their separate and independent act, for which they are responsible, not to the Secretary of War, or to us, but to those for whom they were deputed to treat. Is the Secretary of War bound—has he the power, to follow these chiefs to their native wilds, in order to execute their laws, to enforce among themselves their own customs, to control them in the final distribution of the money, with which they are entrusted by their nation?

If this treaty be valid, the appropriation which we make should conform to its provisions. If fraudulent and void, no appropriation whatever should be made.

Had the treaty been silent as to the part of the consideration which the chiefs proposed to distribute, before their departure; had this sum been secretly promised; had it been proposed secretly to pay it, so as to screen the receivers from all responsibility to the chiefs and warriors of the Creek nation; there would, indeed, be some ground for the imputation of fraud. On this subject, although negative proof cannot be required, we are happily furnished with the highest exculpatory testimony. A Senator from Missouri, of distinguished abilities, entitled, it need scarcely be added, to the highest credit—a gentleman thoroughly acquainted with the progress of the entire negotiation, had voluntarily communicated to Mr. M.—[here some gentleman exclaimed aloud, that Mr. BENTON had so informed the Senate.] Mr. M. proceeded. He had no right, he said, to advert to what the honorable Senator had said in his place, to the body of which he is a member, but he had a right to refer, for purposes of public justice, to his personal assurance to himself, that, on the part of the Secretary of War, this treaty had been conducted on the fairest and most honorable principles. It would, indeed, furnish matter of surprise, if, while rumor had denied to the Secretary any share of credit for the result of this negotiation, the fraud to which it seems now to be ascribed, should be imputed to him. If the merit of success be awarded to other gentlemen, he should at least be acquitted of blame.

[The Speaker here questioned whether Mr. M. was in order.]

He was misunderstood, Mr. M. replied, by the Chair. He made no charge upon any individual. He had risen to acquit, to vindicate, not to condemn.

[The Speaker said no charge had been made on the Secretary of War.]

It is true, Mr. M. proceeded, and I do not aver that such a charge has been formally made. But the view which had been presented of this whole subject, rendered such an inference natural, if not unavoidable; and he meant, Mr. M. said, to include its possibility.

The New Creek Treaty.

in advising the chiefs who negotiated the treaty, to defer the distribution of any part of the consideration to be paid them, until their return to the bosom of their nation. The language of this friendly and considerate caution has been tortured into proof of an intended fraud, on the part of the chiefs; and of a connivance at its perpetration, on the part of the Secretary of War. A fraud to be perpetrated by those very chiefs who, it may be presumed, and it is said, govern the council of their tribe at home; and which the treaty that they are to bear to that council would disclose upon its very features.

Whatever may be the intention of these chiefs, said Mr. M., do but demonstrate this treaty to be fraudulent, and I am ready to pronounce it void.

He would consider the evils of that civil war, of which a gentleman from Georgia has spoken, as far preferable to the open sanction of an atrocious fraud, by the Congress of the United States. Time has often healed the wounds inflicted by war upon the prosperity of a people; but national morality, the source of all national happiness, when once utterly lost, has rarely, if ever, been restored. He had not, however, risen, Mr. M. said, to discuss the merits of the late Creek treaties, but to vindicate a friend from reproach; and his object was, he hoped, accomplished.

Mr. BAILEY said he could not perceive that the question now before the House, which was on agreeing to the report of the Committee of Conference, involved at all the question of the treaty, or the character of any individual. The treaty provides, that a certain sum of money shall be paid to the chiefs and warriors of the Creek nation. The Senate adds, as an amendment, that the money shall be distributed in a certain manner; the treaty did not contradict such an arrangement—but the House disapproved and disagreed to it. The Senate insisted on their amendment—conferees were appointed—and after some discussion, the managers of the conference agreed that the amendment proposed by the House will effect the same object as that contemplated by the amendment of the Senate. It goes, indeed, a little farther, and insists that the division of the money shall be made in full council of the nation. But now it is said that the chiefs design to appropriate the whole sum to their own use. The arrangement proposed will certainly prevent the accomplishment of any such design, if it exist. I would have consented to the amendment of the Senate as sufficient—but I think that reported by the conferees holds out a more effectual security—and it certainly presents no question involving the integrity or reputation of any gentleman. The session draws rapidly to its close, and we have on our table some forty or fifty bills, in which sundry individuals have a deep interest. Under such circumstances, whatever feelings may exist in the minds of some gentlemen on the subject of this treaty, there certainly can be no need of expressing them any further than has already been done.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Georgia, said, that, however impatient the House might be to take the question, he felt disposed to avail himself of that opportunity to submit a few brief remarks to the House on the subject then under discussion. Mr. T. said, that the honorable Chairman of the Committee of Conference had given it as his opinion that the Government, in carrying the treaty into effect, ought to pursue, literally, the stipulations of the treaty. In that opinion, Mr. T. entirely agreed with the honorable chairman, as well as with his friend from Georgia, (Colonel TATNALL,) but this coincidence of opinion, between the honorable chairman and himself, lead to results directly opposite. The chairman of the committee is opposed to the amendment originally made to this bill by the Senate, because that amendment provided that the consideration money, to be paid under this treaty, should be paid to the Creek Indians, according to the scale of distribution of annuities, which provision the honorable gentleman considers a departure from, or a violation of, the third article of the treaty, which stipulates that the money should be paid to the chiefs, head-men, and warriors of the Creek nation of Indians. How, then, can that honorable gentleman support the amendment proposed by the Committee of Conference? Does not the provisions of this amendment equally violate the stipulations of the third article of the treaty? That article expressly stipulated, that the United States shall pay to the chiefs, head-men, and warriors of the Creek nation of Indians, a certain sum of money, "immediately after the ratification of the treaty." What is the plain and obvious meaning of these words? May not these chiefs demand immediate payment to be made to them here? Have the United States a right to withhold payment now, and so alter the treaty that payment shall be made, not here, but in the Creek nation, and at a future period? If it is competent for the United States to defer the payment to a future period, how long may they not withhold it? If this is a treaty, the delegation may certainly, according to its stipulations, demand the money immediately. The honorable chairman of the committee informs me, said Mr. T., "that the chiefs, head-men, and warriors of the Creek nation of Indians, are not here, but in the Creek nation, and that payment must, consequently, be made to a council of, and in, the nation; inasmuch as the treaty stipulates payment to be made to the chiefs, head-men, and warriors of that nation." Mr. T. said, if he had supposed those chiefs, head-men, and warriors to be here, he stood corrected by the gentleman; but, if the gentleman conceded to the delegation the power to conclude this contract or treaty, he surely would not deny to them the right to receive the consideration money. This right had been conceded to them by the Department: for, on the presentation by John Ridge and Joe Vann (Cherokees) of a list, exhibiting a scale of an intended distribution of one hundred and fifty-nine thousand dollars, with a demand that the sums designated should be separately counted, sealed up, and paid, in the Department, to the individuals to whom those sums were respectively assigned, the head of the Indian Bureau replied, that payment could not be made there, but that he had no doubt that the officers of the bank would, to oblige them, make the arrangement required. Although, Mr. T. said, he did not consider this a valid treaty, yet those who claimed the possession of competent power, had decided that it was: and, agreeing with the honorable chairman, and his friend from Georgia, that the stipulations of a treaty ought to be literally fulfilled and complied with, he could not support either of the amendments which had been proposed; because each was equally a violation of the third article of the treaty; but if, like the honorable chairman, he could vote for the amendment reported by the committee, and now under consideration, he could more readily and cheerfully vote for the Senate's first amendment, as better calculated to secure the legitimate objects of the treaty, and meet the ends of justice. And here he could not but express much surprise, that gentlemen had been unable to find, in the circumstances of this transaction, any evidence of an intention, on the part of the delegation, to commit a fraud upon their nation. Mr. T. said he cherished due respect for gentlemen and their opinions, but the evidence of fraud was so clear to him, that he could not conceive how it could be doubted. Where, asked Mr. T., in the history of the repudiated treaty, can you find the evidence of fraud so gross as that which is exhibited by the documents connected with the treaty now under consideration? There was none. Mr. T. said he conceded to the Secretary of War the high character which had been attributed to him, in the course of this debate, by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. MEXON,)—he felt no disposition to derogate from his merit—and he protested against the right of any member to attribute to him an unfriendly disposition towards the honorable Secretary; but he must state the facts of the transaction, and facts were stubborn things. Before the treaty was ratified, a list had been exhibited by John Ridge and Joe Vann, to the head of the Indian Bureau, showing the intended distribution of the money to be paid under the treaty; and, from that list, it appeared that $15,000 was to be paid to John Ridge, another $15,000 to Joe Vann, and $10,000 to old Major Ridge, another Cherokee. The head of the Indian Bureau was apprised of the intended fraud, and the only notice which he deigned to take of the corrupt intention was, a simple declaration that it was no affair of the Government. Ridge and Vann had, however, been asked, whether the whole delegation knew as well as they did, the mode which they had adopted for the distribution of the money! Ridge frankly answered, "No;" but that Opothele Yoholo and Charles Coranells knew, and that was enough. This was reported by the head of the Indian Bureau to the Secretary of War, who directed that the delegation should appear in the Department. They attended. The Secretary represented to them the danger that might arise from so partial a distribution of their money; as their people might not subscribe to it. They replied, that they knew what they were about. "The interpreter was then directed to say that the Secretary of War had no desire to control that over which the treaty had given them the power, but, as the paper had been handed to him, he wished to read it, and know whether they agreed to have the disposition made of the money which was therein indicated. They answered, each, and individually, Yes;" repeating that it was their own arrangement, and the fears the Secretary had expressed, in regard to the probable effects of such a course, upon their people at home, need not be indulged, for that they would see that their people ratified the arrangement, as, in the event of any dissatisfaction, they had their annuity, and this very money, and would so apply it as to satisfy all. The Secretary replied, "that he still had his fears, but could only advise." Thus, said Mr. T., the facts show, that the Secretary was well acquainted with the intended fraud. But gentlemen see no fraud, no corruption in all this. Look into these documents. Here is tangible evidence of gross corruption. It was evident that Ridge and Vann had attempted a trick on the Creek Delegation. Mr. T. said, it was true that the whole delegation had heard the paper read, yet they did not understand English, and he presumed the honorable Secretary did not understand the Creek Indian language. It was, therefore, no very difficult matter for an apt interpreter to deceive both the Secretary and the Indians. One thing, said Mr. T., is, however, clear, that John Ridge, and Joe Vann, and old Major Ridge, all Cherokee Indians, were to receive forty thousand dollars of the money which was, according to the stipulations of the treaty, to be paid by the United States to the chiefs, head-men, and warriors of the Creek nation of Indians, in consideration of the territory ceded by the Creek Indians to the United States. What entitled these Cherokees to this enormous sum? They had no interest in the Creek nation. They were not entitled to one foot of land in the Creek country, neither were they chiefs, head-men, or warriors of the Creek nation of Indians. What claim, then, could they have to forty thousand dollars of the money stipulated to be paid by the United States to the chiefs, head-men, and warriors of the Creek nation of Indians? Mr. T. said, it could not be concealed that there was palpable and gross fraud and corruption in this transaction. Gentlemen say, all this was not concealed. They had heard it openly spoken of. All he could say to this was, they had been more fortunate than he had been. He certainly had never heard of these corrupt transactions, or that such a sum as forty thousand dollars was intended to be given to Cherokee Indians, who have no interest in the treaty, until this information was drawn from the department by the Committee of Conference.

Mr. DWIGHT insisted that the amendment was in accordance with the treaty; the treaty says the money shall be paid "to the chiefs and warriors." "The chiefs" of the Creek nation are not here—they are in the Creek nation—a delegation only is here, for diplomatic purposes, but "the chiefs" are at home; if the money, then, should be paid in the midst of a council of the nation, it would be paid as the treaty stipulates.

Mr. THOMPSON said, that, if he had supposed that all the chiefs of the Creek nation were present in the City of Washington, he stood corrected by the gentleman from Massachusetts; but, if the delegation here from the Creek nation were duly authorized to make the contract, then the chiefs, head-men, and warriors of the Creek nation, were virtually present; and, even if the money must be paid to the chiefs and warriors, it would be no violation of the treaty, should payment be made to their delegation. If the delegation had power to enter into, they had power to consummate the contract; that immediate payment of the consideration money was indispensable to the consummation of the contract; that, as the treaty stipulates that the money should be paid to the chiefs, head-men, and warriors of the Creek nation, immediately on the ratification of the treaty, it would be a violation of its express stipulations, should payment be withheld until a future period; for, if it can be withheld one day, it may be withheld indefinitely.

Mr. HOFFMAN said he was anxious to see this matter ended. For himself, he should prefer the amendment of the Senate; but he believed there was not now sufficient time to attain it—and, being of opinion, that the present proposition would be so carried into effect as to prevent the fraud contemplated, he would consent to vote for it.

Mr. WILLIAMS now moved the previous question, but withdrew the motion under an assurance that the debate would not be further protracted.

The question was then put on agreeing to the report of the Committee of Conference, and carried.

Accounts of Mr. Monroe.

The Senate's amendment to the bill "for the relief of James Monroe," as insisted on by that body, having been read, (allowing interest, which, with the principal, amounts to $29,000)—

Mr. DWIGHT moved that the House do recede from its disagreement to the Senate's amendment.

On this question, Mr. SAWYER called for the yeas and nays. They were ordered, and were—yeas 68, nays 57.

So the motion prevailed, and the House agreed to recede from its disagreement, (the effect of which is to pass the bill as amended.)

And the House adjourned, (at half-past four o'clock, A. M.)

MONDAY, May 22.

On motion of Mr. TOMLINSON, it was Ordered, That a message be sent to the Senate, to inform them that this House, having completed the business before them, are ready to close the present session by an adjournment on their part; and that the Clerk do go with the said message.

Mr. WRIGHT offered the following:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed, on the part of this House, to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the Senate, to wait on the President of the United States, and to notify him that, unless he may have other communications to make to the two Houses of Congress, they are ready to adjourn.

The resolution was agreed to, and

Mr. MERCER and Mr. TOMLINSON were appointed a committee on the part of the House.

Mr. MERCER, from the above-named committee, reported that they had waited on the President, and informed him that the two Houses were ready to adjourn, and that he informed them that he had no further communication to make to either House.

When, on motion of Mr. BASSETT, the House adjourned, to meet on the first Monday in December next.

NINETEENTH CONGRESS.—SECOND SESSION.

PROCEEDINGS IN THE SENATE,

MONDAY, December 4, 1836.

The Hon. JOHN C. CALHOUN, Vice President of the United States, took the chair at 12 o'clock, and the roll being called over by the Secretary, (WALTER LOWRIE, Esq.,) it appeared that thirty-eight members were present.

The usual message was communicated to the House of Representatives, of being formed, &c., and the usual standing orders agreed to.

Honors to the Dead.

Mr. CLAYTON rose, and addressed the Senate as follows:

In consequence of the lamented death of my late colleague, Mr. VAN DYKE, during the last session of the Senate, but at a period so late that intelligence of the event did not arrive here before the termination of the session, I now take occasion to propose the usual resolutions testifying the respect of the Senate for the memory of the deceased, and their regret for his death. His amiable temper and gentlemanly deportment—his talents and high standing in this body, were too well known to all the members to need any eulogy from me. As he was known to them all, so must his memory be respected and his death lamented; and, therefore, I propose the following resolution:

Resolved, That the members of the Senate, from a desire of showing every mark of respect due to the memory of the Hon. NICHOLAS VAN DYKE, deceased, late a Senator from the State of Delaware, will go into mourning for him one month, by the usual mode of wearing crape round the left arm.

The resolution was agreed to, nem. con.

Mr. DICKERSON then rose, and said,

Mr. President: The melancholy duty devolves upon me, of announcing to the Senate the death of my late colleague, the Hon. JOSEPH MCILVAINE. Mr. MCILVAINE was selected, by the Legislature of New Jersey, to represent the State in this body, from a knowledge of his learning, talents, and integrity. Unfortunately, during the whole time of his being associated with us, he was the victim of a painful disease, which terminated only with his life. Notwithstanding, he assiduously performed all the duties of his station, so far as the debilitated state of his health would permit; and, in all his intercourse with the Senate, his deportment was of a character so courteous and conciliating, that he gained the esteem of all his associates. As a mark of the respect which the Senate entertains for his character and memory, I beg leave to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the members of the Senate, from a desire of showing every mark of respect due to the memory of the Honorable JOSEPH MCILVAINE, deceased, late a Senator from the State of New Jersey, will go into mourning for him one month, by the usual mode of wearing crape round the left arm.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to.

TUESDAY, December 5.

Mr. SMITH, from the Joint Committee appointed to wait on the President of the United States, and "inform him that quorums of the two Houses have assembled, and that Congress are ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make," reported, that the committee had performed the duties of their appointment, and that the President of the United States answered that he would make a communication, in writing, to the two Houses of Congress, this day, at twelve o'clock.

Soon after which, the private Secretary of the President, (Mr. J. ADAMS,) came in and delivered the Message.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:—

The assemblage of the representatives of our Union in both Houses of Congress at this time, occurs under circumstances calling for the renewed homage of our grateful acknowledgments to the Giver of all good. With the exceptions incidental to the most felicitous condition of human existence, we continue to be highly favored in all the elements which contribute to individual comfort and to national prosperity. In the survey of our extensive country, we are generally to observe abodes of health and regions of plenty. In our civil and political relations, we have peace without, and tranquillity within our borders. We are, as a people, increasing with unabated rapidity in population, wealth, and national resources; and, whatever differences of opinion exist among us with regard to the mode and the means by which we shall turn the beneficence of Heaven to the improvement of our own condition, there is yet a spirit animating us all, which will not suffer the bounties of Providence to be showered upon us in vain, but will receive them with grateful hearts, and apply them with unwearied hands to the advancement of the general good.

Of the subjects recommended to the consideration of Congress at their last session, some were then definitely acted upon. Others left unfinished, but partly matured, will recur to your attention, without needing a renewal of notice from me. The purpose of this communication will be to present to your view the general aspect of our public affairs at this moment, and the measures which have been taken to carry into effect the intentions of the legislature as signified by the laws then and heretofore enacted.

In our intercourse with the other nations of the earth, we have still the happiness of enjoying peace and a general good understanding; qualified, however, in several important instances, by collisions of interest, and by unsatisfied claims of justice, to the settlement of which the constitutional interposition of the legislative authority may become ultimately indispensable.

By the decease of the Emperor Alexander of Russia, which occurred contemporaneously with the commencement of the last session of Congress, the United States have been deprived of a long-tried, steady, and faithful friend. Born to the inheritance of absolute power, and trained in the school of adversity, from which no power on earth, however absolute, is exempt, that monarch, from his youth had been taught to feel the force and value of public opinion, and to be sensible that the interests of his own government would be best promoted by a frank and friendly intercourse with this republic, as those of his people would be advanced by a liberal commercial intercourse with our country. A candid and confidential interchange of sentiments between him and the Government of the United States, upon the affairs of South America, took place at a period not long preceding his demise, and contributed to fix that course of policy which left to the other Governments of Europe no alternative but that of sooner or later recognizing the independence of our southern neighbors, of which the example had by the United States already been set. The ordinary diplomatic communications between his successor, the Emperor Nicholas, and the United States, have suffered some interruption by the illness, departure, and subsequent decease of his minister residing here, who enjoyed, as he merited, the entire confidence of his new sovereign, as he had eminently responded to that of his predecessor. But we have had the most satisfactory assurances that the sentiments of the reigning emperor toward the United States are altogether conformable to those which had so long and constantly animated his imperial brother; and we have reason to hope that they will serve to cement that harmony and good understanding between the two nations which, founded in congenial interests, cannot but result in the advancement of the welfare and prosperity of both.

Our relations of commerce and navigation with France are, by the operation of the convention of 24th June, 1822, with that nation, in a state of gradual and progressive improvement. Convinced by all our experience, no less than by the principles of fair and liberal reciprocity which the United States have constantly tendered to all the nations of the earth, as the rule of commercial intercourse which they would universally prefer, that fair and equal competition is most conducive to the interests of both parties, the United States, in the negotiation of that convention, earnestly contended for a mutual renunciation of discriminating duties and charges in the ports of the two countries. Unable to obtain the immediate recognition of this principle in its full extent, after reducing the duties of discrimination so far as was found attainable, it was agreed that, at the expiration of two years from the first of October, 1822, when the convention was to go into effect, unless a notice of six months on either side should be given to the other, that the convention itself must terminate, those duties should be reduced by one-fourth, and that this reduction should be yearly repeated until all discrimination should cease while the convention itself should continue in force. By the effect of this stipulation, three-fourths of the discriminating duties which had been levied by each party, upon the vessels of the other in its ports, have already been removed; and on the first of next October, should the convention be still in force, the remaining fourth will be discontinued. French vessels, laden with French produce, will be received in our ports on the same terms as our own; and ours, in return, will enjoy the same advantages in the ports of France.

By these approximations to an equality of duties and of charges, not only has the commerce between the two countries prospered, but friendly dispositions have been on both sides encouraged and promoted. They will continue to be cherished and cultivated on the part of the United States. It would have been gratifying to have had it in my power to add, that the claims upon the justice of the French Government, involving the property and the comfortable subsistence of many of our fellow-citizens, and which have been so long and so earnestly urged, were in a more promising train of adjustment than at your last meeting; but their condition remains unaltered.

With the Government of the Netherlands, the mutual abandonment of discriminating duties had been regulated by the legislative acts on both sides. The act of Congress of the 20th of April, 1818, abolished all discriminating duties of impost and tonnage, upon the vessels and produce of the Netherlands in the ports of the United States, upon the assurance given by the Government of the Netherlands, that all such duties operating against the shipping and commerce of the United States in that kingdom had been abolished. These reciprocal regulations had continued in force several years, when the discriminating principle was resumed by the Netherlands in a new and indirect form, by a bounty of ten per cent., in the shape of a return of duties to their national vessels, and in which those of the United States are not permitted to participate. By the act of Congress of the 7th of January, 1824, all discriminating duties in the United States were again suspended, so far as related to the vessels and produce of the Netherlands, so long as the reciprocal exemption should be extended to the vessels and produce of the United States in the Netherlands. But the same act provides that, in the event of a restoration of discriminating duties to operate against the shipping and commerce of the United States in any of the foreign countries referred to therein, the suspension of discriminating duties in favor of the navigation of such foreign country should cease, and all the provisions of the acts imposing discriminating foreign tonnage and import duties in the United States should revive and be in full force with regard to that nation.

In the correspondence with the Government of the Netherlands upon this subject, they have contended that the favor shown to their own shipping by this bounty upon their tonnage is not to be considered as a discriminatory duty. But it cannot be denied that it produces all the same effects. Had the mutual abolition been stipulated by treaty, such a bounty upon the national vessels could scarcely have been granted consistently with good faith. Yet, as the act of Congress of 7th January, 1824, has not expressly authorized the executive authority to determine what shall be considered as a revival of discriminating duties by a foreign Government to the disadvantage of the United States, and as the retaliatory measure on our part, however just and necessary, may tend rather to that conflict of legislation which we deprecate, than to that concert to which we invite all commercial nations as most conducive to their interest and our own, I have thought it more consistent with the spirit of our institutions to refer the subject again to the paramount authority of the legislature to decide what measure the emergency may require, than abruptly by proclamation to carry into effect the minatory provision of the act of 1824.

During the last session of Congress, treaties of amity, navigation, and commerce, were negotiated and signed at this place with the Government of Denmark in Europe, and with the federation of Central America in this hemisphere. These treaties then received the constitutional sanction of the Senate, by the advice and consent to their ratification. They were accordingly ratified on the part of the United States, and during the recess of Congress, have also been ratified by the other respective contracting parties. The ratifications have been exchanged, and they have been published by proclamations, copies of which are herewith communicated to Congress. These treaties have established between the contracting parties the principles of equality and reciprocity in their broadest and most liberal extent. Each party admitting the vessels of the other into its ports, laden with cargoes the produce or manufacture of any quarter of the globe, upon the payment of the same duties of tonnage and impost that are chargeable upon their own. They have further stipulated, that the parties shall hereafter grant no favor of navigation or commerce to any other nation, which shall not, upon the same terms, be granted to each other; and that neither party will impose upon articles of merchandise, the produce or manufacture of the other, any other or higher duties than upon the like articles, being the produce or manufacture of any other country. To these principles there is, in the convention with Denmark, an exception with regard to the colonies of that kingdom in the Arctic seas, but none with regard to her colonies in the West Indies.

In the course of the last summer, the term to which our last commercial treaty with Sweden was limited has expired. A continuation of it is in the contemplation of the Swedish Government, and is believed to be desirable on the part of the United States. It has been proposed by the King of Sweden that, pending the negotiation of renewal, the expired treaty should be mutually considered as still in force; a measure which will require the sanction of Congress to be carried into effect on our part, and which I therefore recommend to your consideration.

With Prussia, Spain, Portugal, and in general all the European powers, between whom and the United States relations of friendly intercourse have existed, their condition has not materially varied since the last session of Congress. I regret not to be able to say the same of our commercial intercourse with the colonial possessions of Great Britain in America. Negotiations of the highest importance to our common interests have been for several years in discussion between the two Governments, and on the part of the United States have been invariably pursued in the spirit of candor and conciliation. Interests of great magnitude and delicacy had been adjusted by the conventions of 1815 and 1818, while that of 1823, mediated by the late Emperor Alexander, had promised a satisfactory compromise of claims which the Government of the United States, in justice to the rights of a numerous class of their citizens, was bound to sustain. But with regard to the commercial intercourse between the United States and the British colonies in America, it has been hitherto found impracticable to bring the parties to an understanding satisfactory to both. The relative geographical position, and the respective products of nature, cultivated by human industry, had constituted the elements of a commercial intercourse between the United States and British America, insular and continental, important to the inhabitants of both countries. But it had been interdicted by Great Britain, upon a principle heretofore practised upon by the colonizing nations of Europe, of holding the trade of their colonies, each in exclusive monopoly to herself. After the termination of the late war, this interdiction had been revived, and the British Government declined including this portion of our intercourse with her possessions in the negotiation of the convention of 1815. The trade was then carried on exclusively in British vessels, till the act of Congress concerning navigation, of 1818, and the supplemental act of 1820, met the interdiction by a corresponding measure on the part of the United States. These measures, not of retaliation, but of necessary self-defence, were soon succeeded by an act of parliament, opening certain colonial ports to the vessels of the United States, coming directly from them, and to the importation from them of certain articles of our produce, burdened with heavy duties, and excluding some of the most valuable articles of our exports. The United States opened their ports to British vessels from the colonies upon terms as exactly corresponding with those of the act of parliament, as in the relative position of the parties could be made. And a negotiation was commenced by mutual consent, with the hope on our part that a reciprocal spirit of accommodation and a common sentiment of the importance of the trade to the interests of the inhabitants of the two countries, between whom it must be carried on, would ultimately bring the parties to a compromise, with which both might be satisfied. With this view, the President's Message.

[SENATE.]

Government of the United States had determined to sacrifice something of that entire reciprocity which in all commercial arrangements with foreign powers they are entitled to demand, and to acquiesce in some inequalities disadvantageous to ourselves, rather than to forego the benefit of a final and permanent adjustment of this interest, to the satisfaction of Great Britain herself. The negotiation, repeatedly suspended by accidental circumstances, was, however, by mutual agreement and express assent, considered as pending, and to be speedily resumed. In the mean time, another act of parliament, so doubtful and ambiguous in its import as to have been misunderstood by the officers in the colonies who were to carry it into execution, opens again certain colonial ports, upon new conditions and terms, with a threat to close them against any nation which may not accept those terms, as prescribed by the British Government. This act, passed in July, 1825, not communicated to the Government of the United States, not understood by the British officers of the customs in the colonies where it was to be enforced, was nevertheless submitted to the consideration of Congress at their last session. With the knowledge that a negotiation upon the subject had long been in progress, and pledges given of its resumption at an early day, it was deemed expedient to await the result of that negotiation, rather than to subscribe implicitly to terms, the import of which was not clear, and which the British authorities themselves in this hemisphere were not prepared to explain.

Immediately after the close of the last session of Congress, one of our most distinguished citizens was despatched as Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to Great Britain, furnished with instructions which we could not doubt would lead to a conclusion of this long-controverted interest, upon terms acceptable to Great Britain. Upon his arrival, and before he had delivered his letters of credence, he was met by an order of the British council, excluding, from and after the first of December now current, the vessels of the United States from all the colonial British ports, excepting those immediately bordering upon our territories. In answer to his expostulations upon a measure thus unexpected, he is informed that, according to the ancient maxims of policy of European nations having colonies, their trade is an exclusive possession of the mother-country. That all participation in it by other nations is a boon or favor not forming a subject of negotiation, but to be regulated by the legislative acts of the power owning the colony. That the British Government, therefore, declines negotiating concerning it, and that as the United States did not forthwith accept, purely and simply, the terms offered by the act of parliament of July, 1825, Great Britain would not admit the vessels of the United States even upon the terms on which she had opened them to the navigation of other nations.

We have been accustomed to consider the trade which we have enjoyed with the British colonies rather as an interchange of mutual benefits than as a mere favor received; that under every circumstance we have given an ample equivalent. We have seen every other nation holding colonies negotiate with other nations, and grant them freely admission to the colonies by treaty; and, so far as the other colonizing nations of Europe now from refusing to negotiate for trade with their colonies, that we ourselves have secured access to the colonies of more than one of them by treaty. The refusal, however, of Great Britain to negotiate, leaves to the United States no other alternative than that of regulating, or interdicting altogether the trade on their part, according as either measure may affect the interests of our own country; and with that exclusive object, I would recommend the whole subject to your calm and candid deliberations.

It is hoped that our unavailing exertions to accomplish a good understanding on this interest will not have an unpropitious effect upon the other great topics of discussion between the two Governments. Our northeastern and northwestern boundaries are still unadjusted. The commissioners under the 7th article of the treaty of Ghent have nearly come to the close of their labors; nor can we renounce the expectation, enfeebled as it is, that they may agree upon their report to the satisfaction or acquiescence of both parties. The commission for liquidating the claims for indemnity for slaves carried away after the close of the war has been sitting, with doubtful prospects of success. Propositions of compromise have, however, passed between the two Governments, the result of which we flatter ourselves may yet prove satisfactory. Our own dispositions and purposes toward Great Britain are all friendly and conciliatory: nor can we abandon, but with strong reluctance, the belief that they will ultimately meet a return, not of favors, which we neither ask nor desire, but of equal reciprocity and good will.

With the American Governments of this hemisphere we continue to maintain an intercourse altogether friendly, and between their nations and ours that commercial interchange of which mutual benefit is the source, and mutual comfort and harmony the result, is in a continual state of improvement. The war between Spain and them, since the total expulsion of the Spanish military force from their continental territories, has been little more than nominal; and their internal tranquillity, though occasionally menaced by the agitations which civil wars never fail to leave behind them, has not been affected by any serious calamity.

The Congress of ministers from several of those nations which assembled at Panama, after a short session there, adjourned to meet again, at a more favorable season, in the neighborhood of Mexico. The decease of one of our ministers on his way to the isthmus, and the impediments of the season, which delayed the departure of the other, deprived us of the advantage of being represented at the first meeting of the Congress. There is, however, no reason to believe that any of the transactions of the Congress were of a nature to affect injuriously the interests of the United States, or to require the interposition of our ministers had they been present. Their absence has, indeed, deprived us of the opportunity of possessing precise and authentic information of the treaties which were concluded at Panama; and the whole result has confirmed me in the conviction of the expediency to the United States of being represented at the Congress. The surviving member of the mission, appointed during your last session, has accordingly proceeded to his destination, and a successor to his distinguished and lamented associate will be nominated to the Senate. A treaty of amity, navigation, and commerce, has, in the course of last summer, been concluded by our Minister Plenipotentiary at Mexico, with the United States and that confederacy, which will also be laid before the Senate for their advice with regard to its ratification.

In adverting to the present condition of our fiscal concerns, and to the prospects of our revenue, the first remark that calls our attention is, that they are less exuberantly prosperous than they were at the corresponding period of the last year. The severe shock so extensively sustained by the commercial and manufacturing interests in Great Britain has not been without a perceptible recoil upon ourselves. A reduced importation from abroad is necessarily succeeded by a reduced return to the treasury at home. The net revenue of the present year will not equal that of the last. And the receipts of that which is to come will fall short of those in the current year. The diminution, however, is in part attributable to the flourishing condition of some of our domestic manufactures, and so far is compensated by an equivalent more profitable to the nation. It is also highly gratifying to perceive, that the deficiency in the revenue, while it scarcely exceeds the anticipations of the last year's estimates from the treasury, has not interrupted the application of more than eleven millions during the present year, to the discharge of the principal and interest of the debt, nor the reduction of upward of seven millions of the capital debt itself. The balance in the treasury on the 1st of January last, was five millions two hundred and one thousand six hundred and fifty dollars, forty-three cents. The receipts from that time to the 30th September last, were nineteen millions five hundred and eighty-five thousand nine hundred and thirty-two dollars, fifty cents. The receipts of the current quarter, estimated at six millions of dollars, yield, with the sums already received, a revenue of about twenty-five millions and a half for the year. The expenditures for the first three-quarters of the year have amounted to eighteen millions seven hundred and fourteen thousand two hundred and twenty-six dollars, sixty-six cents. The expenditures of the current quarter are expected, including the two millions of the principal debt to be paid, to balance the receipts. So that the expenses of the year, amounting to upward of a million less than its income, will leave a proportionally increased balance in the treasury on the first of January, 1827, over that of the first of January last. Instead of five millions two hundred thousand dollars, there will be six millions four hundred thousand dollars.

The amount of duties secured on merchandise imported from the commencement of the year until the 30th of September, is estimated at twenty-one millions two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, and the amount that will probably accrue during the present quarter, is estimated at four millions two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, making for the whole year twenty-five millions five hundred thousand dollars, from which the drawbacks being deducted, will leave a clear revenue from the customs, receivable in the year 1827, of about twenty millions four hundred thousand dollars, which, with the sums to be received from the proceeds of the public lands, the bank dividends, and other incidental receipts, will form an aggregate of about twenty-three millions of dollars, a sum falling short of the whole expenses of the present year, little more than the portion of those expenditures applied to the discharge of the public debt, beyond the annual appropriation of ten millions of dollars by the act of the 3d March, 1817.

At the passage of that act, the public debt amounted to one hundred and twenty-three millions five hundred thousand dollars. On the 1st of January next it will be short of seventy-four millions of dollars. In the lapse of these ten years, fifty millions of dollars of public debt, with the annual charge of upward of three millions of dollars of interest upon them, have been extinguished. At the passage of that act, of the annual appropriation of the ten millions of dollars, seven were absorbed in the payment of interest, and not more than three millions of dollars went to reduce the capital of the debt. Of the same ten millions of dollars, at this time scarcely four are applicable to the interest, and upward of six are effective in melting down the capital. Yet your experience has proved, that a revenue consisting so largely of imposts and tonnage ebbs and flows, to an extraordinary extent, with all the fluctuations incident to the general commerce of the world. It is within our recollection that even in the compass of the same last ten years, the receipts of the treasury were not adequate to the expenditures of the year; and that in two successive years it was found necessary to resort to loans to meet the engagements of the nation. The returning tides of the succeeding years replenished the public coffers, until they have again begun to feel the vicissitudes of a decline. To produce these alterations of fulness and exhaustion, the relative operation of abundant or of unfruitful seasons, the regulations of foreign Governments, political revolutions, the prosperous or decaying condition of manufactures, commercial speculations, and many other causes, not always to be traced, variously combine. We have found the alternate swells and diminutions embracing periods of from two to three years. The last period of depression to us was from 1819 to 1822. The corresponding revival was from 1823 to the commencement of the present year. Still we have no cause to apprehend a depression comparable to that of the former period, or even to anticipate a deficiency which will intrench upon the ability to apply the annual ten millions of dollars to the reduction of the debt. It is well for us, however, to be admonished of the necessity of abiding by the maxims of the most vigilant economy, and of resorting to all honorable and useful expedients, for the pursuing with steady and inflexible perseverance the total discharge of the debt.

Besides the seven millions of dollars of the loans of 1813, which will have been discharged in the course of the present year, there are nine millions of dollars which, by the terms of the contracts, would have been, and are now redeemable. Thirteen millions of dollars more of the loan of 1814 will become redeemable from and after the expiration of the present month, and nine other millions from and after the close of the ensuing year. They constitute a mass of thirty-one millions of dollars, all bearing an interest of six per cent., more than twenty millions of dollars of which will be immediately redeemable, and the rest within little more than a year. Leaving of this amount fifteen millions of dollars to continue at the interest of six per cent., but to be, as far as shall be found practicable, paid off in the years 1827 and 1828, there is scarcely a doubt that the remaining sixteen millions might within a few months be discharged by a loan at not exceeding five per cent., redeemable in the years 1829 and 1830. By this operation, a sum of nearly five hundred thousand dollars may be saved to the nation; and the discharge of the whole thirty-one millions of dollars within the four years, may be greatly facilitated, if not wholly accomplished.

President's Message.

By an act of Congress of 3d March, 1825, a loan for the purpose now referred to, or a subscription to stock, was authorized, at an interest not exceeding four and a half per cent. But, at that time, so large a portion of the floating capital of the country was absorbed in commercial speculations, and so little was left for investment in the stocks, that the measure was but partially successful. At the last session of Congress, the condition of the funds was still unpropitious to the measure; but the change so soon afterward occurred that, had the authority existed to redeem the nine millions of dollars now redeemable by an exchange of stocks, or a loan of five per cent., it is morally certain that it might have been effected, and with it a yearly saving of ninety thousand dollars.

With regard to the collection of revenue of impost, certain occurrences have within the last year been disclosed in one or two of our principal ports, which engaged the attention of Congress at their last session, and may hereafter require further consideration. Until within a very few years, the execution of the laws for raising the revenue, like that of all our other laws, has been insured more by the moral sense of the community, than by the rigors of a jealous precaution, or by penal sanctions. Confiding in the exemplary punctuality and the unswerving integrity of our importing merchants, a gradual relaxation from the provisions of the collection laws, a close adherence to which would have caused inconvenience and expense to them, had long become habitual; and indulgences had been extended universally, because they had never been abused. It may be worthy of your serious consideration whether some further legislative provision may not be necessary to come in aid of this state of unguarded security.

From the reports herewith communicated, of the Secretaries of War and of the Navy, with the subsidiary documents annexed to them, will be discovered the present condition and administration of our military establishment on the land and on the sea. The organization of the army having undergone no change since its reduction to the present peace establishment in 1821, it remains only to observe, that it is yet found adequate to all the purposes for which a permanent armed force in time of peace can be needed or useful. It may be proper to add that, from a difference of opinion between the late President of the United States and the Senate, with regard to the construction of the act of Congress of the 2d of March, 1821, to reduce and fix the military peace establishment of the United States, it remains hitherto so far without execution, that no colonel has been appointed to command one of the regiments of artillery. A supplementary or explanatory act of the legislature appears to be the only expedient practicable for removing the difficulty of this appointment.

In a period of profound peace, the conduct of the mere military establishment forms but a very inconsiderable portion of the duties devolving upon the administration of the Department of War. It will be seen by the returns from the subordinate departments of the army, that every branch of the service is marked with order, regularity, and discipline. That from the commanding general through all the gradations of superintendence, the officers feel themselves to have been citizens before they were soldiers, and that the glory of a republican army must consist in the spirit of freedom by which it is animated, and of patriotism by which it is impelled. It may be confidently stated, that the moral character of the army is in a state of continual improvement, and that all the arrangements for the disposal of its parts have a constant reference to that end.

But to the War Department are attributed other duties, having indeed relation to a future possible condition of war, but being purely defensive, and in their tendency contributing rather to the security and permanency of peace. The erection of the fortifications provided for by Congress, and adapted to secure our shores from hostile invasion; the distribution of the fund of public gratitude and justice to the pensioners of the revolutionary war; the maintenance of our relations of peace and of protection with the Indian tribes; and the internal improvements and surveys for the location of roads and canals, which, during the last three sessions of Congress, have engaged so much of their attention, and may engross so large a share of their future benefactions to our country.

By the act of the 30th of April, 1824, suggested and approved by my predecessor, the sum of thirty thousand dollars was appropriated for the purpose of causing to be made the necessary surveys, plans, and estimates of the routes of such roads and canals as the President of the United States might deem of national importance in a commercial or military point of view, or necessary for the transportation of the public mail. The surveys, plans, and estimates for each, when completed, will be laid before Congress.

In execution of this act, a board of engineers was immediately instituted, and have been since most assiduously and constantly occupied in carrying it into effect. The first object to which their labors were directed, by order of the late President, was the examination of the country between the tide waters of the Potomac, the Ohio, and Lake Erie, to ascertain the practicability of a communication between them, to designate the most suitable route for the same, and to form plans and estimates, in detail of the expense of execution.

On the third of February, 1825, they made their first report, which was immediately communicated to Congress, and in which they declared, that having maturely considered the circumstances observed by them personally, and carefully studied the results of such of the preliminary surveys as were then completed, they were decidedly of opinion that the communication was practicable.

At the last session of Congress, before the board of engineers were enabled to make up their second report, containing a general plan and preparatory estimates for the work, the committee of the House of Representatives upon roads and canals, closed the session with a report, expressing the hope that the plans and estimates of the board of engineers might at this time be prepared, and that the subject be referred to the early and favorable consideration of Congress at their present session. That expected report of the board of engineers is prepared, and will forthwith be laid before you.

and instruction of field artillery, for the use of the militia of the United States, to be reported to Congress at the present session, a board of distinguished officers of the army and of the militia has been convened, whose report will be submitted to you, with that of the Secretary of War. The occasion was thought favorable for consulting the same board, aided by the results of a correspondence with the Governors of the several States and Territories, and other citizens of intelligence and experience, upon the acknowledged defective condition of our militia system, and of the improvements of which it is susceptible. The report of the board upon this subject is also submitted for your consideration.

In the estimated appropriations for the ensuing year, upward of five millions of dollars will be submitted for the expenditures to be paid from the Department of War. Less than two-fifths of this will be applicable to the maintenance and support of the army. A million and a half, in the form of pensions, goes as a scarcely adequate tribute to the services and sacrifices of a former age, and a more than equal sum invested in fortifications, or for the preparations of internal improvement, provides for the quiet, the comfort, and the happier existence of the ages to come. The appropriations to indemnify those unfortunate remnants of another race, unable alike to share in the enjoyments and to exist in the presence of civilization, though swelling in recent years to a magnitude burdensome to the treasury, are generally not without their equivalents, in profitable value; or serve to discharge the Union from engagements more burdensome than debt.

In like manner the estimate of appropriations for the Navy Department will present an aggregate sum of upward of three millions of dollars. About one-half of these, however, cover the current expenditures of the navy in actual service, and one-half constitutes a fund of national property, the pledge of our future glory and defence. It was scarcely one short year after the close of the late war, and when the burden of its expenses and charges weighed heaviest upon the country, that Congress, by the act of 29th April, 1816, appropriated one million of dollars annually, for eight years, to the gradual increase of the navy. At a subsequent period, this annual appropriation was reduced to half a million for six years, of which the present year is the last. A yet more recent appropriation of the last two years, for building ten sloop-of-war, has nearly restored the original appropriation of 1816, of a million for every year. The result is before us all. We have twelve line-of-battle ships, twenty frigates, and sloop-of-war in proportion; which, with a few months of preparation, may present a line of floating fortifications along the whole range of our coast, ready to meet any invader who might attempt to set foot upon our shores. Combining with a system of fortifications upon the shores themselves, commenced about the same time under the auspices of my immediate predecessor, and hitherto systematically pursued, it has placed in our possession the most effective sinews of war, and has left us at once an example and a lesson from which our own duties may be inferred. The gradual increase of the navy was the principle of which the act of 29th April, 1816, was the first development. It was the introduction of a system to act upon the character and history of our country for an indefinite series of ages. It was a declaration of that Congress, to their constituents and to posterity, that it was the destiny and the duty of these confederated States to become, in regular process of time, and by no petty advances, a great naval power. That which they proposed to accomplish in eight years is rather to be considered as the measure of their means, than the limitation of their design. They looked forward for a term of years sufficient for the accomplishment of a definite portion of their purpose; and they left to their successors to fill up the canvas of which they had traced the large and prophetic outline. The ships-of-the-line and frigates, which they had in contemplation, will be shortly completed. The time which they had allotted for the accomplishment of the work has more than elapsed. It remains for your consideration how their successors may contribute their portion of toil and of treasure for the benefit of the succeeding age, in the gradual increase of our navy. There is, perhaps, no part of the exercise of the constitutional powers of the Federal Government which has given more general satisfaction to the people of the Union than this. The system has not been thus vigorously introduced and hitherto sustained, to be now departed from or abandoned. In continuing to provide for the gradual increase of the navy, it may not be necessary or expedient to add for the present any more to the number of our ships; but should you deem it advisable to continue the yearly appropriation of half a million to the same objects, it may be profitably expended in providing a supply of timber to be seasoned, and other materials for future use in the construction of docks, or in laying the foundation of schools for naval education, as to the wisdom of Congress either of those measures may appear to claim the preference.

Of the small portions of this navy engaged in actual service during the peace, squadrons have continued to be maintained on the Pacific Ocean, in the West India seas, and in the Mediterranean; to which has been added a small armament to cruise on the eastern coast of South America. In all they have afforded protection to our commerce, have contributed to make our country advantageously known to foreign nations, have honorably employed multitudes of our seamen in the service of their country, and have inured numbers of youths of the rising generation to lives of manly hardihood and of nautical experience and skill. The piracies with which the West India seas were for several years infested, have been totally suppressed. But in the Mediterranean they have increased in a manner afflictive to other nations, and but for the continual presence of our squadron, would probably have been distressing to our own. The war which has unfortunately broken out between the republic of Buenos Ayres and the Brazilian Government, has given rise to very great irregularities among the naval officers of the latter, by whom principles in relation to blockades, and to neutral navigation, have been brought forward, to which we cannot subscribe, and which our own commanders have found it necessary to resist. From the friendly disposition toward the United States constantly manifested by the Emperor of Brazil, and the very useful and friendly commercial intercourse between the United States and his dominions, we have reason to believe that the just reparation demanded for the injuries sustained by several of our citizens from some of his officers, will not be withheld.

Preliminary Business.

[SENATE.]

Abstracts from the recent despatches of the commanders of our several squadrons are communicated with the report of the Secretary of the Navy to Congress.

A report from the Postmaster General is likewise communicated, presenting, in a highly satisfactory manner, the result of a vigorous, efficient, and economical administration of that Department. The revenue of the office, even of the year including the latter half of 1824, and of the first half of 1825, had exceeded its expenditures by a sum of more than forty-five thousand dollars. That of the succeeding year has been still more productive. The increase of the receipts, in the year preceding the first of July last, over that of the year before, exceeds one hundred and thirty-six thousand dollars, and the excess of the receipts over the expenditures of the year has swollen from forty-five thousand to nearly eighty thousand dollars. During the same period, contracts for additional transportation of the mail in stages, for about two hundred and sixty thousand miles, have been made, and for seventy thousand miles annually, on horseback. Seven hundred and fourteen new post-offices have been established within the year; and the increase of revenue within the last three years, as well as the augmentation of the transportation by mail, is more than equal to the whole amount of receipts and of mail conveyance at the commencement of the present century, when the seat of the General Government was removed to this place. When we reflect that the objects effected by the transportation of the mail are among the choicest comforts and enjoyments of social life, it is pleasing to observe that the dissemination of them to every corner of our country has outstripped in their increase even the rapid march of our population.

By the treaties with France and Spain, respectively ceding Louisiana and the Floridas to the United States, provision was made for the security of land titles derived from the Governments of those nations. Some progress has been made, under the authority of various acts of Congress, in the ascertainment and establishment of those titles; and claims to a very large extent remain unadjusted. The public faith, no less than the just rights of individuals, and the interest of the community itself, appears to require further provision for the speedy settlement of these claims, which I therefore recommend to the care and attention of the legislature.

In conformity with the provisions of the 20th of May last, to provide for erecting a penitentiary in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, three commissioners were appointed to select a site for the erection of a penitentiary for the district, and also a site in the county of Alexandria for a county jail; both of which objects have been effected. The building of the penitentiary has been commenced, and is in such a degree of forwardness as to promise that it will be completed before the meeting of the next Congress. This consideration points to the expediency of maturing, at the present session, a system for the regulation and government of the penitentiary, and of defining the class of offences which shall be punishable by confinement in this edifice.

In closing this communication, I trust that it will not be deemed inappropriate to the occasion and purposes upon which we are here assembled, to indulge a momentary retrospect, combining, in a single glance, the period of our origin as a national confederation with that of our present existence, at the precise interval of half a century from each other. Since your last meeting at this place, the fiftieth anniversary of the day when our independence was declared, has been celebrated throughout our land; and on that day, when every heart was bounding with joy, and every voice was tuned to gratulation, amid the blessings of freedom and independence, which the sires of a former age have handed down to their children, two of the principal actors in that solemn scene, the hand that penned the ever-memorable declaration, and the voice that sustained it in debate, were, by one summons, at the distance of seven hundred miles from each other, called before the Judge of all, to account for their deeds done upon earth. They departed, cheered by the benedictions of their country, to whom they left the inheritance of their fame, and the memory of their bright example. If we turn our thoughts to the condition of their country, in the contrast of the first and last day of that half century, how resplendent and sublime is the transition from gloom to glory! Then, glancing through the same lapse of time, in the condition of the individuals, we see the first day marked with the fullness and vigor of youth, in the pledge of their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor, to the cause of freedom and mankind. And on the last, extended on the bed of death, with but sense and sensibility left to breathe a last aspiration to Heaven of blessing upon their country; may we not humbly hope, that to them too, it was a pledge of transition from gloom to glory; and that while their mortal vestments were sinking into the clod of the valley, their emancipated spirits were ascending to the bosom of their God!

The Message was read; and, on motion of Mr. HOLMES, Ordered, That three thousand copies of the said Message, and fifteen hundred copies of the documents accompanying it, be printed for the use of the Senate.

FRIDAY, December 8.

Preliminary Business.

The following motion, by Mr. CHAMBERS, was taken up:

Resolved, That, in the appointment of the Standing Committees, the Senate will proceed by severally appointing the Chairman of each committee, and then by one ballot for the other members necessary to complete the same; and a majority of the whole number of votes given shall be necessary to the choice of chairman."

A short discussion took place on the expediency of the mode proposed by the resolution, in which the mover and Messrs. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, BENTON, MACON, VAN BUREN, and HOLMES, took part.

The question being then taken on the resolution of Mr. CHAMBERS, it was decided in the affirmative by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bateman, Bell, Boulogny, Chambers, Chase, Clayton, Edwards, Harrison, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnston of Lou., Knight, Marks, Noble, Reed, Robbins, Rodney, Ruggles, Sandford, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith of Md., Thomas, Van Buren, Willey—25.

Imprisonment for Debt.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, rose, and said, that he had given notice a few days since that he would ask leave to introduce a bill, for the abolition of Imprisonment for Debt. He hoped, in now fulfilling his engagement, it would not be considered an intrusion, if he delayed the Senate with a few brief introductory remarks. If he had entertained a single doubt as to the claim of the subject to attention, either as regarded principle or expediency, he should not have been so confident, or so persevering, in pressing this measure upon the Senate. The subject had already been agitated, and met the approbation of a majority of the body. But, on a former occasion, time was not afforded for a final decision. Imprisonment for debt had no advocates among the generous and enlightened portions of our citizens; it had no advocates among the generous or benevolent classes of mankind, in any country. Nor had it been considered, by such men, other than a barbarous custom, since the days of Greece and Rome, when a debtor and his whole family were sold into slavery, for the satisfaction of a debt which it was out of his power to discharge. To Mr. J., imprisonment for debt seemed as horrible as the Spanish Inquisition; they were both unjustifiable before God and man; nor was the Inquisition more disgraceful to the Spanish Government, than was the barbarous custom of imprisoning harmless debtors in this free and enlightened country. He believed imprisonment for debt had caused as many sighs and tears from the wretched sufferers under its inflictions, as the Inquisition—that mighty instrument of the baseness and power of tyranny; and nothing but deep-rooted prejudice in the minds of the people had perpetuated it in enlightened and liberal Governments.

It had been his unhappy lot to see a free man, who had fought for his country—a man who was not meant by nature for a slave, but who was born to the possession of the liberty which he loved—walking, dejected, through the public street, a prisoner, attended by a petty officer, because he had forfeited his bond, and was unable to meet an obligation made with honest intentions. By some, it might be supposed that it was not in the power of Congress to change this system; but it would not be sufficient for him to go home to his constituents, who had ennobled themselves by entirely abolishing imprisonment for debt, and say that there were insuperable difficulties to obstruct the passage of his bill; that, great as the evil confessedly was, there was no remedy within the reach of Congress. This would not be satisfactory: for he had never read in any newspaper, and had never heard from any politician, or even from a stump orator, one sentence, so far denying the inherent freedom of man, as in any manner to advocate imprisonment for debt.

In the picture of London, Mr. J. said, which had lately accidentally fallen into his hands, he had read a description of a monument erected in honor of the benevolent Howard. Why was a monument built to his memory? What had he done to merit such distinction? He visited and cheered the prisons of the unfortunate; he alleviated the distresses of individuals torn from their friends by the merciless provisions of the law. And such a monument would never have perpetuated his memory, had not imprisonment for debt been acknowledged as a violation of the principles of humanity. Should it not, then, if such conduct was applauded in the subject of a monarchy, be improved and imitated by a free and generous people?

Mr. J. said he did not intend to go at length into the subject at present; and he relied on his venerable friend from North Carolina, (Mr. MACON,) and other of his fellow Senators, whose opinions corresponded with his own, to support and assist him in hereafter discussing the merits of this bill. He should close with a few more remarks. He looked upon imprisonment for debt to be equally a violation of the Declaration of Independence and of the Constitution, as would be the erection of an established religion. It equally violated the principles for which our fathers shed their best blood. It violated the rights of man, as defined by the charter of our liberties, by chaining him in solitude, and debarring him from the use of his locomotive powers; and he asserted that this system of imprisonment had its origin in judicial usurpation. He would go no farther back than to its origin in England, to prove this position. In a remote period of the history of that nation, it would be found that the courts assumed the power of imprisoning the body on mesne process, and although this right was continually restrained by Parliament, it at length became authorized by long practice, and by the Government.

This barbarous custom, which had been copied by us from England, had its origin in usurped power. Should this country, then, go on to sanction it? Would it not rather be but acting according to the dictates of justice and humanity, to abolish it entirely? In the course of the proceedings, it would be assumed and established, that philanthropic and liberal minds had, in every age, denounced it, and that, wherever it existed, it was supported by an aristocracy, at war with rational liberty, and by the cruelty of hard-hearted creditors. History would show that it had fomented discontents, which ended in revolt and bloodshed; and it would be shown to be in utter violation of the Holy Scriptures. On the other hand, it would be established, that, where imprisonment for debt had been abolished, a salutary restraint upon undue credits had ensued. A more equitable and more confidential state of things existed in the relations of debtor and creditor, and honor and justice had taken the place of vengeance panting for the pound of flesh, to be cut off nearest the heart. It could be shown, that, wherever this system had been abolished, the change had been attended by the most beneficial effects, instead of those evil consequences, which many of the enemies of this bill anticipate.

Believing these facts, Mr. J. called on the wisdom and the patriotism of the Senate, to aid him in abolishing a feature of the laws which could be shown to be a disgrace to the country, and a relic of despotism, which it became their duty to obliterate. On a former occasion, he had hoped that this subject would meet with more courtesy than was then extended to it by his brother Senators. He had had an up-hill task ever since he first proposed the subject, and had obtained its introduction with great difficulty. He asked whether it was not a parliamentary practice, when a member proposed a new subject, to treat it at least with patience and forbearance? And did not his seat entitle his proposition to be treated with proper attention? As to the committee to which the matter should be referred, he was not solicitous to be one of its members; he did not care if he never served upon a committee again, so far as the honor of the appointment went. His only wish in this case was, that the bill might be put into the hands of a committee—whether special or not, he was not particular; but at all events, that the matter should be deliberated upon.

Mr. J. concluded, by remarking that the remainder of his term of service as a Senator, embraced three years, and in that time he wished this bill to be fully acted upon. Whatever might be the decision upon its merits, he should, as was his duty, submit. But, while that decision was suspended, thinking, as he did, he felt it to be his duty to press the subject to an issue. He repeated that, on a former occasion, it met with obstructions which he had not allowed himself to expect; and it had caused him the deepest regret that, on a subject on which his conceptions were so clear, and which seemed to him so unquestionable, he should have to encounter hostile opinions. But he hoped, on the present occasion, to be more fortunate; and that the Senate would grant him a committee as favorable as possible; and then, that the bill might be rejected—or pass, to the immortal honor of this assembly.

Mr. JOHNSON then, having obtained leave, introduced the bill, which was twice read by general consent, and referred to a select committee.

FRIDAY, December 29.

Investigation of the Official Conduct of the Vice President, when Secretary at War.

The following letter from the VICE PRESIDENT, was read by the Secretary:

"To the Secretary of the Senate:

"SIR: Having addressed, this morning, to the House of Representatives, a communication which may claim an investigation of my official conduct while in the discharge of the duties of the Department of War, you will please make known to the Senate, that a sense of propriety forbids me from resuming my station till the House has disposed of this subject.

"Very respectfully, I am yours, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

WASHINGTON, 29th December, 1826."

Mr. BENTON made a motion that, in order to give time for the investigation alluded to in the letter, when the Senate do adjourn, it adjourn till Tuesday; which was agreed to.

TUESDAY, January 2, 1827.

Election of President of the Senate, pro tem.

At half past twelve o'clock, the Vice President not appearing to take the chair of the Senate,

Mr. HOLMES rose, and, addressing the Secretary, moved that the Senate proceed to the election of a President, pro tempore.

The question being put to the Senate by the Secretary, the motion was agreed to, nem. con., and, on counting the ballots, it appeared that the whole number given in was forty-six—necessary to a choice, twenty-four.

Mr. MACON having received a majority of the whole number of votes given, was declared duly elected President of the Senate, pro tempore, and, being conducted to the chair, made his acknowledgments to the Senate for the honor conferred upon him, and took his seat.

THURSDAY, January 4.

The Yazoo Purchase.

On motion of Mr. ROBBINS, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill for the relief of Ebenezer Oliver, and others, Directors of the New England Mississippi Land Company, (a long standing claim, growing out of the Yazoo purchase, the nature of which has heretofore been often stated. The bill directs the payment to the Company of $95,408.)

In support of this bill, Mr. ROBBINS addressed the Senate as follows:

I will state the grounds which have induced the committee (that is, a majority of them) to report in favor of this petition; the Senate will judge of the efficiency of those grounds.

The United States made an agreement with the petitioners, (I speak according to the legal effect of their respective and mutual acts,) that, if the petitioners would release their title to the lands in question to the United States, that the United States would pay the petitioners therefor a certain amount of money; provided that title was found to be a good and legal title. The release was accordingly executed in due form of law.

The United States instituted a Board, to examine this title; and the Board decided in favor of the title as to about nine-tenths of the land, and against the title as to the other tenth. The decision as to this tenth is plainly erroneous; the Supreme Court have so decided; the Board itself has become so sensible of it, that they have certified to the same effect; that is, two out of three, and they are the only survivors of the Board. Indeed, the rule by which the Board decided, is so obviously inapplicable to the case, that every mind must see the impropriety of the application. They decided upon the title, not by the laws of Georgia, where the title was created; not by the laws of Massachusetts, where the title was transferred; but by the laws of Maryland, and which, as to the principle by which they decided, is peculiar to the laws of Maryland, and unknown both to the laws of Georgia and of Massachusetts. The laws of Maryland, surely, could not affect a title created by the laws of Georgia, and in contradiction to the laws of Georgia.

The Supreme Court have decided that the title of the petitioners was a good and legal title. Then the release of the petitioners did operate to vest in the United States a good and legal title to these lands; to this tenth, as well as to the other nine-tenths. The only good and legal title which the United States have to these lands, is derived from that release; and the grantees of the United States, if ever called upon to defend themselves in their grants, must defend on the title of the United States, derived from that release. This being so, it appeared to the committee (I mean to a majority of them) to be impossible, to say that the petitioners were not justly entitled to this money. The United States were to pay for a good and legal title from them; they have got a good and legal title from them.

As to this tenth, the Board decided that it belonged partly to the United States, and partly to certain individuals; about three-fourths to the United States, and the other fourth to these individuals. As it respects those individuals, the committee were of opinion that the decision must stand, and they report accordingly. They think it must stand, as the authority of the Board, as to those individuals, is made final, and as the money has actually been paid to them. The decision is not only made final, as to them, but it has been executed as to them. By this loss, therefore, the petitioners must abide; the amount paid to those individuals is about thirty thousand dollars. With this deduction from the claim of the petitioners, we think their claim ought to be allowed; the residue is about ninety-five thousand dollars. That money is, I understand, now in the Treasury, originally appropriated to this purpose, and not since appropriated to any other. Their claim, therefore, can be satisfied without any new appropriation; and to withhold it would be, as it appears to us, inconsistent with the good faith of the Government.

I do not know that it is incumbent on me to anticipate the objections, in order to answer them, which may be raised against this report; I think it proper first to hear them. And for this purpose I will now give way.

Mr. KANE said, that the large amount proposed to be appropriated for individual use, upon grounds connected with the Yazoo land speculation, had induced him to examine the subject with some care; and whilst he claimed to participate in the just and general regard paid to the judgment of the Judiciary Committee, this inquiry had produced in his mind a strong impression against passing the bill. The question was not new to the Senate. The same committee, (although not composed of the same members entirely,) in 1823, reported, in decided language, against the claim. Upon a state of facts, which no subsequent occurrence had varied, the Judiciary Committees, of the last and present sessions, had advised the payment of the money. He considered their reports to be defective and unsatisfactory, inasmuch as, in his opinion, they took a view by far too limited, of the facts which made up the history of that extensive speculation. The cession act of Georgia, the laws of Congress subsequently enacted, and the proceedings under them, were stated with proper accuracy, and constituted, in the opinion of the committee, the sufficient foundations of the claim. A more general survey of the facts had produced in his mind this result: that all the claims or title of the purchasers, under the act of Georgia, to Yazoo lands, must be looked upon as property obtained in consequence of a fraudulent advantage over the laws of the land. He spoke of it as a fraud, because, indeed, it was such, and of the most pernicious kind, corrupting in its progress the very fountains of legislation. The title was of an anomalous nature, which existed only because of the want of power in the courts of the country to pronounce upon the motives of the Georgia Legislature. On a second view of the subject, it appeared to him that this fraudulent advantage had been lost in the acts of mutual reference and final decision, and lost, too, much more fairly than it was obtained. And now, after a lapse of thirty years, the Yazoo speculators were placed before Congress upon the same footing with other claimants, to succeed upon grounds of justice alone. But as to the intrinsic justice of this claim, the report was as silent as the grave; and in that it was deficient. To establish this position he would go over the leading facts in relation to it.

In the year 1795, in the month of February, the Legislature of Georgia sold to four companies the whole of the territory of that State west of the Alabama River, comprising forty millions of acres, for the sum of five hundred thousand dollars. The Georgia Mississippi Company purchased so much of this tract as lay between the Tombigbee and Mississippi Rivers, for one hundred and fifty thousand dollars. He had never heard a doubt expressed that this transaction was effected by the corruption of both parties to the sale. One fact was sufficient to characterize the sale as a fraud; it was, that every member of either House, who voted for the bill, but one, was interested in the project. One month before the sitting of the Legislature, of the succeeding year, this company sent an agent to Boston, who sold to a company formed in New England, all right and title to these lands, giving to those purchasers a peculiar deed, which he would hereafter notice—the whole purchase money to be paid in three years, the first instalment in the May following. It was essential to remark, that this sale was effected just one month previous to the meeting of the Georgia Legislature, and that the first instalment was not due until the next May. The Legislature of 1796 was convened. It was formed of different men from those of the preceding session, of men elected by a people who had been grossly defrauded by their agents. They took this matter into severe consideration, and, after stating the frauds and injuries which their constituents had suffered, by the act of their predecessors, they passed a bill to rescind that act; thereby abrogating, as far as was in their power, all transactions under its pretended authority. The rescinding bill contained a clause, which made it the duty of the Governor of Georgia to publish, throughout the United States, the passage of that law, the object of which was, to give to the whole world a knowledge of the facts. Notwithstanding the publication of this act, several months previous to the time at which the instalments became due, the New England purchasers paid, in May, the first instalment of two cents per acre, and received from the Georgia Company the debts which had been drawn in January, and lain in escrow until that time. He had given this statement, to show the nature of the speculations, as well with regard to one company as the other. And, he maintained that the New England Company had no better right to indemnification than the Georgia Company; for they were purchasers with a full knowledge of the fraudulent manner in which the act, authorizing the sale, had been passed.

[Mr. K. then narrated the measures taken by the Government of the United States, subsequent to the act of the Legislature of Georgia, which ceded the Yazoo lands to the United States, until the act of April, 1814, when the sum of 1,500,000 dollars was appropriated out of the proceeds of the sales of land, as indemnification to the claimants of those lands.]

A Board of Commissioners, said Mr. K., was appointed to decide upon the claims; the decision was to be final, and the Commissioners were required to form their opinions upon principles of both law and equity and were, moreover, bound thereto by oath. The claims were submitted, and admitted, with the exception of a claim to indemnify for nine hundred thousand acres, which was resisted both by the Georgia Company and by the United States; by the former, on the ground that the New England Company had not paid the purchase money, and that the Georgia Company, consequently, held an equitable lien upon it; and, by the latter, on the ground, that the land had been ceded to the United States by Georgia, and that the members of the Georgia Company had either relinquished their claims to the State of Georgia, or the United States. The New England Company replied, that their grantors had been fully paid, by the execution and delivery of the negotiable notes of its several members; but admitted that these notes had not been paid to the extent alleged.

Thus, three sets of claims were set up for this amount of the appropriation: one founded upon a deed, another upon a failure of consideration, and that of the United States, founded upon the facts he had stated. He would submit the question to every member of the Senate, (requiring him to discard the technical notions of the law-schools,) upon the broad grounds of natural justice, Who had the better right? Upon these grounds, could an allegation, distinguishing the rights and liabilities of the company from those of the individuals composing it, avail any thing? These notes remained in the hands of the Georgia Company, and had not been negotiated, and remained unpaid. Was it not right that the parties, in reference to each other, should be placed in the same condition as though no bargain had taken place, for the property not actually paid for?

The Commissioners gave their decision in favor of the United States. Instead of placing the decision upon the broad grounds he had adverted to, they gave a reason for it, the more extraordinary, as it was unnecessary. The doctrine of an equitable lien, as asserted by the Georgia Company, was sustained; the consequence of which has been, that, in all discussions concerning this decision, the reason given for it has been assailed, and held up as unsound and fallacious. This was not the only instance of a good decision for a bad reason. But, said Mr. K., it is no inquiry with me, whether this decision be right or wrong; nor is it one, in my view, at all material to the success of these petitioners. The judgment of these commissioners, upon all legal rights, was final. They were appointed for the ultimate settlement of these claims, and must, like all courts of special and limited jurisdiction, thus constituted, be allowed to have acted under a proper sense of their responsibilities and oaths. According to their judgments, they did settle them, and that advantage, which had been obtained in the odious manner he had described, was surrendered by the agreement of all parties, and, having once been forfeited by the act of a tribunal, having ample, competent, and final jurisdiction, there was an end to all right of complaint. As to the conclusive power of these Commissioners, there could be no doubt; and it would have been a strange course, to have vested them with less than final jurisdiction. The law so expressed it. The act of 1814 had no other purpose in view, and the people of the United States supposed that, under that law, this delicate matter had been arranged and settled forever. One million five hundred thousand dollars had been appropriated, to quiet pretensions, confessed on all hands to have been of fraudulent origin; a tribunal was created, before which these claimants might have appeared or not, at their election. They did appear, asserted their demands, and did every other act to manifest their willingness to abide its determination. They received the money awarded them, and thus sealed their lips against all complaints of the want of power in the judges. Had the decision been against the United States for every dollar of the money appropriated, the Government was without a remedy. And shall we, asked Mr. K., set aside a decision favorable to the Government, upon any ground? Yes, on one ground, and on that only—when a claim, intrinsically just, shall appear to be unsatisfied. It was well established, that this character did not belong to the subject of the present debate. He never would do an act which might be construed into an admission of the purity of the active members of the old Georgia Company—nor do such essential injury to the people of the United States, as to take money from their pockets, to reward such iniquity. And, above all, he protested against the revival of an advantage surreptitiously obtained over the laws and property of his country. That advantage was now extinguished, and, as to the interesting qualities, “justice and equity,” this claim was in a condition of the most absolute destitution.

He had said he could produce evidence to show, that the claims of the New England Company could be placed on no better footing than those of their grantors, because they must have been equally aware of the fraud of the act under which the whole speculation was conducted. Why were they as well acquainted with the nature of the transaction? Because General Washington, by a public Message, delivered to Congress one month after the passage of the obnoxious law, and eleven months previous to the sale to the New England Company, put the whole people of the United States upon their guard against speculating under that act. The rescinding law was passed and published several months before the first instalment of the purchase money was paid. And, he would not state to the Senate the well-established law in reference to such payments.

Had these people been ignorant men, who could not read, or would not, as a matter of course, industriously search for every thing published about a speculation on which they were intent, a different conclusion might be drawn. But men who deal in millions, are fairly chargeable with this notice, before an assembly not restrained by any other than considerations suggested by the duty of obedience to the constitution, and by an intercourse with, and a knowledge of, men and things, as they really are. Could it be believed, that the complaints of the people of Georgia had not reached Boston before this purchase? Should we adopt, in favor of the claimants, so improbable a conclusion? Should we suppose, that the notice, enjoined to be given as a matter of duty, by the Governor of Georgia, was not given?

There was one other fact he would name, which constituted in all law, human or divine, competent and credible testimony, to wit: the voluntary confessions of the party himself. When the New England Company closed their bargain, they received a deed, containing a covenant, which Mr. K. would read, from the elaborate report made by Messrs. Madison, Gallatin, and Lincoln.

[He then read an extract from the deed, by which it was specially covenanted, that there was to be no return of the purchase money, in the event of a failure in the title.]

Could it be said, then, resumed Mr. K., that the New England Company was deceived, that their eyes were not open to the contingency implied by this clause, which secured the Georgia Company from all liability, however the act of the Legislature might be construed? The deed, in substance, spoke these words, and it is impossible they could have been misinterpreted or misunderstood: “We are selling you a title acquired under a law which may turn out to be null, on account of our villany, or our villany may so far transcend any thing foreseen by the framers of the constitution, as to be beyond all control; in either event, we keep the money, and you the land, if you can.”

In conclusion, Mr. K. observed, that he felt every disposition to appropriate the funds of the nation to the payment of all fair claims upon its justice or its bounty, and, whenever he could be satisfied by arguments, not founded upon trite and technical notions of metaphysical law, but those drawn from the dictates of a plain understanding, that this claim ought to be allowed, he would give it his support. He wished to be understood, and would recall to view the positions he had taken.

First. No title was originally acquired under the Georgia act of '95, but an advantage, which was the offspring of bribery, which could not be disregarded in a court of law, because, for wise reasons, the judicial power of the country did not extend to the examination of the motives of the Legislative branch of the Government of Georgia.

Second. This advantage had been voluntarily surrendered, and entirely extinguished, without any fault of the United States.

Third. As no peculiar incident to the claim now existed, it must be settled like all other claims, upon its inherent merits.

Fourth. That, neither in the hands of the original purchasers, nor of the New England Company, could any such merit be perceived.

Mr. MILLIS remarked, that he did not rise to continue the discussion, or to answer the elaborate arguments of the gentleman who had last spoken. He must say, however, that he thought those arguments more applicable to the bill of 1814, at the time of its passage, than to cases which have since arisen directly under that act. But, as no gentleman seemed now prepared to answer the objections offered to the bill, he would move to make it the special order of the day for Monday next.

FRIDAY, January 5.

Road in the Territory of Arkansas.

The bill to authorize the President of the United States to cause a road to be constructed from Fort Smith in Arkansas, to Nachitoches, in Louisiana, was read a second time.

On motion of Mr. HENDRICKS, the report of the committee on this subject was read.

Mr. CHANDLER made a few remarks on the amount of the sum appropriated, ($21,000,) which, he observed, was greater than the estimate of the expenses, by six thousand dollars.

Mr. HENDRICKS, in answer, read from the volume of last year's printed documents a statement relative to the necessity for the construction of this road.

Mr. BENTON said that he considered this bill to be based on just and equitable principles. The lands through which, and to which, this road was to run, were almost exclusively the property of the United States; and, until a road should be cut to lead to them, they would not be settled. He thought that, where large tracts of land were owned by the United States, it became a duty, on their part, to open facilities of communication, by the construction of roads, as it was the duty of any other landholder. The doctrine had long been sanctioned by Congress, and the provisions of this bill seemed to rest on plain principles, peculiar to itself, which pointed out the justice of the appropriation.

On the question of ordering the bill to be engrossed, a division was called, when the Senate refused to concur—15 to 18.*

The bill to provide for the location of the two townships of land reserved for a seminary of learning in the Territory of Florida, and to complete the location of the grant to the Deaf and Dumb Asylum of Kentucky, was then taken up.

* The bill was rejected because one end of the proposed road was to touch, and barely touch, the soil of a State.

Mr. EATON said that, last year, a similar bill was passed; but, by some error, the location of one of the townships had not been made, and the other had been considerably diminished by rights of pre-emption. The object of this bill was to settle the location of one of the townships, and to empower the agent of the institution to select from other lands as much as had been abstracted by the rights of pre-emption.

Mr. KING wished to inquire why the location of the one township was to be made at a distance from the other, and why this bill was brought forward to ask a more advantageous allotment of land for the Deaf and Dumb Institution of Kentucky? For his own part, he was not prepared to grant the land to that institution. He had understood, at the time this bill was passed, that it was for the benefit of an unfortunate class of society; but he had no expectation that the claim for that class of persons would be brought into contact with the rights of other individuals. But the land, said Mr. K., had all been selected in the vicinity of the honest and industrious settlers of Florida, and much of it belonged to those settlers. He did not wish to injure those settlers; and he thought the unfair manner in which the selection had been made, rendered the institution undeserving of the boon that had been granted. He therefore moved to strike out that clause relating to the Deaf and Dumb Institution of Kentucky, in order that information might be obtained as to the manner in which that selection of lands had been made.

Mr. EATON said he would inform the gentleman as to the design of this bill, although he was not, perhaps, so well qualified to do it satisfactorily as some other gentlemen. If the Senate intended to make it an Indian gift, it would perhaps be the best method to adopt the motion just proposed. But, if that body meant to act in good faith, that certainly was not the course to be pursued. Should the Senate, after having granted the land for this specific object of benevolence, because by error the location had been made upon the property of other individuals, and thereby the subject was once more subjected to legislation, withdraw their bounty, and say, because an error had thrown the institution into their power, take back the appropriation? He trusted not. If there was any fault, it seemed to him that it must have been that of the agent. He made the selections, and, if they were made wrong, certainly the blame rested upon him. But, for his own part, he did not consider that there was impropriety in the selection. The question of right, he thought, even as it stood, was in favor of the deaf and dumb of Kentucky. Their claim he considered better than those of the settlers of Florida, because the law was passed granting this township before that granting the lands of the settlers. He had come to the conclusion, that the law which was first placed upon the statute book gave a better claim than a subsequent law. The right seemed clearly on the side of the College of Kentucky; but the institution did not contend for that right, and their moderation in declining to urge what they were justly entitled to, deserved a better fate than to have the grant once given them withdrawn altogether. Supposing that the claim of the institution to the land was not as good as the claim of the settlers, still such a measure would be rigid and unjust. The act passed formerly enacted, that two townships should be reserved, and one had been reserved on the Pascagoula; but it had been considered expedient to change the location of the township, and another had been selected. This was done because the territory was supposed to be divided by two interests, and it was an extensive tract of country; and, as the grants were for two institutions, it seemed desirable that they should be separate, and in no way interfere with each other.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

WEDNESDAY, January 10.

Sale of Reserved Lead Mines.

The bill to authorize the President to expose for sale the reserved lead mines, in the State of Missouri, was then taken up, and the report of the committee thereon was read. [The committee on the public lands had recommended the indefinite postponement of the bill.]

Mr. BENTON said it was now four years since he had brought forward a system of measures with respect to the sale and disposition of the public lands, of which the bill under consideration formed a part. The greatest difficulty he had met with in the prosecution of this system was to find the proper time for doing it. He was always met by an objection as to the time; and now, as heretofore, there was a proposition of indefinite postponement, because the present was not a suitable time. He expatiated upon this species of objection, as more fatal, because often insidious, than direct objections in front. He considered it the bane of legislation, and instanced the numerous failures which had occurred in the British Parliament on the subject of reform, because a suitable time could never be found.

The bill had once received the favorable decision of the Senate upon it. The older members—and those who had been here a few years might be counted in that class—would recollect, that the policy of selling out these mines and throwing them into the mass of private property, had been amply discussed in this body, about four years ago, and sanctioned by a vote almost unanimous. For himself, he considered the whole business of leasing and renting these mines, as now carried on, to be unwarranted by the letter or by the construction of any law. The superintendent, his clerks, his office, and salaries, were all unknown to the laws of the land. They were created by establishing a construction upon a construction, an implied power upon an implied power, a pretension upon a pretension. He called upon Senators to look into the origin of the superintendency over lead mines in Missouri, and they would find it to be without law, and above law.

He adverted to the power delegated to the agent to make reservations, and the extent of those made. The law authorized the reservation of mines, and everybody knew that a mine was a point, a pit in the earth, from which was dug ores and minerals. Yet, this agent, instead of reserving mines, was covering the face of the country with reservations. He took a township at a time, with houses, farms, orchards, and arable land. In this way he had already reserved about 660,000 acres, equal to one thousand square miles, and was still going on. Patents were denied to farmers, whose lands, purchased at public sale from the United States, were thus reserved; and the owner had the option to take back his purchase and lose his improvements, or go into the courts of the United States for a tract of land which would not pay a lawyer's fee. Such a policy was not only injurious to individuals, but to the whole mineral region of country.

He adverted to the provisions of the bill. They directed the mines to be advertised in every State of the Union for six months before they were sold. This would bring bidders from all distances, would attract capitalists from all quarters, and ensure a sufficient competition at the sales. It would bring much money into the treasury for property which was now useless; but he considered the amount to be derived from the sales, as a trifle compared to the benefit which would accrue to the Government from the increased wealth and population of the country.

The amount of duties paid upon articles of foreign production, now consumed by the miners, was worth more to the Government than their paltry rents, and if thrown open to individual enterprise, if covered with large capitalists, and worked on a scale proportionate to their extent and value, this amount of duties would be proportionably increased. He considered the wealth of the Government to consist in the wealth of its citizens, and that it was the duty of the Government to promote the wealth of its citizens. He looked upon the present mode of managing these mines, as a species of tyranny and folly, in which the rights of individuals were invaded, and a sovereign State injured, without profit to the Federal Government.

He said it was right, occasionally, to recur to first principles. It would be well to do so on the present occasion, and see if this Federal Government was created for the petty business of leasing lead mines and salt springs. Certainly it was created for no such insignificant purposes, but for the great purposes of peace and war, and foreign relations, and a few other objects of universal concern to the whole Union.

Sale of Reserved Lead Mines.

Those who framed the constitution would have scouted the idea of making the Federal Government a lead-mine digger, and a salt-water boiler; and even now a proposition to amend the constitution to give such a power, would be rejected with contempt. Yet we exercise the power, and have exercised it for many years, without law or constitution, but by instructions from the Executive Government. The lead which is collected is sold by agents, although by the constitution it is the property of the United States, and can only be sold by an act of Congress. He concluded by saying that the bill was well guarded. It did not compel the sale of the mines, but only permitted it. It merely removed the inhibition, and left it to the discretion of the President to order the sales as he should think proper. He believed that no person could wish to see this species of property held and wielded by the Federal Government. He rested upon the former undivided opinion of the Senate in favor of delivering up these mines to the activity of individual enterprise, and hoped that the bill would receive their favorable consideration.

Mr. BENTON said, that he should offer only a few remarks. He considered this bill as good, and as well drawn as could be wished; but he did not agree in the opinion that it was expedient, to authorize the sales of the lead mines at the present moment. This bill made it the duty of the Executive to cause the value of the mines and their advantages to be set forth in advertisements. But he believed the surveys and examinations, to enable the Government to do this, were now making. The general law had specified the reserving and surveying of lead mines; but had not pointed out where these mines were. The system which had been adopted seemed to be as good as any: the Executive was following up a course of measures which would obtain the knowledge necessary to fulfil the provisions of this bill. The information required could not be given unless acquired by the means now in operation by the Executive. Whenever that should have been effected, the bill could go into effect beneficially, and he thought the opening of these mines to the whole community would be highly advantageous.

Mr. BENTON remarked, that, twenty years ago, the United States appointed an agent to report on the subject of lead mines. He had done so. Besides, it was within his knowledge, that a Mr. Austin, engaged in mining, had, at the request of the United States, made a report on the subject. These reports, and numerous others, came before Mr. Jefferson, than whom no man was more attentive to every source of national wealth. There were many other reports in the hands of the Government, made by persons appointed as their agents, with a salary of fifteen hundred dollars, whose duty was to explore and superintend these mines. So that volumes of reports must already have been made upon the subject of these lead mines. In fact, a volume of reports was published about three years since. That this mass of intelligence was authentic, was supported upon the authority of the old adage: "nobody sees further into the millstone than he who picks it"—and no one could be supposed to be more correct than persons on the spot, whose business it was to survey the country and make reports of their discoveries. Reports had been made for sixty years—nay, he might say for one hundred and twenty years: and he maintained, that at this moment, there was as much information within the reach of the Executive as was at all necessary. The abstract which would be published of the mines, would give enough information to the general and uninterested reader, and give leading hints to the person designing to purchase. But he should have a poor opinion of any man who would invest money in property of this kind on the faith of any description, without going to the country, and examining for himself. But the bill does not enjoin upon the President to put up the property for sale at any given time; and those who had confidence in the President in matters of far greater importance, would surely have no fear that he would injure the interest of the community by hurrying the sales. The advertisement would go to all parts of the country, and a person who was disposed to invest his money, would go to the place designated, and trust to his own ears and eyes before he purchased, and with a judgment formed on the ground, he would make his bargain. There was nothing in this bill to prevent further reports from coming in. It was carefully guarded, and placed in the President's hands the entire discretion as to the time of the sale.

Mr. HOLMES did not rise to throw light upon the subject, for he confessed he was completely in the dark with respect to it. He had always been opposed to reserving mines; for he thought they ought to be open to individual enterprise. But, he thought, if he now understood the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] that they were about to authorize the President to sell, before he knew what he was selling. It was true, the purchaser would know all about it. But that would be no recommendation, as it would place the parties on an inequality: the purchaser would know the value of what he was buying, but the Executive would not know what it was selling. He, therefore, thought Congress ought to let the President know what he had to sell, before they bestowed the authority upon him.

Mr. BENTON said, that, as to information, there had already been at least five hundred pages printed upon the subject.

Mr. HOLMES replied, that he should not be inclined the sooner to rely on this information from its quantity. He should wish to have a person sent to make a general and accurate survey, and give definite information before any sale was made. We knew that a great deal had been printed—for we were fond of displaying ourselves on paper: but he wished to see a plan with the proper drawings, maps, &c., before the matter was acted upon.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, did not agree with the gentleman last on the floor. It did not seem to him absolutely necessary that all the particulars of the property should be pointed out, before it was exposed to sale to the highest bidder. We only wanted to know that there were lead and salt mines: to know that they have been rented by the United States, and what they would produce. Indeed, all was known that was at all necessary. He had heard sufficient on both sides to convince him that the President might go and sell, and reports still continue to be made. It was his opinion that this nation had become too much like a counting-house; disposed to deal in many matters of detail which would be better left to be transacted by individuals: and whenever he found an opportunity to lop off any of the branches of the business of this counting-house he was disposed to do it. He did not mean to insinuate that these matters were not well managed, and on sound principles—it was conducted by agents, and if they were sometimes actuated by improper motives, they were generally honest men. The principle with him, however, operated in this case. Here was a branch of the business of the Government which could be advantageously lopped off, and in a matter which would be with more propriety left to the transaction of individuals. One word, and he had done. It would be awarding to the several States a dignity and importance in the management of their local concerns, to resign into their hands, in instances like this, the disposition of their property; in order that the officers of the General Government might not go on continually increasing to the prejudice of the affairs of those States. The committee had reported in favor of the bill—all parties, he believed, were agreed: he should, therefore, vote against the indefinite postponement, and should vote for the passage of the bill.

Mr. CHANDLER said he had no doubt the President would use sound discretion in not bringing the whole of the valuable mines into market at once, and thus injure their value: but he thought it better to insert an amendment, so as to authorize him to bring them in from time to time. He, therefore, moved to lay the bill and amendment on the table; which was agreed to; and

The bill was laid on the table.

Roads in the Territory of Michigan.

The order of the day was then called, and the bill from the House to provide for laying out roads in the Territory of Michigan, was taken up. The report of the committee on the subject, in the other House, and several other documents, were read; among which was a letter from Major-General Brown.

Mr. HENDRICKS said, that he could only commend this bill to the Senate by observing, that the improvements contemplated by it were of the most vital importance to the portion of the country through which the roads were to pass; and that they came before the Senate with the sanction of the majority of the other House.

Mr. CHANDLER observed, that he should wish to strike out the appropriation for the least important of the objects contemplated, as our funds were not in the most prosperous condition. He perceived that two roads were to be run from Detroit, and he would move to strike off the appropriation of 25,000 dollars for that one which led to Chicago. He would not press this motion, if the Senate were convinced of the necessity of both of these roads. He only desired to retrench as much as possible.

Mr. HENDRICKS said, that, from many considerations this road was considered to be of great importance. He would not ask the Senate to hear all the documents on this subject, but would direct their attention to some passages in the letter of Governor Cass.

[He then read several sentences from that document, recommending this road as one of great utility, both in a mercantile and military point of view.]

He said it was important, as it was to go through the heart of the Potawatamies, one of the most powerful of the Indian tribes. He stated, that through the whole track there was not a white person, and the land was a perfectly barren desert. Governor Cass had stated that the construction of this road would have a great effect on the prices of public lands, as it went through a great portion of those lands. This effect was fairly calculated from the result which had followed the opening of the Black Swamp road. The Governor also stated that the Commissioners had been followed, while making their survey, by persons desiring to purchase land—from which he argued that the opening of the road would greatly accelerate the sales of lands, and augment their prices.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, supposed that the roads now contemplated would be of great importance, could they be made, and kept open, for military purposes, in case of a war. But we had some experience of roads not kept in order, from which, perhaps, some useful hints might be drawn. Much money was, on a former occasion, expended in making a road in Florida, from Pensacola to St. Augustine. The pines had been cut down and the road levelled; but, there being no travelling upon it, a growth of oaks in a few years sprang up, in place of the pines, and rendered it impassable, until further expense should be laid out upon it. If the roads in the Territory of Michigan could not be travelled, and would, in the lapse of a few years, be again obstructed by the growth of a new forest, it would be useless to cut them through. Whether the growth of wood was similar to that in Florida, and whether the result would be the same, he did not know; but the matter was worthy of consideration.

Mr. BEXTON had so often pressed upon the United States the necessity of making roads through their lands, that it was hardly necessary to say that he was in favor of this bill. The principle was well established. As far back as twenty years since, a highly respectable committee of this body, of which Mr. Giles, of Virginia, and Mr. Baldwin, of Georgia, were members—men unsurpassed for discernment and ability—made a report in which the principle was impressed upon Congress, that it was the duty of the Government to make roads through their lands. The consideration of duty, and the strong recommendation of the Commander-in-chief of the Army, seemed to him sufficient grounds for advocating this appropriation. But all of us, said Mr. B., have our own knowledge of the necessity of the provision. There was not a Senator who did not know the position of the road from Detroit to Chicago, and its importance, from its contiguity to Canada, held by a foreign power. It was only from the want of roads that, in many instances, great difficulties were experienced by our forces on the frontiers during the late war. It was impossible to transport provision or ammunition to our troops placed in distant posts; and many disasters which occurred, would never have taken place had there been good, or even bad roads through that wild tract of territory; setting aside the immense expenditure which the Government was forced to incur on account of this deficiency. While Congress was expending hundreds of thousands on the seaboard, was it just that their eyes should be shut upon the necessities of the frontiers? Not that he was inimical to these appropriations for the marine States: he had advocated those objects—but he also wished appropriations to be made, whenever they were required, on the western frontier of the country.

Who among the gentlemen present, did not remember, and almost shudder at the recollection, to have read, while his blood was frozen with horror, of the massacre of Chicago? Women and children, the aged and the helpless, were murdered by the ruthless savages in the trackless forest, whence there was no path for flight. He trusted that the Government would not neglect to provide for the defence of this frontier, that such a scene might not occur, should war again overtake us.

The people of the West, Mr. B. said, paid more than any others, of equal numbers, to the support of the public Treasury: they paid a million and a half annually through the Land Offices: nearly another million through the Custom House at New Orleans, and then a full proportion of the customs collected at Baltimore, Philadelphia, and New York, and even something to Boston. This arose from their consumption of foreign goods, as they had not manufactories which furnished fine cloths and cottons, as the people of New England had; and they paid for more, in proportion to their numbers, than the people of the other parts of the country.

He could not refrain from smiling, when he heard it boasted that New York paid twenty millions in duties. For, in the western country, the taxes were far more burthensome, and their contributions to the revenue of the United States far greater, in proportion, than those of the Atlantic States. Nor ought they to be deprived of their share of the public expenditure. If the documents of the Land Office of Detroit were examined, it would be found that it was the most productive in the country; and since that section of the Union was paying its share of taxation and tribute to the Government, he saw no good reason why a share also in the benefits flowing from it, should not be granted.

Mr. CHANDLER observed that he had found a new objection to the bill, in the fact of its running through one of the States of the Union. He had at first supposed that it was to be made entirely through the Territories. He, therefore, was now in favor of the postponement.*

Mr. RUGGLES said, that the portion to be made through a State sovereignty might be stricken out, if that was an objection to the bill. He spoke at some length on the necessity for the road, and the inconveniences to which the inhabitants were now subjected from the want of one. He hoped the gentleman (Mr. SMITH) would consent so to modify his motion as to postpone it to a certain day, that the bill might not be entirely lost.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, assented to this suggestion.

Mr. NOBLE said he could not but regret that any proposition should be made for the purpose of defeating the bill. He moved that it be taken up on Monday next; and, in order that it might then be taken up, he moved to lay it on the table.

The question upon this latter motion being then taken, it was agreed to, and the bill was laid on the table.

Salary of the Postmaster General.

The bill to increase the salary of the Postmaster General was read a second time, and

* A striking instance of the difference between making roads in States and Territories—those readily voting for them in Territories who were restrained by constitutional objections from doing so in States.

taken up for consideration. [The bill proposes to make the salary $6,000.]

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, observed, that, as his opinions on this bill were chiefly comprised in the report which had just been read, he could say little in addition upon the subject. He remarked, that the duties and responsibilities of the gentleman at the head of the Post Office Department were equally important with those of the Head of any other Department in the Government; and that the individual labor devolving upon that functionary was far greater than that of any other. He had discharged his duty with zeal and application, and in a manner so advantageous to the public that it was highly desirable to place him on the same footing with the other Heads of Departments.

Mr. REED advocated the bill, and spoke in high terms of the manner in which the Postmaster General performed the duties of his office.

Mr. BRANCH said he was far from being in favor of raising salaries in general cases; he was rather in favor of cutting down. But in the case of the Postmaster General, his opinion was, that it required to be increased to an equality with the compensation received by the other Heads of Departments. The duties of this Department seemed to him to incur more responsibility than any other; the people were more immediately dependent upon it: and the liberty of the country was intimately concerned in the good regulation of this important Department. It was impossible that a man holding an office so important should be able to subsist, in the present mode of living, on the salary now given to the Postmaster General. It was not to put money in the pocket of an individual, that he should vote for this bill, but to compensate services of great value to the country.

Mr. HOLMES knew one, and but one inconvenience, in having a very good public officer. It was this—that when you raise his salary for a zealous performance of his duties, his successor, not so good or so able, came in for his share of the advantage. Mr. H. said, however, that he should vote for an increase of the salary of the Postmaster General, because he liked him: because he respected him as a faithful and zealous functionary. He was the Head of a Department, the duties of which required as much ability and integrity as any of the other Departments: and far more industry. During the recess of Congress, the Secretaries might go on excursions into the country; but the Postmaster General could not do it, as his duties required his incessant attention; and they would probably always require the same degree of industry. They saw plainly enough the talent and exertion which the office required, and why not pay the incumbent accordingly? This single officer, in the arrangement of salaries, has been left behind his class. The other Heads of Departments, he believed, were satisfied with the pay they received; at any rate, Congress was satisfied with it; and now the object was to bring up the compensation of the Postmaster General to an equality with other officers of the same rank.

Mr. WOODBURY said, that the bill came into the Senate from the House, during the last week of the last session; and the only reason why it did not then pass, was, that the increase of the salary of the Postmaster General was coupled with the increase of other salaries, which met with opposition in the committee, and delayed the subject until the session terminated. The opinions of the whole committee were in favor of increasing the salary of the Postmaster General.

The question being then taken, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, by a large majority.

The Senate adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, January 15.

Salary of the Postmaster General.

The engrossed bill to increase the salary of the Postmaster General was read a third time; and, on the question being put, "Shall this bill pass?"

Mr. COBB called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. RANDOLPH then rose, and said, that, as he could not vote for this bill, he thought it incumbent upon him to assign some reasons for his dissent—although he was perfectly aware that it was rather the duty of the proposers of the bill to assign reasons for its passage. Sir, said Mr. R., this bill is in itself an innovation—it is a taking up singly, on the motion of a Senator, the salary of one officer of the Government, and passing upon it, without taking a review of the salaries and duties of the whole. In the mode of bringing it forward, it is exceptionable—but it is still more exceptionable in principle. Mr. President, this is a question which ought to be decided without the slightest allusion to the incumbent of the office. I shall, therefore, abstain entirely from advertent to him—I look to the office—to the duty—to the emolument; and not the man. The office of the Postmaster General has been likened to others, to which, in my opinion, it bears no likeness—it has been likened to the office of the Secretary of State; but the comparison is in every respect exceptionable: for you will recollect that, to that office, the peace and happiness of the country are confided. I will not examine the other offices to which it has been likened; but, in its nature, the office of Postmaster General is purely ministerial—is lower in the scale than those of the other Heads of Departments. Sir, I shall say nothing of the salaries of the other offices. Whether or not they are too high, is not now the subject of consideration—but I am clearly of opinion, that we are about to take a step—inadvertent, I was going to say—but I will say, inexpedient. We are about to make an addition of two thousand sand dollars to the salary of the Postmaster General. Sir, the present salary of that officer, in any of the States, would be considered a large and adequate compensation for any office within those States. Have the Senate considered well this measure? Have they considered that, by this bill, they will place the compensation of the Postmaster General one thousand dollars above that of the Vice President of the United States, and one thousand dollars above that of the Chief Justice of the United States? Mr. President, you know, and we all know, that there never was a time more inauspicious than the present to an increase of public expenditure. Those who have seen fit to remark upon my public life, will, I believe, allow that I was never a penurious or a parsimonious politician. I always wished to compensate public servants—I always considered the laborer worthy of his hire; but, in this case, I consider the hire fully worthy of the laborer. Sir, was there ever a time when money was more scarce? when we were more admonished to the practice of economy? or when the aspect of our affairs was more unpromising? Sir, in the part of the country from which you and I come, there is a dearth which treads upon the heels of famine—nor is distress and depression partial or limited. These reasons, and many others that I could enumerate, induce me to oppose the passage of the bill; and I move that it be re-committed.

Mr. BRANCH believed the gentleman from Virginia was sincere in the expression of his opinion. He had always respected the opinions of that gentleman, but in this case he must differ from him. In making a comparison of the salary of the Postmaster General with that of the Vice President, a comparison of the duties of the two offices ought, in justice, to have been made. The office of the Vice President was almost a nominal one. It was true, that the present Vice President had certainly fulfilled his duty in the office; but, in comparison with those of the Postmaster General, his duties were merely nominal. He thought the services of the Postmaster General of the utmost importance to the country, contrary to the gentleman from Virginia, who did not think that the compensation of that functionary should be as great as that of the other Heads of Departments. But, was he borne out by facts? Had it not been shown that the duties of the Postmaster General were so arduous and engrossing, that he had not, during his whole time of service, been able to absent himself from his office? The other Heads of Departments had it in their power to traverse the country; to visit our Legislatures; to do much besides their duty, and even, at times, to make our Senators tremble. Not so with the Postmaster General. Would to God all the other officers of the Government were as exclusively devoted to their duties, and as entirely confined to their own sphere of action. In this case, he had set out in a conviction that the bill ought to pass; and, much as he respected the gentleman from Virginia, he must still persevere in his opinion. He [Mr. B.] represented a portion of the country which was humble in its pretensions as to compensation for services; and he was no advocate for exorbitant salaries. But he did not think this country exhibited many such. If we looked at most of our public officers, we should perceive that, instead of getting rich upon their offices, many of them were bankrupts. The gentleman from Virginia would never prescribe to one officer a style of living different from that of others of the same rank. That gentleman knew the inveteracy of habit, and what was due to society. The Postmaster General must and ought to live like a gentleman. He spoke of the office, and not of the individual—who was allowed, on all hands, to be a valuable officer—and, in comparing the duties and labors of that office with those of others of a similar grade, he came to the conclusion that the incumbent, from the nature and extent of his services, had a just claim to a salary equal to those of other Heads of Departments.

The question was then taken, and the bill passed, by the following vote; and was sent to the other House for concurrence.

FRIDAY, January 19.

Relief of the Sufferers at Alexandria.

Mr. HARRISON rose and said, that he was about to ask of the Senate the greatest indulgence ever asked for on any occasion, since he had the honor of a seat on this floor. The motion, however, which he was about to make, was one so consonant to the generous feelings of the members, that he trusted no objection would be offered to it; and that the exigency would be a sufficient argument in favor of the dispensation of the rule which he intended to ask. He begged leave to introduce a bill, without the usual formalities of a previous notice, for the relief of the sufferers by the fire, which yesterday spread devastation through the neighboring city of Alexandria. It was not the intention of Mr. H. to make a speech at the present time, and he hoped no such display of arguments would be necessary to awaken in the minds of gentlemen a proper feeling upon the subject: for, while they were deliberating, the women and children whom the conflagration of yesterday had deprived of their homes, were suffering, excepting so far as they had been relieved by private benevolence. No constitutional objection could be raised to this manner of dispensing the funds of the country, and they were left to follow the dictates of humanity. It was proper to consider what Alexandria formerly was, and what she now is. Once she was a component part of the great State of Virginia, claiming protection from the sovereignty of that State—that protection had been resigned; and she was now a part of this District, and had no Legislature to look to for assistance, but to the Congress of the United States. Had she remained in her former condition, the Legislature of that great State, now in session, would doubtless have made an appropriation adequate to the misfortunes of the sufferers. But now they had no other hope of protection and succor than from Congress; they had no other appeal but to the United States. Mr. H. then asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to appropriate the sum of ten thousand dollars for the relief of the indigent sufferers by the late fire in Alexandria, to be placed in the hands of the Mayor of that city, to be disposed of by him; which was read twice, by unanimous consent.

Mr. BAXTON opposed the bill. He thought it a subject upon which it would be improper and inexpedient to legislate. If the losers had insured their property, which, in most cases, it was probable, had been done, the sufferings would not likely be so great as had been imagined. To make their sufferings the subject of an act of Congress, struck him as needless, as they would experience the same extension of sympathy and assistance which had been given to other places, when overtaken by similar disasters, by individual contribution. He must also oppose an appropriation by Congress, made on a sudden occasion, which always created feverish excitement, and led men to advocate measures, which, in moments of cooler reflection, they might have felt it their duty to oppose.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said, that the people of Alexandria were peculiarly situated; they were under the care of the United States, and it was more incumbent upon Congress to extend protection to the inhabitants of the District, than to those of any other individual portion of territory in the United States. The gentleman from Missouri had said, that the property was chiefly insured; but he had not taken into consideration, that only two-thirds of the value of buildings was ever insured, as the insurance officers guarded themselves in this manner, from the effects of too great a security on the part of those who insured; who might, if entirely shielded from loss, become negligent. And, even supposing the buildings to have been insured, there was a great part of the property lost, on which it would, doubtless, be very difficult to effect insurance, because its value could not easily be estimated. In this inclement season of the year, when so large a number of persons were thrown, by such disaster, upon the benevolence of those who were also, in some degrees, sufferers; when persons who yesterday were living in plenty and comfort, were to-day deprived of the means of shelter and subsistence; it was no time to canvass coldly the extent of the suffering, or the probability of their receiving succor elsewhere. Many instances of misery might be brought before the Senate, but he would mention only one; it was that of a widow; who had, previous to this calamity, lived in plenty upon her means, and who, by the event of yesterday, had been made destitute. And, should it be said that Congress shut their hands to distress like this? Should they turn from a conflagration which took place within their sight, and with heartless indifference bid the sufferers look to the charity of their fellow-citizens for relief? He had hoped that this proposition would have passed the Senate sub silentio; and he was somewhat surprised that it had encountered opposition. It seemed to be looked upon by the gentleman from Missouri as a new case. But it was no new case. Congress had formerly extended similar relief to other sufferers; they had appropriated fifty thousand dollars to the sufferers of Lagnayra; and had, even during this session, allowed persons having lost their lands, by the earthquake in Missouri, to locate on other lands. Why, then, should they refuse to grant relief on an occasion which so justly called for their assistance?

Mr. CHANDLER said, that by this bill, they were called upon to give relief, which, if it depended on his own will, he should not feel disposed to withhold. He did not feel less for those who had suffered than the gentleman from Maryland; but if he [Mr. C.] were to vote for this bill, what should he be able to say to a portion of his constituents, who had been, within two years, visited with a calamity immeasurably greater than that upon which they were now commenting? It was known, that, in the State of Maine, a conflagration took place last year, which covered fifty miles square, destroying houses and barns, and even the produce of the field. But the people in that country had received no relief from Congress; he did not think they had any right to expect it, nor did he think Congress was bound to bestow it in this instance. He was willing to put his hand into his pocket and give as freely as any one towards this object; but he could not support the bill under consideration. He declared to God he could not put his hand into the pockets of his constituents, who had suffered equally by the same devouring element, and give their money to relieve those who had been injured in this case. He certainly would have assented to it had not his sense of duty directed him otherwise. If, however, this was now done, a precedent would have been established; and on other occasions it would be necessary to make appropriations for the relief of other cities. The argument that Alexandria was in the District of Columbia, did not appear to him to be a satisfactory one, and certainly had no power to convince his mind that the measure would be a correct one.

Mr. BENTON was not opposed to the dispensation of one of the rules of the Senate: but he was of opinion that they ought not all to be dispensed with. He, therefore, thought the bill ought now to take its usual course; and wished that it might have a reference to the appropriate committee. Their decision was very important in this case; and, meanwhile, the distresses of the sufferers might be alleviated in the manner pointed out by the gentleman from Maine, as he presumed all would give according to their means. He moved that the bill be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The question being taken, the bill was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Alexandria Sufferers.

The bill for the relief of the indigent sufferers by the late fire at Alexandria, was then taken up, and read a third time.

Mr. NOBLE called for the yeas and nays on the question of the passage, which were ordered, and were as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bateman, Benton, Boulogny, Branch, Chambers, Chase, Clayton, Dickerson of Eaton, Edwards, Harrison, Hayne, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnson Ky., Johnston of Lou., Kane, King, Knight, Marks, Mills, Ridgely, Robbins, Sanford, Seymour, Smith of Md., Thomas—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Barton, Bell, Chandler, Cobb, Findlay, Macon, Noble, Randolph, Reed, Rowan, Ruggles, Smith of S. C., Tazewell, Van Buren, White, Wiley, Williams—17.

So the bill passed, and was returned to the House of Representatives.

MONDAY, January 29.

Lottery for the Sale of Mr. Jefferson's Monticello Estate.

Mr. HAYNE rose, and said, he had been requested to present a petition, which, from its character, as well as the quarter from which it came, would, he was sure, receive the most respectful consideration from the Senate. It was a petition from the family of Thomas Jefferson. It did not ask for any pecuniary relief, nor did it attempt to enlist the generous sympathies of the American people, in behalf of the daughter of the man whose name alone would be a sure passport to the confidence and protection of every American. It merely requested the sanction of Congress to an arrangement by which the corporation of this city have agreed to lend their aid to effect an object, which, it was believed, would accomplish the wish nearest the heart of Mr. Jefferson, of placing his only surviving child in a state of independence. It is known to the American people, said Mr. H., that, during the last years of his life, Mr.

Jefferson's affairs were considerably embarrassed. This, it is well understood, was not occasioned by any thing that could be justly attributed to him as a fault. Some unforeseen misfortunes—the great depreciation of real estates—but, above all, the peculiar situation in which he was placed, brought upon him, in his old age, those calamities, of which we have all heard, and which we have all deplored. He retired from the Presidential chair, the idol of the party of which he had so long been the efficient head, and found himself, during the latter years of his life, in possession of the respect and confidence of all classes of the community. He was, indeed, regarded as the patriarch of liberty, and his house became a shrine to which its votaries made their annual pilgrimages. Hence it was, that, in the exercise of what has been so happily called, “a liberal, though frugal hospitality,” he became involved in pecuniary difficulties. When placed in that situation, it is known to all who now hear me, that he disdained to ask or to receive from his country any assistance beyond the grant of a lottery, the whole object of which was to dispose of his estate at its appraised value. To those who may be disposed to accuse us of ingratitude towards Mr. Jefferson, it is proper to say, that he obtained all that he desired; and, as he most positively and publicly declared, all that he would have consented to receive. That he did not attempt to avail himself of a popularity without a parallel, to put himself at once above his difficulties, proves that he died, as he lived, true to his principles. It is known to the public that the lottery granted by the State of Virginia, had not been brought to a conclusion at the time of Mr. Jefferson's decease: but it is not so generally known, that he died in the belief that it would soon be brought to a successful termination; nor that, in his will, (which is now before me, written with his own hand, but a few days before his death,) he has made a distribution of his estate, manifestly founded on this belief. It is needless for me to state the causes which have hitherto delayed the completion of the lottery; and it is only necessary for me now to say, that an arrangement has been made with the corporation of the City of Washington, by which the Jefferson lottery is to be so connected with the lotteries established here, as to accomplish all the objects which Mr. Jefferson had in view. This has been effected through Messrs. Yates and McIntyre, who, with a liberality entitled to all praise, have made the most satisfactory arrangements on this subject. The only difficulty in the way arises from the charter of the City of Washington, which restricts them from any lottery, except such as distribute money prizes. The object of this petition, therefore, is to obtain an act of Congress, giving authority to the corporation of Washington to connect the Jefferson lottery with those they are now authorized by law to establish—an object which, I trust, will be accomplished without objection or difficulty,

Mr. H. then presented the petition of Thomas Jefferson Randolph, executor of Thomas Jefferson, praying for an act of Congress, for the purposes above mentioned.

The petition was read; and, on motion of Mr. HAYNE, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

THURSDAY, February 1.

Distribution of Revenue.

On motion of Mr. DICKERSON, the "bill for the distribution of a portion of the Revenue of the United States among the several States," was taken up.

The bill is in the following words:

"A Bill to provide for the distribution of a part of the Revenues of the United States among the several States of the Union.

"Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized and required, under such regulations as he may think proper to prescribe, to divide amongst the several States of the Union, in the ratio of direct taxation, the sum of five millions of dollars, on the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-eight; five millions of dollars, on the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-nine; five millions of dollars, on the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and thirty; and five millions of dollars, on the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-one; which sums shall be taken from the annual sum of ten millions of dollars appropriated to the Sinking Fund, by the second section of the act approved on the third day of March, one thousand eight hundred and seventeen, entitled 'An act to provide for the redemption of the public debt.'"

Mr. DICKERSON observed: By this bill it is proposed to divide among the several States, in the ratio of direct taxation, five millions of dollars, annually, for four years, commencing on the 1st of January, 1828. This is intended as an experiment, which, if successful, will no doubt be followed by an adoption of its principle, in a more permanent form.

One object of this bill is, to provide funds in all the States, for the purposes of education and internal improvement, by a rule which shall operate justly, equally, and harmoniously, throughout every part of the Union.

Another object is, to transfer to the Legislatures of the States the application of a part of the surplus funds of the General Government, and thus relieve Congress from a weight of legislation, which, from its mass alone, is becoming truly formidable, but much more so from its producing a concentration of power in the General Government, never intended to be vested there by those who formed our constitution.

It is not intended, by this bill, to exercise any control over those funds, after the same shall have been distributed to the States. It is not necessary to inquire whether Congress have this power of control or not, when it is very evident that it would be inexpedient to exercise it, even if they have it.

No uniform rule could be adopted, as to the objects to which these funds should be applied, in the different States. In the Eastern States, where they have long been improving their roads, and where they have brought them to a high state of perfection, by the application of their own means, their dividends, in a great measure, would be applied to the establishment of schools and seminaries of learning. In the Western States, where ample funds have been provided for the purposes of education, their dividends would be applied, chiefly, to the making of roads and canals. In the middle and Southern States, their dividends would be applied, in more equal portions, to those important objects. In all these applications, however, the States can judge much better for themselves, than Congress can judge for them.

It is proposed to take these dividends from the ten millions of dollars annually appropriated to the Sinking Fund for the reduction of the public debt, by the act of the 3d of March, 1817. This, no doubt, will startle those, if there be any such, who believe this fund to be a sacred deposit, which, by some unexplained operation, is working out a redemption of the public debt. It will, however, excite no alarm with those who know that it has, in no respect whatever, the character of that kind of sinking fund, which, upon the recommendation of Dr. Price, was adopted in Great Britain, for the redemption of the debt of that country; but that it is simply a resolution, reduced to the form of law, to apply ten millions of dollars, annually, to the redemption of the debt of the United States, adopted when that debt was nearly twice its present amount, and when it was more necessary to appropriate ten millions for that purpose, than it is to appropriate five millions now.

But if there should be objections to taking these dividends from this fund, they may be taken from other parts of our revenue; although, in that case, it would be found necessary to reduce their amount.

This ten millions of dollars is not the whole of the Sinking Fund; any surplus in the Treasury, at the end of any year, above all appropriations for the year, and leaving in the Treasury two millions of dollars, is also appropriated to this fund. These surpluses might be calculated safely at three or four millions a year, if our appropriations do not greatly exceed the bounds of moderation; and the two millions heretofore reserved in the Treasury, beyond all appropriations, might also be applied to the Sinking Fund.

Road in the Territory of Arkansas, &c.

The bill to construct a road from a point opposite Memphis, in Tennessee, to Little Rock, in Arkansas, was read a second time.

Mr. HENDRICKS offered two sections, as amendments, authorizing the construction of a road from Fort Smith, in Arkansas, to Fort Towson, on the Red River, which, Mr. H. observed, constituted a portion of the bill rejected a few days since, deprived of the objection then urged, that the road was to run through the State of Louisiana.

A desultory debate took place on the adoption of these amendments, in which Messrs. HENDRICKS, JOHNSON of Kentucky, SMITH of Maryland, HARRISON, CHANDLER, JOHNSTON of Louisiana, and BERRIEN, participated; when, after a slight alteration, the amendments were adopted, and the bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.*

Duty on Salt.

The bill to repeal, in part, the duty on imported salt, was read a second time.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said, that the idea of this bill first sprang from the Committee on Agriculture; and the subject had been referred to the Committee on Finance, who had reported the bill last year, and again the same bill this year. The duty on imported salt did not amount to a very great sum. Since the war, it had produced an average of 650,000 dollars annually; but it was not intended to reduce the duty but one-half. An advantage would arise out of it of an increased consumption; as many farmers, who, from the present high prices, could not afford to salt their cattle, would do it, and the increase of consumption, in this way, would be much greater than was in general supposed. The deficit in the revenue, which this reduction would occasion, would amount to only about 150,000 dollars this year, and the same sum the ensuing year. His idea was, that, if the duty was reduced, more of the article would be consumed, and thus the increase of demand would redress the deduction from the duties. Other gentlemen, however, were better acquainted with the subject than himself, and he looked to them for further information.

Mr. HOLMES observed, that it would be recollected that, when this proposition was first made last year, he had opposed it, upon the ground that it would destroy the bounty now given to the fisheries, which was connected with the duty on salt. The fishermen of the United States were justly considered a valuable class, which the Government was bound to encourage as far as possible; as producing the seamen on whom the commerce of the country was to depend. The bounty on the fisheries was established at the same time that the duty was first levied on salt, and was considered as a kind of drawback upon that duty; and the reason of it was that many gentlemen had scruples as to the power of Congress to give a bounty on any successful enterprise. These doubts would have entirely prevented the encouragement of the fisheries, as a nursery for seamen, had it not been for this combination of the two provisions. Great injury to our commercial interests would have arisen out of a failure to allow this bounty; and he was opposed to the bill in the first place, because it would bring with it, as a natural consequence, the repeal of this bounty*—not that any such proposition was made in the bill—but from the fact that both of the provisions were connected; therefore, what affected the one, must touch the other. Now, sir, said Mr. H., I think it is of great importance to retain this bounty. It is given on the tonnage of the vessel, not according to the success of the fisheries; and if fishermen remain six months in this employment, they share the bounty, let their voyage prove successful or not. In a bad year, this encourages and supports them, and they are willing to go on, and risk again the vicissitudes of their venturous pursuits. Were it not for this encouragement, a run of bad luck would dishearten them, and the result would be, that our own native fishermen would desert the business, and this neglect would throw the fisheries into the hands of the fishermen of other nations, who would supply our consumption of the article, while our great nursery of seamen would be entirely broken up. If, as productive of sailors, the English Government considered the fisheries of the greatest value, (and the same opinion had been expressed by our own Government, and was acknowledged by all,) then, any act which should endanger the prosperity of this branch of our industry, ought to be most studiously avoided; and no measure which would tend to break up this nursery of one of the most useful classes of men, ought, if possible, to be adopted. It was doubted now, as well as formerly, whether Congress had a right to fix this bounty, except as a kind of drawback upon the duties on salt; and if they repealed the duty, the bounty would follow. As to the services rendered by the fishermen, they were of great value. The products of their industry were the products of the sea, and little other capital than the labor and enterprise of these hardy mariners, was required to carry it on: in fact, labor only was wanted, and that must be had, or the trade would fall to decay. We were, then, admonished to encourage those laborers, by every motive of public interest. The revenue produced by the importation of salt now amounted to an average annual product of 600,000 dollars. Could the Government spare so large a sum at this period? Were

* This is the true reason for the northeastern opposition to the repeal of the salt tax—an opposition which still keeps up a fragment of the duty, enough to carry the imported salt to the custom house, and to throw the trade, in the importing cities, into the hands of regraters, and to enable them to double the price to the consumer. In the mean time the fishing bounties and allowances have become nearly a naked gratuity out of the Treasury, the duty on salt being so far reduced as no longer to serve for a foundation for those bounties and allowances which, nevertheless, are kept in full.

* Another strong instance of the difference maintained between roads in States and Territories—the bill being now passed without a division in the Senate (being to the Territory of Arkansas) which was before rejected because it touched the State of Louisiana.

our affairs in such a flourishing condition, that we could, without any inconvenience, strike off this amount from our receipts? His opinion was, that they could ill spare the tax on salt, and that consideration, were there no others, would decide him against it.

While they had been here this session, a memorial had been presented from Portsmouth, praying a repeal of the bounty on the fisheries, in order to remove the frauds which were said to have been committed on the duty on salt. It was said that the fishermen went to sea and bought the salt to cure their fish in the British Provinces, and thus evaded the duty, while they claimed the bounty. These instances of fraud had been prosecuted, and existed no longer. There was a way to restrict men in such cases, without depriving all those engaged in the trade, of the bounty. Our fishermen formerly had a coasting license, to dry their fish on the British coasts, not to sell fish to the British; and it was objected that the fisherman would go and spend his four months in other pursuits, and then return and claim the bounty. These, however, were but casual occurrences, and offered nothing more against the bounty than occasional individual frauds offered against any system. But this was not all. There were manufactories of salt in the United States, which required to be protected—the more, because salt was an article of absolute necessity, without which we could scarcely exist, and which, in time of war, could not be obtained, except at a high price. What is the extent of the manufacture of this article in this country? It is carried on in New York, in Massachusetts, in Virginia, North Carolina, and, he was informed, in Florida. What the quantity manufactured in North Carolina was, he did not know; but he would read a statement in writing, from a gentleman intimately acquainted with the subject, as to the salt works of Cape Cod.

[Mr. H. then read a paper, which stated that, along the seacoast of Massachusetts, there were numerous manufactories of salt, which employed upwards of one thousand persons, each having a small manufactory, managed by himself and family. The value of these establishments is estimated at 200,000 dollars, their annual product at about 600,000 bushels, weighing 78 lbs. each, of the best quality of salt. It was also stated that the price of salt was now about 85 cents, and that it had been reduced nearly 80 per cent. in the last three years, owing to a competition between the importer and manufacturer. The manufacturer could not afford it as low as it was now sold; and a reduction of the duty would operate greatly to his injury. When the duty was repealed in 1807, they must have all been ruined, had not Massachusetts exonerated their works from all taxation.]

Now, sir, this is a small section of the country; but in this small strip of coast, one thousand people, and a capital of two millions, are employed, and they annually produce six hundred thousand bushels of the article. Yet, this is considered of no importance, and we are told that the whole must go by the board, by reducing the duty which has hitherto protected them. He would call the attention of the chairman of the committee who reported this bill, to one question. Is it a fact, that, by repealing the duty on this article, the consumer will use more, because of a reduced price, and thus the country reap the profit? This was not the case formerly, when the duty was repealed. For a short time it was lower; but it soon rose up again. How was this to be accounted for? Why, because salt was not a principal article of trade, but entirely one of a subsidiary character. No trader will import salt regularly; he will not send out his ships to bring back a cargo of salt; but, on the contrary, it is imported to make out an incomplete cargo, or as ballast. Thus the importer, holding the article by chance, and there being no permanent trade in it to regulate the price, is enabled to fix it, and the profit will accrue to him, and not to the consumer. It is self-evident, that, if you repeal the salt tax, you will put down all manufactories of the article. You will want just so much salt, whether at home or from abroad; and if the manufacture is broken down, all competition with the importer is destroyed, and he is at liberty to set his own price. One way or another, the bill will produce bad effects. Either you do reduce the price according to the duty taken off, or you do not; and if you do reduce the price, the manufacture is destroyed; if it does not, we have lost 800,000 dollars of revenue, without benefiting any one. If the manufactories are broken up, where are we to look for a supply of this most indispensable article when war overtakes us? The manufacture of any article which is required in great quantities, wants time and encouragement to make it perfect and abundant. It cannot be expected that it will grow up in a day, to meet the sudden exigency of the country; and hereafter, should Congress pass this bill, the country may need the assistance of the manufactories which it will have destroyed. It was in vain to suppose that they could flourish until there was something should occur to check importation. These loose ideas he had thrown out, on the moment, convinced that the bill ought not, on many considerations, to pass.

The Senate adjourned without taking the question.

FRIDAY, February 2.

Duty on Salt.

The unfinished business of yesterday being then taken up, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill making a reduction of the duty on imported salt.

Mr. SANFORD said, that the bill was taken up at so late an hour yesterday, that he had not the advantage of hearing the views expressed by the gentlemen who addressed the Senate upon the subject. At the last session, this bill, or a similar one, was before the Senate, and, if his memory served him, the first argument used to support it was, that we could very well dispense with the tax upon salt. It was admitted that, at that time, we could dispense with that amount of our revenue. We could have dispensed with a much greater sum at that period. Our funds were then ample, and by some it was supposed almost inexhaustible. But the aspect of affairs had undergone a great change. And now our circumstances were such that we could dispense with nothing in justice to those claims which would come upon the Treasury during the present year. There were now from three to four millions in the Treasury, according to any account, and, upon this point, statements differed. At any rate, it was clear, that, with all the funds in our possession, and all that were to be received, Government would have a scanty amount to meet the expenses which would occur beyond the estimates. The revenue promised this year was much smaller than usual, in proportion to the demands of the country; and he fully believed we should reach the end of our money with the end of the year. In this condition of things, it was certainly not a time to reduce the income. This was not the only reduction proposed during the year. A bill had been reported to diminish the duty on wine. The object was said to be to encourage a greater consumption of that article, and thus increase the revenue. In regard to wine, this effect might be produced; but it certainly would not be in reducing the duty on salt. As to teas, we were absolutely forced to make a great reduction of the revenue, or witness an entire stagnation of the trade in that article. Every member of the Senate understood the cause of this. Formerly, we had no rival in the importation of teas, and this country, to a considerable extent, supplied the consumption in the British provinces. But, within the last two years, immense quantities had been imported by the East India Company into Canada, free of duty, which enabled the British merchant to supply our population at a very low rate. This article, then, of the revenue, we must inevitably reduce, or abandon the competition with the British merchants. As to other branches of our revenue, he did not think any improvement could be anticipated at present. Some persons supposed that an increase of importation, during the current year, would be a natural consequence of its deficiency last year; but he was not of that opinion. He was sensible that this revulsion might be expected with reason; but he believed it was looked for too soon. He anticipated no increase of imports, either this year or next. The reflux would not be so rapid as was imagined; nor would the change happen in less than two years. Nor was he of opinion that prudence dictated the repeal of the duty on salt.

Mr. WOODBURY.—The object and tendency of this bill had, by some abroad, been misunderstood; and by others, misrepresented. Standing, as may be thought, in some degree in a paternal relation to the measure, it might be expected that he should attempt to correct these errors, and vindicate it from the numerous objections with which it had been assailed. The bill, as you well know, Mr. President, was not intended to injure the fisheries; nothing of that kind being either implied or expressed in its provisions. But, its legitimate operation will be to aid the fishermen, in common with all other consumers of imported salt. Neither is it gotten up in hostility to manufacturers, nor will it prove injurious to any due encouragement of them. Just as little, also, is it calculated to endanger the financial operations of the Government, as permanently established for peace, or as they happen to exist at the present moment. The principle of the bill is altogether different, and lies within a single inquiry. It is this: Ought not a war-tax—a tax, imposed merely to meet the great exigencies of such a crisis—a tax, temporary at its commencement, exorbitant in amount, and partial in its operation—ought not such a tax to be now lessened? That is the question. Now, after twelve years of plenty and peace, and after the fullest examination by committees has shown that the passage of the bill will aid, rather than injure the fisheries—will not sensibly affect the present operations of the Treasury, or any permanent branches of the revenue, nor leave our manufacturers of domestic salt without a protection, as great as is extended to any article of a similar character, in the whole tariff—these various circumstances bearing on the bill, shall be adverted to as briefly as possible. But, the paramount—the primary object—is to ascertain if the present duty be indeed a war-tax. When I call the present duty on salt a war-tax, it is not by way of rhetorical figure, or for effect upon any honest prejudice; but, it is to invite the attention of the Senate to the true origin of the duty, as tending strongly to illustrate the opinion, that, not having been designed for the state of things in peace, it is too large and unequal for any legitimate purposes, in the present condition of the country.

Gentlemen well remember, that, at the beginning of our late war, salt was entirely free from even the smallest duty. It was not till July, 1813, in a state of obstinate hostilities, under a diminished revenue, with extraordinary expenditures, and accompanied by great financial embarrassments, that the present tax was imposed. It is well known, that, in such a condition of public affairs, all ordinary rules of taxation must bend. They must yield far enough to meet the controlling necessities of the country. The necessities of life must then submit to be burthened as well as its luxuries; and the poor, in common with the rich, must then defend their hearths and altars by large contributions and large sacrifices. It is on such occasions only, that salt, though an article of the first importance to all classes, may properly be subjected to a great tax. Because it is thus subjected in common with the soil we till for our daily bread, and with the houses that give us daily shelter from the weather. It is true, I grant, that the great bulk and weight of salt, compared with its value, and that its universal use, often induce Governments, in these exigencies of war, to select it for the most severe taxation, in preference to other necessities; because, for these reasons, it is more difficult to be smuggled, and more certain to yield a revenue. But these circumstances, it is manifest, furnish no reason for the tax itself; and in an especial manner, when the tax operates exclusively on a single section of a country. The true reason for the tax itself, is the controlling emergency of the occasion—the stern necessities of war; and I trust that no fair-minded politician can ever repeat again and again the incidental circumstances before named, as the true reason for either imposing or retaining a tax so exorbitant, unequal, and oppressive. Another decisive proof that it was deemed, when imposed, a mere war-tax, is the express limitation of its continuance in the act of Congress to only one year after the war. Had it been intended as a part of the permanent system of our revenue, or merely as a protection to manufacturers, why this limitation?

Again: The history of our country, which on this point cannot deceive us, shows, that, when the duty had once before been increased, in 1797, as high as twenty cents, it was imposed as a quasi war-tax on account of our difficulties with France. Then, too, was a limitation of it to three years—and never afterwards, till totally repealed, was it continued without an express protestation, in the act itself, that it was not to become, for any purpose, either of revenue or protection, a permanent part of our tariff system.

Our statesmen, at both periods, had numerous examples before them, and we now have still more, that a large tax on this article was injudicious, and inappropriate to any but a state of war; and that then, as before remarked, it had chiefly for its apology the great tyrant necessity—the great principle of self-preservation, and the right of Government to all constitutional means most likely to preserve the endangered safety of the Republic.

When the feelings of mankind, on any one subject, in different nations and ages, thus coincide, it is a pretty sure indication of their correctness. If a large salt tax in peace, then, has justly been the abhorrence of mankind in all time, something has always been thought, and should now be thought due from Government to such a universal sentiment. I shall not detain the Senate by references upon this point, when numerous instances are doubtless fresh in their recollection; and when none of us can have forgotten the eloquence upon this subject, which was displayed in the Senate at our last session, from the gentlemen, both on my right and my left. Permit me, a moment, to appeal merely to what has occurred within our own brief lives. Have we not seen the salt tax, or gaballe, in France, first imposed as a war-tax, become one of those wide-spread and odious oppressions, most instrumental in rousing the great mass of the population in their late Revolution? A tax far more burdensome and execrated than even the tax upon tea in our own Revolution. Let it not be forgotten that there, as here, it had commenced as a war-tax; and had been remitted and renounced at different periods, till, under new pretexts, it slid into a permanent peace impost, equalling nearly one-fourth of the whole revenue of the Empire. So stealthlike and absorbing is generally the character of power when abused; and if no peaceful correction is in time made by rulers, the people themselves, in some great crisis, are generally inclined to inflict fearful retribution.

The tax on salt began in the same way in England, and fluctuated in amount, and was suspended on various occasions. But the vast expenses of her continental wars, had, prior to the year 1816, compelled her, as a measure of unavoidable necessity, under such pressures, to increase her excise on salt to 15 shillings sterling per bushel, when used for domestic purposes, and from two to six shillings as used in various other specified ways. These, too, having begun in war, and at first being limited in duration—both rulers and ruled felt it had swollen with emergencies to a most oppressive burthen. They understood the principle on which it stood, and that it was fast beginning to be incorporated into her permanent system of revenue; and though they at first resisted a repeal, on arguments similar to those advanced yesterday and to-day; yet the natural hatred to such a tax in peace, the strong sense of justice among her statesmen, and the paternal regard of the Government towards its agricultural subjects, at length overcame every obstacle. All opposition to its repeal was in the end prostrated, and in May, 1822, provision was made for the gradual removal of the whole excise.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, observed, that he had but little to say at first on this bill, and, since the gentleman from New Hampshire had so fully treated it, he had now much less. The manufacture of salt was mostly in the hands of great capitalists: the two millions invested in the Massachusetts manufactories, belonged, in all probability, to the wealthy portion of the people; nor would the reduction of the duty injure the poor and laboring classes of society. To look only to New York, it was admitted that about one million bushels was produced there, which, according to his calculation, at a duty of ten cents per bushel, would pay one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars into the State Treasury—not to the public fund of the country. He did not know before that so large a sum was realized by any of the States from an impost on so essential an article, both to health and life: for, without it, both man and beast dwindled from their native strength and vigor, and the poor man who labored, in proportion to his labors, the more required this indispensable article. The farmers, spread through our country, and who were not only the most numerous, but really the most useful class of our community, required large quantities of salt for themselves and for their stock. In relation to the latter, experience teaches us that the use of salt is not to be supplied by any other ingredient of food. A statement has been read by the gentleman from New Hampshire, which established the fact that the use of salt increased, to a vast amount, the weight and value of stock, and made a much smaller portion of food requisite. If, then, this article was so vitally necessary to the agriculturists of our country, it ought to be as free and unrestrained by duty or imposts, as it was in the power of Congress to make it. They were told that the treasury would be drained; but this, with him, was not a sufficient reason for retaining a heavy duty upon an article of such common and constant necessity. They were told also, that the duties on other articles must be reduced; but it appeared to him that no one required it so much as salt; for no one extended so universally to the food of all classes, or could be taxed with an effect of so general a nature. In refusing to take off the duty upon salt, they would involve themselves in a palpable inconsistency, not to say in an act of injustice. While they were giving millions to other objects, and lavishing the public money as though their resources were endless, was it reasonable to refuse so small a remittance as was contemplated by this bill, to the most laborious and useful class of society? The brigades of engineers who had been spread up and down through the country, during the last year, had absorbed one million from the treasury; and yet there was an unwillingness to take off a few hundred thousand dollars, to relieve the poor and industrious agriculturists. The State of New York, where salt was produced in abundance from the Syracuse and other salt works, laid a heavy impost upon the article, equal to that which would remain upon the imported salt, after the reduction contemplated in this bill should take place. But Mr. S. had been informed that the article could be manufactured on the Kenawha, in Virginia, for five and a half cents per bushel, and, after having been transported hundreds of miles, might be afforded at twenty cents per bushel. This statement was sufficient to show that the manufacturers were able to make a small dividend with the consuming community. On other manufactured articles they had taken off the war duties: for instance, on foreign rum the duties had been greatly diminished. It was true, it might be urged that good rum was a good thing, and some of us, perhaps, are fond of it. It was, however, merely a luxury, and could well be dispensed with; and, what was far worse, it was considered, justly, as one of the greatest curses which could be invoked for the destruction of human happiness, and, indeed, he might say, human life. They might almost as well attempt to reduce, as had been intimated yesterday, the price of drunkenness to one cent, and of dead drunkenness to two cents—as was the case in England—as thus keep down the prices of ardent spirits; but they could not afford to take off a few cents on the price of salt, necessary to all classes, even to sustain existence; that it was so essential that it was used in greater abundance, by the poor than by the rich, he believed, could not be disputed. The rich man did not need it so much; he had other seasoning for his food. Spices and peppers entered into the composition of the savoury dishes which graced his table; and even Madeira wine found its way into the sauces in which his food was cooked. If, then, one-half of the duties on wines was to be taken off, they would cheapen the seasoning of the rich man's viands, and render it more accessible; while, by retaining the duty on salt, the only article of seasoning within the reach of the poor, would at the same time remain heavily burthened. Did gentlemen call this extending equal justice to all? He would make one remark on the subject of war duties, which he believed had escaped the gentleman from New Hampshire, and it was the only one that had escaped him. When, during the late war, the high duties were imposed on various articles, they were included in one bill, and salt was among them. The bill passed in the Senate, and was sent to the other House; and the only article which was stricken out by that body was salt, a duty on which, it was argued, was too oppressive and odious. Nor could it be reinstated in the bill without great exertions, nor until a pledge was given by the friends of the measure, that the tax on salt should be removed at the end of the war. The war had long passed away; but this oppressive tax still stood its ground. War, he would allow, if he might believe the statements and arguments of every day, was ahead of us: for he had scarcely heard a subject discussed during the session, in which money was touched upon, in which war had not been, in one way or another, alluded to. If a question was argued, in which the object was an expenditure of public money, it was said to be to prepare for war. Or if the design was to save the public money, then the object was, to provide funds against a war. But, he hoped, and believed, that war was far off; and he should, accordingly, vote for removing a war-duty. He hoped the one-half of the present tax would be taken off, even if appropriations for some other objects, in support of which Congress had been so bountiful, were curtailed.

Mr. VAN BUREN said he had no desire to prolong the discussion on the general merits of the measure under consideration. The subject had been placed on its true grounds, by his colleague, and those who had spoken on the same side with him. Mr. V. B. concurred fully in the views expressed by his colleague, and was unwilling to trespass on the patience of the Senate by a repetition of matters which had already been well and forcibly argued. His sole object, in rising, was to notice a remark that had fallen from the Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. SMITH,) in relation to a subject upon which Mr. V. B. acknowledged that he felt no inconsiderable degree of sensibility. He alluded to the duty, alleged to have been imposed, by New York, on salt, manufactured in that State. He might be mistaken, but he could not perceive what bearing that circumstance could properly have on the question before the Senate. As, however, he could not know that others would think as he did, he felt it his duty to call the attention of the Senate to a brief consideration of the motives and consequences of the act referred to. It was true, he said, that a duty, of the character described, and to the amount, he believed, of twelve and a half cents on the bushel, had been imposed, and was collected by the State of New York. It was one of the means employed by her, to make and complete those navigable communications between the great Western and Northern Lakes and the Atlantic Ocean, which had been accomplished by her unaided efforts—works, he said, which, however considered, must be regarded as national in their advantages, and which, if New York had been treated with the same liberality that has been extended to other States, would, in part, at least, have been made at the national expense. Such, however, had not been the case. She asked, but was refused! She knocked at your doors, but they were not opened to her. But, whilst she was applying her own shoulders to the wheel, others solicited you for help, and had been assisted by the dispensation of millions from the national treasury. Thrown upon her own resources, she was driven to the alternative of abandoning the great object in view, or of applying her utmost means to its accomplishment. Happily she chose the latter course, and the result has shown that she chose wisely. But, although her success has been signal, and the advantages resulting from it to herself and the Union immense, her brilliant anticipations have not been realized without the most onerous responsibilities. She has saddled herself with a State debt, nearly equal to one-seventh part of the whole national debt. To meet the interest, and for the ultimate redemption of the principal of that debt, the duty in question had been imposed. For the safety of the public creditors, it had been incorporated in her State Constitution. Until the specific objects, for which it was adopted, are effected, it must remain. Congress may, in its wisdom, diminish its value, but the State Legislature cannot abandon it, if even they were so inclined. But they are not. In its imposition, the State has only exercised its undoubted right, for its own, as well as the general good. She has no cause for regret, nor have others for complaint. What legitimate influence, this he begged to know, ought the circumstance to have upon the decision of the question before the Senate. Had the duty referred to worked an injury to those who used the imported salt? Had it raised the price of the article? Certainly not. If any effect was produced, it must be that of reduction, in consequence of the competition it produced. Had it operated injuriously on any other interest? If it had, he wished gentlemen who objected to it to point out what those interests were. He was entirely confident that none could be shown. But its claims to the favor of all just and liberal men stood on stronger grounds than its negative character. It is well known that the price of salt depends principally upon its transportation, which, from the nature of the article, makes it come very high to the consumer, in many parts of the country. He averred, and referred to the Senators from Vermont for the correctness of his statement, that, in that State, the price of salt, to the consumer, had been reduced more than fifty per cent. since the completion of the New York canals, and through their means. The same was the case with all the country bordering on Lake Champlain, or on Lake Erie, and the lakes farther West, including the State of Ohio; and the same effect, though not to as great an extent, was produced in many other parts of the Union. Such is now the case; but what will be the condition of things when the navigable communications which the State of Ohio has, to her high honor, undertaken to effect, by her own means, and which are rapidly progressing to the accomplishment, are completed? Why, the advantages now enjoyed, in this respect, by Vermont, will be common to most, if not all, the Western States. He put it, therefore, to the justice and candor of the Senate, whether the fact that New York had, for such purposes, and under such circumstances, imposed a duty upon salt, manufactured in that State, was just cause of complaint to others, or ought to have an adverse influence upon the question before the Senate. He asked, whether, after the Federal Government had refused her aid to New York, she ought now, by her Legislature, to cripple that State, in the means necessary to her redemption—means indispensable to the speedy payment of a debt, which should be regarded as sacred by the whole Union, on account of the great cause in which it had been incurred. He requested gentlemen to consider whether such a course would evince that just regard for the individual interests of the States composing the Confederacy, which it was the true policy of the Federal Government at all times to manifest. He humbly hoped that there could be but one answer to that question. So far from furnishing an argument in favor of the bill, if there is reason to apprehend that the means under consideration would have the tendency he deprecated, that of itself should constitute an objection to its adoption.

Mr. V. B. said, it gave him pleasure to know that there was no man to whom he could, with greater safety, make this appeal in behalf of the just rights of the State he represented, than the worthy Senator from South Carolina. The just and liberal sentiments which had, through life, distinguished the public course of that gentleman, was, with Mr. V. B., a sufficient guarantee that his appeal would, at least, meet with the most favorable consideration. Nor could he deceive himself in believing that the first and hasty impressions which this circumstance had produced, would, upon a moment's reflection, be removed, and the question decided on its own proper merits. He might, he said, enlarge upon the topics which had been already urged against the bill. But if the present greatly depressed state of the treasury, and the other weighty considerations already advanced, were not sufficient to deter gentlemen from further experiments upon the public revenue, nothing that he could say would produce that effect.

Mr. BRANCH observed, that it would be unjust to the people he represented should he not refer to the subject at present under consideration. The matter had already been ably treated, and he did not intend to enter at full into the arguments which suggested themselves to him. He felt grateful to the gentleman from New Hampshire for the highly satisfactory manner in which he had supported this bill. That gentleman had introduced this measure into the Senate last year; and it was the first, and, he might also say, the last attempt which had been made to effect any important object for the benefit of the agricultural class of society. But, sir, said Mr. B., the agriculturists do not generally want assistance; they know that legislation cannot be well applied to them, and that their true interest is to be let alone. They only need protection to prevent the other classes of community from thrusting their hands into their pockets, and depriving them of their hardly gained earnings. He supported this bill because he knew that its provisions merely extended justice to the class of society whom he had the honor to represent; but, even were it for their benefit, he would not support this, or any other bill, were it not founded on the immutable principles of justice. And why did the gentlemen from Maine and New York oppose it? Had they the balance of reason on their side? He certainly thought not. But it was for the interests of the people they represented; and their endeavors were to defend the great salt works of New York, and the fisheries of Maine, from any measure which seemed likely to injure them. The gentleman from New Hampshire, however, had completely broken down their reasoning. He had shown that it was an oppressive duty, commencing during the war, which had now a partial and oppressive effect upon the agricultural community. Why should the farmers be subjected to such a heavy tax on an article so necessary to them? He hoped this bill would pass, because its effect would be to keep the hands of others out of the pockets of the farmers, who, with less protection than was bestowed on any other class, did far more than any other for the general good of the body politic. It was now the piping time of peace, and reason and justice dictated that a burthensome tax, levied during war, should be removed. It had been shown that we had an exuberant treasury—perhaps less so now than usual—but ample for any national or beneficial purpose. Congress was lavish of the public money on every new project proposed, and surely the farmers received the least of it. Certainly, in this one instance, it behooved Congress to grant the people this privilege, and take off this heavy burthen. He could not add to the force of what the gentleman from New Hampshire had said; and he might detract from it; he should, therefore, simply remark, that he trusted the bill would pass, that the farmers, and even the dumb animals of creation, might no longer be restricted, by an odious taxation, from the free and unrestrained enjoyment of the bounties of nature.

The question was then taken on engrossing the bill for a third reading, and decided in the affirmative, by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bell, Benton, Berrien, Branch, Chandler, Cobb, Eaton, Edwards, Harrison, Hayne, King, Knight, Macon, Randolph, Reed, Rowan, Smith of Md., Smith of S. C., White, Willey, Williams, Woodbury—22.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barton, Boulogny, Chase, Clayton, Dickerson, Findlay, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnson of Ky., Johnston of Lou., Kane, Marks, Noble, Ridgely, Robbins, Ruggles, Sandford, Seymour, Thomas, Van Buren—20.

MONDAY, February 5.

The Duty on Salt.

The engrossed bill to repeal, in part, the duty on imported salt, was read the third time; and the question being stated on the passage of the bill—

Mr. RIDGELY said he did not think the present state of the revenue such as to make it proper for Congress to cut off any of its sources. Much had been said of the balance which would remain in the treasury after the payment of the expenses of the year and the sinking fund. But he was convinced that the amount of the balance which would be left at the disposal of Congress had been much overrated. He had examined the question with considerable attention, and he was confident that the balance, instead of being, as some had supposed, at the close of the year, four millions, would not be more than one million four or five hundred thousand dollars.

[Here Mr. Ridgely exhibited a detailed view of the finances, showing that there would be a deficiency of above $700,000 in the sum to be applied to the Sinking Fund.]

MR. RIDGELY said he would submit to the Senate whether any of our resources ought to be cut off under such circumstances. With him it was not now a question whether the reduction contemplated was one which, in a more favorable state of things, ought to be made. He directed his attention solely to the condition of the revenue, and in that he thought might be found the most conclusive reasoning against any reduction of duties, whether on salt or any other commodity.

MR. SMITH, of Md., said, he felt under obligation to the gentleman from Delaware for the correctness with which he had stated the condition of the revenue. He had explained the subject as it was. The gentleman had, also, stated what had not come before under the observation of Mr. SMITH, that there was a deficiency in the estimates of the current year of half a million. Mr. S. believed that statement was correct; and he thought it should have made part of the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to have informed Congress of the discrepancy by a special message, so that attention might have been bestowed upon it. It was much to the credit of the gentleman from Delaware that he had discovered the deficiency, and it was not much to the honor of himself [Mr. S.] that he should have overlooked it. From the statement he had seen, he now believed that deficiency existed. The Senate ought to feel obligated to the gentleman for the exposition. It would turn their attention to the state of our finances, and induce Congress to look to the means of the country before they engaged in lavish expenditures. This was not now done sufficiently: for all were too much addicted to voting away large sums, without sufficiently examining into the means at our disposal. It was on account of not doing so last year that they found themselves involved in their present difficulties. An estimate of the expenditure of the Government had been made formerly by Mr. Lowndes; and, by the reports laid before Congress this session, the expenditure last year exceeded the estimate no less than three millions. He [Mr. S.] thought it a salutary occurrence for the finances of the country to get occasionally into difficulty. It was the only state of things that could bring about retrenchment. It was so formerly, and it always would be so. He had never found Congress willing to reduce the expenditure of the Government until forced to by necessity. We find that, on a former occasion, the Government was pressed hard, and Congress was brought to the necessity of using strict economy. They did so, and what was the result? In less than three years the Treasury was overflowing. The worst of this—indeed the only evil effect arising from it—was, that every one seemed to think that it would always remain. So far had this opinion been entertained, that, even this year, they had heard an elaborate argument in favor of dividing the surplus revenue among the several States. If such a plan is feasible, surely Congress can afford to reduce the duty on salt, the amount of which is comparatively trifling. But, while he [Mr. S.] doubted the policy of the plan for dividing the surplus among the members of the Union, he was of opinion that it was in the power of Congress to reduce the duty on salt, because it was in their power to lessen other expenditures to meet that reduction, without incurring the censure of throwing away the public money, as they often did. He knew that the duty was imposed under circumstance that did not afford a sanction for its continuance even until this period. At the time that a salt tax was first levied, the country was in difficulty, we owed large debts, and were obliged to lay hold of every thing, even to pay the interest on the public debt. An impost was levied on salt, which was considered a war duty, and afterwards removed. When this impost was again laid on salt, during the last war, it was again understood to be merely a temporary measure. But, after the war, when the tariff of 1816 was adopted, the duty on every other imported article was decreased or removed, while this odious tax was retained. Had not the people great reason to complain of this partial and unfair arrangement? So far as the revenue was concerned, he thought the objection to the bill ought not to be sustained. But there were other points, besides that relating to the revenue, which had been brought to bear upon the measure. He would, therefore, leave the revenue where it was, and say a few words on the fisheries and manufactures. In respect to the fisheries, when this subject was formerly brought forward, and a bounty was first proposed to be given to the fisheries, Mr. Madison objected to the granting of a bounty, as not allowed by the constitution. Mr. Goodhue, of Massachusetts, then proposed the word allowance, observing that they cared very little about the word in case they obtained the thing. The bill was passed, and they did get the thing; and, from all reports, it appeared that great frauds were committed under this bounty law. The fishermen became, in some instances, smugglers, and, although they evaded the duty, received from the Collectors the bounty. The temptation of twenty cents on the bushel was too great for their morality. Thus injury was done both to the importer and to the revenue. If Congress removed this heavy duty so as to lessen the object of smuggling, it was altogether probable that, ultimately, instead of reducing the revenue, the measure would, by causing an increased importation, increase the revenue; at least that it would not be diminished. Certainly the consumption of the article for agricultural purposes would be vastly increased, so that, although the income from this article would be reduced nominally 300,000 dollars, it might fairly be calculated that no such reduction in the receipts on salt would take place. The grand question, however, seemed to be—Can we risk any reduction of the revenue? Can we spare the sum for a moment? To this he answered, yes; we can do it by saving and economy. We can afford to meet this reduction, by diminishing our expenditure in other respects. It had been said that this reduction would injure the manufactures. What! injure manufactures that have enjoyed for a long series of years the protection of an onerous war duty? Injure manufactures that have long since arrived at maturity, and, for their benefit, continue a burthensome tax upon the agricultural classes? Even before the imposition of this duty, they were without protection, and were prosperous. He thought it a great object of legislation to reduce the expenses of living, as it increased the encouragement to labor, and the prosperity and comfort of all ranks of citizens. The duties which had been laid on many of the comforts and necessities of life had much increased the expense of families—he thought he might say, at least, one-half. And, whenever any portion of those duties could be diminished, he was fully of opinion that the diminution ought to take place. He had been told that the price of the salt manufactured in the State of New York, was 25 cents; that it had a duty to pay of ten cents; and it had been said in the Senate, that, taking away the duty, would not reduce the price of the article. Although this was a doctrine which he never had heard before, and the philosophy of which he could not penetrate, he was willing to admit its truth: for, if it was a good theory, the reduction of the duty contemplated by this bill could not, by possibility, injure the manufacturers of salt throughout the country.

Mr. RUEGLES said, that he could not vote for the bill. It was agreed that there was a deficiency in the revenue, and that the state of the country required rather an increase than a reduction of its resources. The argument that this was a war tax, had not with him as great weight as with some other gentlemen; and he was somewhat perplexed to account, satisfactorily, for the manner of arguing made use of by the gentleman from Maryland. He began by assenting to the statements of the gentleman from Delaware, in relation to the alarming deficiency of the revenue, and concluded by arguing that this is a war tax, and ought to be removed. He acknowledged that the Government required all the income it now enjoyed, yet he wished to remove this portion of it. If the conclusions of the gentleman from Delaware were correct, to his mind it was clear that the reduction could not be afforded, and that it was impolitic to pass the bill at the present time. If, as had been argued, it was the duty of Congress to take off the duty on salt, still he thought it ought not to be done until the revenue of the country is placed in a condition to bear the reduction. Nor did he think it would be equitable to remove the protection now afforded to the manufacturers of salt, without giving them a little previous time to prepare for the change which it would produce. By suddenly removing the protection, those persons who had invested large capitals in this manufacture, and who had supposed the law upon this subject settled and permanent, would be seriously injured. Many of them would be inevitably ruined by the immediate operation of this bill. If the tax was reduced at all, he thought this was not the time for its reduction. He could not believe, with his colleague, that the people, or any considerable portion of them, would be benefited by the change. He had received information upon the subject, from Ohio, and that information convinced him that the bill would be very injurious to the people of that State. He knew of one company in which eighty thousand dollars were invested, and a great number of laborers employed, all of whom would be deprived of their occupation, and the capitalists forced to abandon, with great loss, the property invested. And if once destroyed, how could we expect, in case of a future war, to restore at once those manufactories which require years to perfect their establishment? The duty had been continued twelve years, and not an individual who engaged in the manufacture, ever dreamed that it was other than permanent. As to the scarcity of salt in Cincinnati, the reason was obvious. The river had been frozen, and it was impossible for the merchants to obtain their supplies. And while on this part of his colleague's statement, he would ask if the people of Ohio had ever petitioned for protection from the combinations, the effects of which are described as so oppressive? If they had not, there was no reason to believe that they were desirous of a change. The truth seemed to be, that this was a measure got up in the Senate, upon which the desires of the people had not been consulted or obtained. He thought that, before a law of the kind was passed, the wishes of the community ought to be consulted: and he doubted not their decision would have been, keep on the duty until the debts of the nation are paid. He should, therefore, vote against the bill.

Mr. VAN BUREN said, that in the present acknowledged condition of the revenue, it appeared improper to introduce any bill which would tend to lessen the income of the Treasury. The deficiency of the public funds was now reduced to a certainty. Congress began this year with the supposition that there were two and a half millions in the Treasury. He now understood that this was erroneous, and that, owing to an error, that amount must be reduced to one million four hundred thousand dollars, which, according to the computation of the gentleman from Delaware, was the sum remaining in the Treasury. And this sum was there by reason of the Secretary having omitted to pay the two millions reserved as a sinking fund. So that, if the Treasury had paid its obligations, it would have been minus seven hundred thousand dollars. The deficiency certainly occurred before the present Secretary came into office; but it was a want of faith on the part of the Government, in not paying the sinking fund, and the fourteen hundred thousand dollars was in the Treasury, because that fund had not been paid. He should, on the ground of the condition of the finances, oppose the bill with his vote.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, said, that he had no doubt the gentleman from New York was entirely mistaken. The gentleman from Delaware had, in his opinion, made a mistake of half a million. The amount of money in the Treasury was an imaginary sum, and much of the fund consisted of bonds. The sum to be reserved from the expenditure, for a sinking fund, was two millions. This could not be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury, who had no authority for doing so. The gentleman knew that the revenue had been, during the last year, defrauded of one million, which never happened before; and this would, in some measure, account for the present condition of the finances. The gentleman from Maryland seemed to think the expenditure of last year an unreasonable one, as he passed some general censure on the appropriations. Mr. J. thought, if the gentleman would turn his attention to those appropriations, he would find them all-essential. He then enumerated the prominent objects to which money had been appropriated by Congress last year, and concluded by observing, that it was an error to suppose that the extraordinary expenditure of the Government was greater last year than any previous year; as it was not so.

Mr. RIDGELY conceived that the gentleman from Louisiana was mistaken in the construction of the act in relation to the sinking fund.

Mr. JOHNSON replied, that he spoke of the act only as it was construed by the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund.

Mr. RIDGELY read the act. Of the surplus of money in the Treasury after the expenditure of the year, by the fourth section, two millions were to be reserved as a permanent sinking fund. It was admitted that there was now due to the Commissioners, on account of this fund, the sum of three millions. Here, then, was an engagement which the Treasury was not able to meet, and taking this fact alone, it did appear that the demands upon the Treasury could not be discharged.

Mr. CHANDLER said, that, although it might be uncommon that there were few or no petitions in favor of reduction of the duty on salt, yet, the duty on salt was a great and oppressive burthen to the agricultural interest. As to this argument against the bill, the Senate was every day in the habit of acting upon bills introduced on the motion of a member. He considered it of very little importance, as to the merits of the subject. It was known that this duty was a tax levied during the war, and to effect the purposes of a war. It was never intended that it should remain, when that state of things ceased. The sooner, therefore, it was taken off, the sooner justice would be done, which had long been delayed. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. RUEGLES] seemed to think that, if the tax was removed at all, it should have been immediately after the war; and that, now it had been suffered to remain so long, it would be a serious evil to remove it. But this was not good reasoning or just policy. That gentleman also objected that the people had not generally petitioned against the tax. But he did not seem to know the disposition of the farmers of the country. They were a peaceable class, quietly pursuing their laborious occupations, who believed that Congress would relieve them, and who knew that the object was in progress for that purpose. They, therefore, did not think it necessary to load the table with complaints of a burthen which they had long and patiently endured, and which they believed was generally understood. Mr. O. believed the duty ought to be removed—he had heard no argument of weight against the bill—and he knew no reason under Heaven why the duty should be retained, or Congress should refuse to relieve the only class of people who, in a time of peace, labored under the oppression of a war tax.

Mr. BRANCH said the gentleman from Ohio had remarked that this bill was the only offspring of the Agricultural Committee; and he had hoped that gentleman would have extended his accustomed urbanity to this only measure for the benefit of that neglected class, which had been brought before the Senate during this session. From this consideration alone—that the Agricultural Committee had importuned the Senate so little, this subject was entitled to attention. But it had other claims upon Congress. It had a claim founded in justice, and the equal rights of different classes of citizens. The gentlemen opposed to the bill, after attempting various grounds of argument, had settled down upon the revenue; and here they made their most desperate stand. The first position taken by them, was the injury imagined, which this bill would inflict upon the fisheries. The gentleman from New Hampshire had most effectually driven them from that ground. It was clear they were at fault in that point; and are they not as much in error here? How do all the statements which have been made this morning agree with those we have heard but within a short time? At the opening of the session we had an exuberant Treasury—we were then overflowing with wealth. But now, when we ask the removal of this partial and exorbitant impost, what is the answer? We are told, forsooth, that the Treasury is drained. We can appropriate money for every other object. But the scarcity is severely felt when any endeavor is made to ameliorate the condition of agriculture. We can appropriate our thousands for foreign objects, but it is difficult to obtain assistance for the laboring community at home.

The United States and Georgia.

[SENATE.]

Yes, from a principle of false philanthropy, the Government, last year, appropriated two or three hundred thousand dollars for the purchase of a frigate for the Greeks. It was done covertly, I admit—but it was done; and we then heard nothing of the poverty of the Treasury—nothing of economy—nothing of the danger of encroaching upon the money applied to the payment of the public debt. This course of expenditure had gone on from time to time, until the Salt bill was touched upon, and then the mine springs: then we are a wretched Bankrupt Nation, and cannot afford to reduce the paltry sum of three hundred thousand dollars of the duty on salt, for the benefit of the people, and, I may say, the whole people: for this is emphatically the people's bill. Now we have no funds to spare, and another step will ruin the country. I had not, said Mr. B., expected to meet with this want of liberality, especially after the report in favor of the bill, by the Committee of Finance. The only question was, whether we could dispense with this amount of revenue; for an opinion upon that point, the bill was referred to the Finance Committee; and the able chairman informs us that it can be done; that, by retrenchment in other useless expenditures, we can, at length, perform this act of justice to the most useful class of our community. Still, we are told that the country is bankrupt; and, even the friends of the Administration tell us so, in contradiction to the Message of the Chief Magistrate at the opening of the session, which informed us that our Treasury was overflowing. He hoped these inconsistencies would have no effect upon the Senate: but that, convinced of the justice of the measure proposed by the bill, it would be successful.

The bill was then passed, by the following vote, and sent to the other House for concurrence:

YEA.—Messrs. Bell, Benton, Berrien, Branch, Chambers, Chandler, Cobb, Eaton, Edwards, Harrison, Hayne, King, Knight, Macon, McKinley, Randolph, Reed, Rowan, Smith of Md., Smith of S. C., White, Willey, Williams, Woodbury—24.

The United States and Georgia.

The following Message was received from the President of the United States, by the hands of his private Secretary:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

WASHINGTON, 5th February, 1827.

I submit to the consideration of Congress, a letter from the Agent of the United States with the Creek Indians, who invoke the protection of the Government of the United States, in defence of the rights and territory secured to that nation by the treaty concluded at Washington, and ratified on the part of the United States, on the twenty-second of April last.

The complaint set forth in this letter, that Surveyors from Georgia have been employed in surveying lands within the Indian territory, as secured by that treaty, is authenticated by information officially received from other quarters, and there is reason to believe that one or more of the Surveyors have been arrested in their progress by the Indians. Their forbearance, and reliance upon the good faith of the United States, will, it is hoped, avert scenes of violence and blood, which there is otherwise too much cause to apprehend will result from these proceedings.

By the fifth section of the act of Congress, of the 30th of March, 1802, to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontiers, it is provided, that if any citizen of, or other person resident in, the United States, shall make a settlement on any lands belonging, or secured, or granted by treaty with the United States to any Indian tribe, or shall survey, or attempt to survey, such lands, or designate any of the boundaries by marking trees or otherwise, such offender shall forfeit a sum not exceeding one thousand dollars, and suffer imprisonment not exceeding twelve months. By the 16th and 17th sections of the same statute, two distinct processes are prescribed, by either or both of which, the above enactment may be carried into execution. By the first, it is declared to be lawful for the military force of the United States to apprehend every person found in the Indian country, over and beyond the boundary line between the United States and the Indian tribes, in violation of any of the provisions or regulations of the act, and immediately to convey them, in the nearest convenient and safe route, to the civil authority of the United States, in some one of the three next adjoining States or Districts, to be proceeded against in due course of law.

By the second, it is directed, that, if any person charged with a violation of any of the provisions or regulations of the act, shall be found within any of the United States, or either of their territorial districts, such offender may be there apprehended, and brought to trial in the same manner as if such crime or offence had been committed within such State or District; and that it shall be the duty of the military force of the United States, when called upon by the civil magistrates, or any proper officer, or other person duly authorized for that purpose, and having a lawful warrant, to aid and assist such magistrate, officer, or other person so authorized in arresting such offender, and committing him to safe custody for trial according to law.

The first of these processes is adapted to the arrest of the trespasser upon Indian territories, on the spot, and in the act of committing the offence. But, as it applies the action of the Government of the United States to places where the civil process of the law has no authorized course, it is committed entirely to the functions of the military force to arrest the person of the offender, and after bringing him within the reach of the jurisdiction of the Courts, there to deliver him into custody for trial. The second makes the violator of the law amenable only after his offence has been consummated, and when he has returned within the civil jurisdiction of the Union. This process, in the first instance, is merely of a civil character, but may, in like manner, be enforced, by calling in, if necessary, the aid of the military force.

Entertaining no doubt that, in the present case, the resort to either of these modes of process, or to both, was within the discretion of the Executive authority, and penetrated with the duty of maintaining the rights of the Indians, as secured both by the treaty and the law, I concluded, after full deliberation, to have recourse on this occasion, in the first instance, only to the civil process. Instructions have accordingly been given by the Secretary of War, to the Attorney and Marshal of the United States in the District of Georgia, to commence prosecutions against the Surveyors complained of as having violated the law, while orders have at the same time been forwarded to the Agent of the United States, at once to assure the Indians that their rights, founded upon the treaty and the law, are recognized by this Government, and will be faithfully protected, and earnestly to exhort them, by the forbearance of every act of hostility on their part, to preserve unimpaired that right to protection, secured to them by the sacred pledge of the good faith of this nation. Copies of these instructions and orders are herewith transmitted to Congress.

In abstaining, at this stage of the proceedings, from the application of any military force, I have been governed by considerations, which will, I trust, meet the concurrence of the Legislature. Among them, one of paramount importance has been, that these surveys have been attempted, and partly effected, under color of legal authority from the State of Georgia. That the Surveyors are therefore not to be viewed in the light of individual and solitary transgressors, but as the Agents of a sovereign State, acting in obedience to authority which they believed to be binding upon them. Intimations had been given that, should they meet with interruption, they would, at all hazards, be sustained by the military force of the State, in which event, if the military force of the Union should have been employed to enforce its violated law, a conflict must have ensued, which would, in itself, have inflicted a wound upon the Union, and have presented the aspect of one of these confederated States at war with the rest. Anxious, above all, to avert this state of things, yet, at the same time, impressed with the deepest conviction of my own duty, to take care that the laws shall be executed, and the faith of the nation preserved, I have used, of the means entrusted to the Executive for that purpose, only those which, without resorting to military force, may vindicate the sanctity of the law, by the ordinary agency of the Judicial tribunals.

It ought not, however, to be disguised, that the act of the Legislature of Georgia, under the constructions given to it by the Governor of that State, and the surveys made, or attempted, by his authority, beyond the boundary secured by the treaty of Washington, of April last, to the Creek Indians, are in direct violation of the Supreme Law of this land, set forth in a Treaty, which has received all the sanctions provided by the constitution, which we have been sworn to support and maintain.

Happily distributed as the sovereign powers of the people of this Union have been, between their General and State Governments, their history has already too often presented collisions between these divided authorities, with regard to the extent of their respective powers. No instance, however, has hitherto occurred, in which this collision has been urged into a conflict of actual force. No other case is known to have happened, in which the application of military force by the Government of the Union has been prescribed for the enforcement of a law, the violation of which has, within any single State, been prescribed by a legislative act of the State. In the present instance, it is my duty to say, that, if the Legislative and Executive Authorities of the State of Georgia should persevere in acts of encroachment upon the territories secured by a solemn Treaty to the Indians, and the laws of the Union remain unaltered, a superadded obligation, even higher than that of human authority, will compel the Executive of the United States to enforce the laws, and fulfil the duties of the nation, by all the force committed for that purpose to his charge. That the arm of military force will be resorted to only in the event of the failure of all other expedients provided by the laws, a pledge has been given, by the forbearance to employ it at this time. It is submitted to the wisdom of Congress to determine, whether any further act of legislation may be necessary or expedient to meet the emergency which these transactions may produce.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

The Message having been read—

Mr. BENTON moved the reference of the Message to the Judiciary Committee. At first he had thought it a fit subject for a reference to the Committee on Indian Affairs; but he did not now think so, as there were questions involved in the Message in relation to the enforcement of laws and treaties, which required an investigation of the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. BERRIEN said: I agree with the Senator from Missouri, that this Message, and the accompanying documents, ought not to be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, because they involve questions very much beyond the limits of those which are ordinarily and appropriately assigned to that committee. I disagree with him in the opinion that they constitute a proper subject of reference to the Judiciary Committee; and so perfect is my reliance on the correctness of his judgment, when he shall have directed his attention to the various subjects of this Message, that I shall not hesitate to propose a different reference, in the confidence that he will, on further reflection, concur with me in the view which I have taken of it, and will therefore withdraw his motion.

Sir, the President of the United States, in the Message now before us, has called us to the consideration of various questions, in their nature grave, important, and delicate.

He has told you that certain officers of the State of Georgia, acting within the limits of that State, and under the authority of its laws, have violated, according to his construction of it, an act of the Congress of the United States. He has told you that, according to his construction of that act, he is authorized to arrest these officers thus engaged in the execution of their duty, under the laws of the State, and within its limits, and to bring them to trial before the judicial tribunals of the United States, or, at his direction, to employ the military forces of the Union, the army of the United States, by the bayonets of its regular soldiery, to coerce the State of Georgia, through these officers, to submit to his construction of this act, and his opinion as to the rights of that State. He has told you that he has already directed the arrest and trial of these officers, as offenders against the laws of the United States; and before any decision of yours can operate, this mandate will no doubt have been carried into effect, so far as it relates to the arrest of the supposed offenders. He submits to you the inquiry, whether any act of legislation be necessary on the part of the Congress of the United States; and accompanies this inquiry with the declaration of his determination, under a sense of higher obligations than any which Congress can impose, if in his view it shall become necessary, to call out the military force of the United States to carry this act of Congress into effect, according to his understanding of its meaning and intent.

Sir, I repeat the declaration. The questions presented by this Message are grave, important, and delicate. They cannot be arranged under the head of the duties, appropriately and peculiarly assigned to any one of the standing committees of this House.

Admitting, as in deference to the authority by which they are asserted, we are bound to do, for the mere purpose of this inquiry, that the facts stated are true, the first question presented is this :

Does the case stated fall under the provisions of the act of Congress referred to in the Message? Abstractedly considered, as a mere question of statutory construction, I agree that this is a fit subject for inquiry by the Judiciary Committee. But another question immediately supervenes. The President, in the same Message, tells you that he has already taken measures to submit this question to the decision of the Judicial tribunals of the United States. With a knowledge of this fact, is it proper for us to give our sanction to the use of the military force of the Union, during the pendency of this Judicial investigation? I apprehend this inquiry transcends the limits of the duties assigned to the Judiciary Committee. It would belong more appropriately to a committee on the state of the Republic, if such a committee existed.

Excluding the idea of the actual pendency of a judicial inquiry, which has been instituted under the orders of the President of the United States himself, another question presents itself, which, in my view, equally transcends the limits of the duties which appropriately belong to the Judiciary Committee. I state it thus :

Is the resort to military force, before Judicial inquiry is had, an appropriate mode of determining the rights of one of the sovereign States of this Confederacy? The question, sir, is now comparatively unimportant. The feeling of indignation, of abhorrence, which such a measure would excite, would be so strong, so universal, that, happily for us, no man in the times in which we live, would dare to resort to it. Or, if he had the audacity to do so, he would bring down upon himself the merited execrations of the whole American people. But we are establishing, so far as may depend upon us, principles which may affect the future destinies of this Republic; and our experience has taught us, how promptly precedents are resorted to, to sustain assumptions of power.

Another question, alike grave, presents itself to our consideration, and it is equally beyond the limits of the duties of any of the standing committees of this House.

If the line of conduct which the State and its officers are bound to pursue, is prescribed by law—if the United States has a right to judicial inquiry, as to the effect and operation of that law, on the case stated in the Message, Has not the State of Georgia an equal right to such judicial inquiry? Where is the evidence that she shuns it? If she meets the investigation which the President tells you he has directed to be instituted, are her officers to have a fair and an impartial trial—the privilege which is allowed to the veriest culprit—or are they to encounter it under the previous denunciation of the President and Congress of the United States, with the army to back them?

It is another subject of grave and interesting inquiry, which every lover of peace, every friend of the Union, will delight to pursue, whether some other mode may not be devised, by which this difficulty may be adjusted, without arraying a sovereign State of this Union against the Confederacy, either in the forum or the field. If, happily, such a measure can be devised, all will agree that it ought to be resorted to; and yet the questions necessary to its determination are beyond the sphere of the duties of any standing committee of this House.

There is yet a remaining question, full of importance to every member of this Confederacy. The President of the United States has announced to us his construction of an Act of Congress, and has alleged the violation of that Act, by the officers of the State of Georgia, acting within her limits, and under the authority of her laws. He has declared his resolution to carry that Act into effect, according to the construction which he has given to it, by the use, if it shall become necessary, of all the means at his disposal. He has distinctly announced to us his determination, as an ultimate resort, to avail himself of the military arm of the Union.

On a question of contested right, between the United States and the State of Georgia, which is already in a train of judicial investigation before the tribunals of the Union, under his immediate orders, the President of the United States considers himself authorized and bound, under a sense of higher obligations than any which you can impose, to send the army of the United States into the limits of the State of Georgia, to coerce her submission to his will—to his interpretation of the laws of the United States. Sir, if such an exercise of power may find the color of justification, under existing laws, does it not become us, as the guardians of the rights of the States, by some clear and explicit act of legislation, to take from such an exercise of prerogative the shadow of pretence? I submit, then, to the Senator from Missouri, and to this House, the question, whether this Message, thus involving an inquiry materially affecting the rights of the States and of the Union, and the powers and the duties of the President of the United States, ought to be referred to any of the ordinary standing committees of this House? And, believing, as I do, that a committee specially constituted for the purpose of this inquiry, will most effectually accomplish the objects which every one should desire to attain, the ascertainment of truth, the administration of justice, and the preservation of the constitutional rights of the States, and of the Union, I move that the Message of the President of the United States, and the accompanying documents, be referred to a select committee.

Mr. HOLMES said, that it seemed that part of the Message, in reality, belonged to the Judiciary Committee; that another part belonged to the Committee on Indian Affairs; and that another portion fairly belonged to the Military Committee. There was another portion of this Message, which illustrated an opinion which Mr. H. had long entertained. He had, for a long time, considered that there was a deficiency in the standing committees, and that another ought to be added to those which already existed in the Senate. A committee to decide upon all questions between the States and the United States, would, he thought, be a valuable addition; and it would very properly receive the name of the Committee of the States. He would only say, that he was sorry any collision should take place between the Federal Government and any of the State Governments; and a question of such a nature ought rather to be referred to a select than a standing committee.

Mr. BENTON observed, that, on the first hearing of the Message, he had thought the Judiciary Committee a proper reference; but, on further consideration of the various questions involved in that document, he was disposed to agree with the gentleman from Georgia, that the proper course would be to refer it to a select committee. He would, therefore, withdraw the motion he had made.

Some further conversation took place; when the motion of Mr. HARRISON, to lay the Message on the table, was negatived—18 to 26.

The question on the motion of Mr. BERRIEN to refer it to a select committee of five, was then put, and carried.

[The following additional documents on this subject were communicated by the President of the United States, on a subsequent day, and referred to the same committee.

WASHINGTON, 8th Feb., 1827.

I communicate to Congress copies of a letter from the Governor of the State of Georgia, received since my Message of the 5th instant, and of enclosures received with it, further confirmative of the facts stated in that Message.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, GEORGIA,

Milledgeville, 27th January, 1827.

SIR: As the officers of Georgia, engaged in the execution of their duties near to its western boundary, by order of the Legislative and Executive authority of the State, have suffered frequent interruption from the Indians of the Creek nation, accompanied by indignities and insults sufficiently aggravated, and are still threatened with others of more violent and outrageous character; and, as there is reason to believe that your Agent of Indian Affairs is the prime mover and instigator of the same, I have deemed it proper to lay before you the enclosed papers in support of that belief, and to ask the favor of you to inform me if that officer is so acting by your authority, or with your sanction and countenance. It may be thought painful enough that the United States, whose undoubted right it is, shall enter into controversy with Georgia on the validity of treaties, and the lawfulness of boundaries, trespasses committed on the one side, or right of sovereignty violated on the other, with the remedial or redressive measures demanded by either.

It is not to be presumed that the President would transfer the sovereign attributes to a subaltern agent, much less that he would delegate them for the annoyance of the people of Georgia, for insult to their public functionaries, for invasion of their Territorial rights, and, finally, for bloodshed.

If these powers have been insolently assumed by such subaltern, for such purposes, it is not for the Governor of Georgia to dictate to the President the measures which ought to follow, as well in vindication of the honor of the United States, as in reparation of the wrongs done to Georgia. The President is competent to judge them, and the Governor doubts not his willingness to judge them rightly.

With great consideration and respect,

G. M. TROUP.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

11TH DISTRICT, CARROL COUNTY,

January 22d, 1827.

SIR: I did flatter myself that I should have been able to complete my survey without troubling you, or being troubled by the Indians, but in this I have been deceived. Eight or ten lusty fellows rode up to my camp last night, with a letter, written by Crowell, and signed by several Chiefs, and ordered me to desist from surveying the line on the west side of the new treaty line. Mr. Rogers, who surveys the ninth district, and who will be the bearer of this, was broken up by them yesterday. You will know best what measures to pursue in regard to the affair, but if the survey proceeds, a protection must be afforded us, and that must be sufficient to protect the whole frontier line, from the intersection of the Cherokee line with the State line, to Miller's Bend. There is about one-fourth of my district that lies west of Bright's line, and I yesterday completed my meridian lines through it. I shall, to-day, commence my traverse lines, but, after mature reflection, I cannot feel myself safe in crossing Bright's line at present, but shall proceed to survey that part which lies East of the line, and when I am done, I shall make the attempt to survey the balance. I hope by that time, however, a sufficient protection will be afforded. Mr. Rogers can better inform you than I can by writing.

Yours, respectfully,

WILLY WILLIAMS.

CREEK NATION, Jan. 12, 1827.

To the Surveyors, running the land West of the line of the late Treaty :

GENTLEMEN:—We, the undersigned Chiefs and Head-men of the Creek nation, having learnt, with great regret, that you are engaged in surveying the lands West of the line of the late treaty, and which was not ceded by that treaty, we have again to request and demand of you, in the most friendly terms, that you will desist from stretching a chain over any of our lands, not ceded by the said treaty; we flattered ourselves, and we had a right to believe, the stipulations of that treaty would have been friendly observed by all parties concerned, and that our former differences with our neighbors, the Georgians, would have been finally settled, and that we would, in future, live in the strictest friendship in all our intercourse. We are determined, on our part, not to do an act that can be calculated to give offence, but are right, and we hope they will be respected. We are your friends.

Signed by Little Prince, Oakfusky Yoholo, Sparner Tustnugg Hargo, Easticharoo Chopco, Wigas Horge, Coche Hodgo, Charehus Micue.

Copy of a letter from James A. Rogers, District Surveyor, to Governor Troup, January 23, 1827.

HIS EXCELLENCY, GOVERNOR TROUP:

SIR: Enclosed you will find a copy of an instrument of writing, which was handed to me by a parcel of Indians, on the 21st instant; and, after I read the letter, they demanded of me my compass, which I had to surrender to them, but after a few minutes, they agreed to give me back my compass, and would come with me over the new Treaty line, which they did, and threatened me very severe if I should be caught over Bright's line again, a surveying. I have come on to McIntosh's old place, and have stopt my hands until I hear from you. If you intend to give me assistance, I hope you will take the earliest measure to get it to me, as provision is scarce, and my hands uneasy to go home. As to the number of men it will take to guard me, I am unable to say—my situation is this: There is three settlements of Indians in my District that have in them about ten men; and in two miles, on the Alabama side, there is a large town that I am told have from forty to fifty warriors in it, which is to be placed on the new treaty line as spies, and prevent the land from being surveyed; and, as for further information, I will refer you to Major Panamora, the bearer of this express, and who was with me when the Indians stopt me.

Yours, &c.,

JAMES A. ROGERS, D. S.

Geo. M. TROUP, Governor of Georgia.

WEDNESDAY, February 7.

The Colonization Society.

Mr. CHAMBERS presented the memorial of the Colonization Society, stating the object of the society, and its progress, and praying that Congress should extend to them such assistance as it may, in its wisdom, think proper. Mr. O. moved its reference to a Special Committee. The memorial was read.

Mr. HAYNE said he seized the very moment when this question was, for the first time, presented to the Senate, to enter his protest against the right of the Federal Government to appropriate the money of the people for the purpose of establishing colonies abroad, or of transporting, at the public expense, any portion of the inhabitants of this country to the coast of Africa, or elsewhere. At the very threshold, he denied the constitutional power of the Government so to act; and if they had the power, he should still deny the policy, justice, and humanity, of such proceeding. The petition of the Colonization Society, which had been just read, calls upon this House to do two things, neither of which could be done, without an entire departure from the fundamental principles and settled policy of this country. They propose,—

1st. That the United States shall appropriate money to transport to the coast of Africa free persons of color, "and such others as the humanity of individuals and the laws of the United States may hereafter liberate." And,

2d. That the United States should take into their own hands, and under their own government and protection, the colony which this society has established on the coast of Africa.

With regard to the first object, (said Mr. H.,) I submit that it only relates to a subject with which the Federal Government can have nothing to do, but which it will be extremely dangerous for them to meddle with. It is not for me to admonish this House of the impolicy, injustice, and danger, of touching a subject with which the feelings and interests of a large portion of the Union are so closely connected. On this topic, however, (on which I always touch with extreme reluctance,) I should not now enlarge. I must be permitted to say, however, that, of all the extravagant schemes that have yet been devised in this country, I know of none more wild, impracticable, or mischievous, than this of colonization; and should a fair occasion ever present itself I shall make good this assertion. Avoiding, however, that unpleasant topic, I will bring the attention of the Senate to the great political question presented by this petition—that of establishing Colonies abroad; and I will ask the Senate if a question of graver character, or of greater magnitude, could possibly be submitted to their consideration? And I will put it to them to say, whether they are now prepared even to entertain such a question? I do not know to what part of the history of the world we are to look for arguments in favor of the colonial system. Colonies, we had been taught by the experience of other countries, and especially of England, had been, at all times, the fruitful source of wars, of injustice, and of oppression. They were a curse not only to the colonies themselves, but also to the mother country. If, then, the colonial policy had been fatal to other nations, what argument could possibly be urged in favor of its adoption, at this time, by us, whose habits, institutions, and fundamental principles, oppose an almost insuperable bar to all foreign connections and alliances whatever? But when it is proposed that we should not only depart from these habits and principles, but that we should establish a colony of rude and untutored people on the other side of the Atlantic, and on the continent of Africa, the proposition needs but to be stated, to make its extravagance apparent. Even this, however, is not the view of the subject which I feel disposed, at this time, to press on the consideration of the Senate. I will show, from the official documents before us, that, whether it be the object of the Colonization Society or not, the effect of their engaging the assistance of the United States at this time, in behalf of their ill-advised and ill-fated colony, must be to engage this country in a war with the native tribes on that continent, and to involve us in serious difficulties with other nations. It is, perhaps, not generally known, but I have the evidence of the fact now before me, that the agents of this Colonization Society, on the coast of Africa, instead of being employed in peaceful pursuits, are engaged in warlike enterprises; that the colony has been organized into military corps; and that, under their gallant leader, the Reverend Dr. Ashmun, they have made war upon the Spaniards and the French, as well as on the natives; that they have, with force and arms, invaded and broken up several establishments, have made numerous captives, and, in short, are proceeding, as all such colonies always will proceed, with a high hand, to extend their influence and power by the sword. In proof of these assertions, I beg leave to turn the attention of the Senate to the documents transmitted to Congress by the Navy Department, during the present session. In these documents, will be found a correspondence between Dr. Ashmun, the agent of the Colonization Society, (and Superintendent of their colony at Monrovia,) and the Secretary of the Navy, from which I will now read a few passages. In a letter from Dr. Ashmun to the Secretary of the Navy, dated Cape Mesurado, Oct. 14, 1825, he states, in substance, that the Spanish schooner Clarida, owned by several merchants of Havana, and regularly documented, had arrived in Liberia Bay, in July, for the purpose of obtaining slaves to be delivered at a town to the northward, belonging to a man named Yellow Will, and "subject to the jurisdiction of King Bristol"—that an English brig, the Tom Cod, also arrived in October, and the Spanish schooner having lost her anchor, her crew went on board of the English brig, and forcibly took away an anchor and other articles; in consequence of which unlawful acts, he (Dr. Ashmun) having received the testimony of six individuals, determined to capture the Spanish vessel, and obtained of Captain Potter, (the English Captain,) the use of his brig for that purpose. Dr. Ashmun then proceeds to give the following account of the expedition:

"The military of this colony is organized into a corps of Independent Infantry, consisting of thirty-six young men, and a corps of Artillerists, consisting of forty-eight. From the former I made a requisition of twenty-five men, to act under Captain James C. Barbour, their commander, and their other officers. Twenty-two Artillerists, under Capt. F. James, the commanding officer of their corps, at my request, volunteered to attend me on board the Tom Cod. I then gave Captain Barbour written instructions to proceed the same evening with his force, taking two days' provisions, to the mouth of the St. Paul's; sending one division by the Stockton, in boats, and conducting the other along the beach, encamp at the place of rendezvous till daylight on the eighth, and then advance by the beach upon Digby, awaiting further orders, which I was to send him from the brig. But, should the brig, by any accident, fall into the hands of the pirates, or pursue her out to sea, he was to seize upon the factory at Yellow Will's, and make the best of his way back with the prisoners, slaves, and property, captured in it. In this young officer's prudence and intrepidity, and in the exact discipline and firmness of his men, I knew I could entirely confide. With the twenty-two volunteers under Capt. James, I went on board the Tom Cod at 4 o'clock, taking along two carriage guns, and a suitable provision of ammunition, belonging to the agency. Of these brave fellows, eight had, on two former occasions, fought at my side for nearly three hours, in our bloody conflicts with the natives; and I knew they would all follow wherever it might be necessary for me to lead them. Their number was greater than the crew of the Spaniard by six men, and our weight of metal considerably superior; so that there is little doubt had we fallen in with the pirate, that she must have been taken. But it was not our lot to engage him. During the night I had brought the brig to the windward of Digby, upon which we bore down, under the American flag, at daylight on the morning of the eighth, ready for action. The morning was thick, and it was not until half-past one o'clock that I was able to ascertain the absence of the Clarida; whom, I afterwards learned, had not communicated with the shore, nor been seen from Digby, since the robbery of the brig. Captain Barbour's division having now arrived, I landed with five men, through the surf, ordering the brig to lie off and on, till she should receive a signal to return to Mesurado; and, at a few minutes past nine, entered Yellow Will's town; but found the factory abandoned, and the slaves and nearly all the property gone. I soon learned that the whole had been conveyed across Poor River, a broad and deep stream, which has its course parallel with this part of the coast, and at only two miles distance from it. Messengers were immediately despatched to King Bristol and Will, conveying my friendly assurances; but insisting on the immediate delivery of the Spaniards, and all the slaves and property belonging to the factory into my hands. In reply, I was openly informed, that both refused to comply with the demand, but assured secretly, by one of the head men, that the King was willing to see me seize upon the concern, provided the business could be so managed as to save the appearance of treachery to their customers, on the part of himself and his people. I perceived the force and intention of this hint at once, and took my measures accordingly. After a personal interview with Bristol and Will, I returned, and, with twelve men, crossing the Poor River in a small canoe, which could carry but four men at a time, soon obtained possession of the Spaniards, at a town situated a short distance from that in which the wreck of the factory was concealed. In the mean time, I had perfectly informed myself of the exact state of the concern at that time. Two of the four Spaniards left ashore were ill. Goods of the value of ninety slaves had been already advanced to the country dealers, on which only fourteen had yet been received at the factory. Goods equal in value to about six hundred dollars only, remained in the factory on the morning of the eighth, when, in the confusion caused by the alarm at daylight, nearly the whole had fallen into the hands of the country people; who, under the color of assisting the Spaniards to secure their goods, had carried them off. But the fourteen slaves had been preserved. None of the four Spaniards now in my custody were on board the Clarida at the time of her committing the piracy on the fifth, nor had communicated with her since that act, and there was not even presumptive proof that the character of the vessel was piratical, by the laws of Spain, previous to the perpetration of the robbery of that date. The slaves and all the property remaining, were surrendered into my hands by the mate, Zugaste, at three o'clock, on the ninth, and the four Spaniards discharged from custody, on the grounds just stated. A part of the goods, as per the accompanying statement, amounting to forty-three dollars, was restored to the mate, for the purpose of subsisting himself and his companions, till an opportunity should offer to take passage for some other part of the world. After several other deductions for expense, as per the same statement, the residue, amounting to ninety-one dollars and fifty cents, was equally divided between the captors and the United States. A quantity of spars, belonging to the schooner, found at Will's place, were burnt, and the rice collected at the factory, which could not be conveniently brought off, was distributed among the natives."

The Colonization Society.

Thus ends the bulletin of the first expedition of the Rev. Dr. Ashmun, which resulted, as we have seen, in the invasion of the territory of King Bristol, the forcible possession of Yellow Will's town for forty-eight hours; the capture of five Spaniards, and all the slaves and property belonging to their factory; the destruction of a quantity of spars belonging to the schooner, and of the rice collected at the factory, without any other object, except to punish a Spanish vessel, and to prevent her from carrying on a trade sanctioned by the laws of Spain.

The next military expedition is related in Dr. Ashmun's letter to the Secretary of the Navy, dated Cape Mesurado, October 25th, 1826, in which he states, in substance, that, having received information that certain slaves, destined for the Spanish schooner, were secreted at a French factory, on the St. Paul's, he undertook a military expedition against that place, which he entered in the night, and the next morning took six prisoners. This bulletin concluded in the following triumphant style:

"The whole party returning, arrived at Monrovia, in safety, after a most fatiguing expedition of twenty-five hours; in which all except myself and a guard of seven men only, including the boatmen, had, without sleep, performed a forced march of thirty-five miles, through a pathless country, of which one-half was traversed in the depth of night, and the other under the full power of an African sun. It gives me pleasure to add, that such a cheerful zeal in the cause of African emancipation animates this little corps, that not a murmur of impatience was, during the whole time, heard in the ranks. So inured are the men to the climate of their adopted country, that not an individual has suffered in his health from the extreme exposure and fatigue of the expedition; and, in such handsome military style was the affair conducted, that the very inhabitants of the country through which the route of the party lay, were scarcely apprised of the movement, before its termination, in the return of the people to their homes."

It has been said of certain animals, that, when they have once tasted of blood, they will be satisfied with no other food. And thus it was with the reverend and gallant leader of the colony of Monrovia. His appetite once whetted with what he calls, "his bloody conflicts of nearly three hours with the natives," and his "zeal once excited in the cause of African emancipation," he appears restless and dissatisfied when not engaged in martial enterprises.

The Bulletin of the next expedition, is dated Cape Mesurado, Dec. 8, 1825, and relates the particulars of the capture and destruction of a French Slave Factory, on the St. Paul's, five miles (direct distance) from the Cape. The occasion of this expedition is stated to be that "five of the men liberated at Digby, impelled by an innate love of country, had absented from the establishment,"—and it seems had been taken up and detained at this French factory. As the letter is short, I will read the whole of it.

"U. S. AGENCY FOR RECAPTURED AFRICANS,
"Cape Mesurado, Dec. 8th, 1825.

"SIR: I have the honor to state that another unforeseen occurrence has placed at my disposal the large additional number of ninety-nine Africans, whom I caused to be released from their irons this morning at eight o'clock; and whom I judge to be proper objects of the beneficent provision made by the Government of the United States for persons liberated from illegal bondage, under the laws for suppressing the slave trade. On the fourth of November, four of the men liberated at Digby on the ninth of the preceding month, impelled by that innate love of country, which none of the vicissitudes of life can extinguish in the human bosom, deserted from the establishment, passed the Mesurado River, and disappeared in the boundless woody region which extends to an unknown distance in the interior. Knowing that if not speedily brought back, they must inevitably terminate their desperate enterprise in hopeless slavery, I had recourse, without delay, to every means for their recovery which promised to succeed, but to no purpose. Intelligence of their desertion, with the offer of a reward for their restoration, was immediately conveyed to the different tribes in friendly correspondence with the settlement, but no information was had of the fugitives, before the fifth instant, when I received, from a source entitled to credit, intelligence that three of their number had been reduced to slavery and loaded with chains at the French Slave Factory, on the St. Paul's, five miles (direct distance) from the Cape. On the morning of the sixth, I despatched three men to demand the deserters in the name of the United States; and to inquire by what means they had fallen into the hands of the factors. The demand was evasively replied to, but, in answer to the inquiry, it was stated that two Frenchmen, agents resident at the Factory, had bought them. I then instructed the messengers charged with the order, to repeat it; they did so, but with no other effect than to draw from the two factors a written declaration of their purpose to detain the people indefinitely. Finding the recovery of the men by mere rational methods too doubtful to justify any further delay, which, as a French schooner was lying near, ready to receive slaves, might subject them to be transported in a very few hours forever beyond the reach of the Government of the United States, and obliged to regard the ground taken by the Factory as that of virtual defiance, which justified, from a growing concern, founded in avarice and iniquity, the apprehension of eventual consequences fatal to the benevolent objects of this Agency, I had no hesitation in resolving upon the unpleasant duty of forcibly subverting the establishment altogether. Captain James C. Barbour, of the Infantry, with eighteen men, was accordingly charged, last night at nine o'clock, with the accomplishment of this service. Two boats were provided, in which this little force embarked at two o'clock this morning. Ascending the Stockton, they arrived on the St. Paul's at daybreak; twenty minutes afterwards the men were landed at the Factory. In ten minutes the slaves, to the number of forty-three men, thirteen women, and forty-three children of both sexes, (in all ninety-nine,) were in the custody of the officer, and in full march along the beach for Monrovia. The boats received the invalids and feeblest of the children, and stood along shore at musket shot distance abreast of the party advancing by land. The whole arrived safely at Monrovia, at eight o'clock the same morning, just six hours after the setting out of the party, and eleven only after the first intimation given to the officer who so handsomely conducted it, that its services would be required. Of these people, ninety-seven are in perfect health, two only in a feeble condition, caused apparently by rigorous treatment. Respectfully, &c.

J. ASHMUN.

"P. S. In the number of persons rescued are included the three deserters.

"The Hon. SAMUEL L. SOUTHARD, Secretary U. S. Navy, Washington City, U. S."

Before I leave these letters, I must notice one or two other points. Dr. Ashmun states, in his letter of 28th October, 1825, that he regarded himself as undoubtedly possessed of the right "to control the purchase of the eighty slaves destined for the Clarida," and that he had contracted for as many as should be delivered to him, at ten dollars per head, which sum he considers himself entitled to receive for the United States, together with a bounty of fifty dollars for each of them. In his letter of 22d January, 1826, he states that the number of slaves captured in three expeditions, were 130. "They have nearly completed," says he, "a village, &c. Every individual of their number is in perfect health, and, as an assemblage of rude and ignorant people, gathered out of nearly twenty different tribes, pursue their labor with a good deal of spirit, union, and success."

A little further on, he adds: "But at present it would be the height of imprudence to suffer them to want the constant guardianship of their superintendents. Several have already been driven, by their fears, to attempt, and a few have, it is thought, effected their escape," &c., &c.

In Dr. Ashmun's letter of 11th December, 1825, he states "that the French factors, whose establishment at St. Paul's was broken up, have announced their intention to appeal to their Government for redress."

Now, from these documents, Mr. President, it is manifest that the colony at Monrovia, under Dr. Ashmun, have made war upon the Spaniards, the French, and the natives—and it is absolutely certain, that a perseverance in such a course of conduct, must inevitably lead to the destruction of the colony, unless the strong arm of the United States shall be interposed to rescue them from the natural consequences of their rashness and folly. It is expressly declared by Dr. Ashmun, that "he has in view the introduction of a measure, on the part of the United States, for which he believes the time has arrived, and of which the object shall be entirely to abolish the slave trade, with the concurrence of the native authorities along a given line of coast, contiguous to the agency;" and his proceedings are doubtless intended to prepare the way for "that measure." The prisoners taken and put to labor under "superintendents," (or, as we should call them, overseers,) are, doubtless, found to be very convenient helps in a colony so much in want of physical strength, and productive labor. No doubt they are treated as kindly as such "a rude and ignorant people" ought to be; but so little gratitude have they to "their deliverers," that they are only prevented from "effecting their escape," by the "constant guardianship of their superintendents."

Let it not be said, sir, that the Colonization Society are not justly chargeable with these unwarrantable proceedings on the part of their agent. They have sanctioned, and approved of them. It is true, sir, (and I am sorry to be obliged to say so,) that Dr. Ashmun is also the agent of the United States, under the act of 3d March, 1819, for transporting captured Africans from the United States to their own country—an act which never authorized the slightest connection with any colony in Africa, but which, most unwarrantably, has been so used. Of Dr. Ashmun's conduct, however, our Government has formally disapproved. The Secretary of the Navy, in his letter of 10th August, 1826, written for the purpose of being communicated to Dr. Ashmun, says:

"Should it appear, hereafter, that some of the recaptured Africans have been taken to Trade town, confined, and were about to be sold again into slavery, and that Mr. Ashmun went no farther than was found necessary to rescue them, his conduct, as the agent of the Government, will not be condemned. So far as he has acted for the Colonization Society, in recapturing the Colonists, he will look to that society, both to explain his conduct, and be justified or condemned by it. The same remark is applicable to the previous expeditions. So far as he acted as the agent of the society, the Government does not mean to interfere with his responsibility to it. But the President thinks it necessary to disapprove of his conduct in those expeditions, so far as he has any connection with the Government. As agent of the United States, for a specified object, he had no justifiable cause to break up establishments supposed to belong to the owners of the Florida, or any other persons, and to take the people found there to the Agency, to be maintained at the public expense. Our Government, in establishing the Agency, had one object, only, in view—to provide a place to which Africans, illegally brought into the United States, or lawfully captured by our cruisers upon the ocean, might be carried, and taken care of, until they could, with propriety, be restored to their own country, tribe, or nation. It has not intended to authorize, nor has it authorized, a forcible and warlike attack upon the citizens or subjects of any nation, with a view to suppress the slave trade, or to accomplish any other object, no matter how desirable, to advance the cause of humanity. You will, therefore, furnish to Mr. Ashmun a copy of this letter, that he may see the light in which his conduct is viewed by the Government. He has made a claim for the bounty allowed by the third and fourth sections of the act of 3d March, 1819; but it cannot be granted. The case of Africans liberated from their captors on the shores of Africa, does not come within the provisions of that act. It is understood, from his several letters, that about 170 Africans were liberated, in his various expeditions, and brought into the Agency, and are now on expense there. The accounts for their support to this time, will perhaps be paid; but they must cease to be a charge to the Government, and restored to their tribes as speedily as possible, or supported in some other mode. The fund devoted to this object is now much reduced, and, unless increased by Congress, will not bear a continuance of the burden. Should captures be made during the year, recourse must be had to another appropriation, to enable the Department to comply with the law. For the same reason, the reward of ten dollars, offered by him for each negro delivered, is not approved. It was not prudent, nor authorized by his instructions from the Government."

I will not stop to comment on the nice distinction here taken, which adopts for the Government all the lawful acts of Dr. Ashmun, and throws all the rest on the Colonization Society.

But, I must remark, that the society seems very willing to take all these on themselves: for, at the celebrated meeting, at which this very petition had its birth, the thanks of the society were unanimously given to Dr. Ashmun, for the "faithfulness, zeal, and ability, with which he has fulfilled his duties as agent of the society;" and that, too, with a full knowledge of all the facts which I have noticed.

And now the question arises, is it proper for the Senate even to refer to a committee, or to entertain, for a moment, this petition, embracing objects so important and so questionable, and coming here at a period, and under circumstances, which forbid a calm and deliberate examination of the subject? For my own part, I confess the claims set up in the petition are such, that I should at no time be willing even to consider them. The mere statement of them is enough for me. But, if gentlemen think otherwise—if they should think that the proposition of applying the national funds to transporting colored people abroad, and the establishment of a colony in Africa, is worthy of consideration, still I would submit, that they ought not to be received and considered at this time. The session has nearly passed away—but two weeks more remain. This subject cannot be finally acted on. And why, therefore, should we embarrass ourselves, create needless excitement, and waste the precious time of this House, on an odious and most unprofitable subject? I hope, sir, the petition will be laid on the table, and I shall make you that motion as soon as gentlemen, who may desire to explain their views, shall have been heard.

Mr. CHANDLER inquired by whom the memorial was signed: and, on examination, it was found that no signature was attached to it.

Mr. KING said he believed it was a rule of the Senate, that a member must present a memorial or petition as his own, or it must be signed by the petitioner or memorialist. Therefore, if the gentleman from Maryland did not assume it, he did not see how the Senate could act upon it, as it was not possible to determine whence it came, not being signed.

Mr. CHAMBERS was not disposed to assume the memorial as his own; still, he considered that, as it was entitled the memorial of the Colonization Society, and that society being well known, he thought it sufficiently plain whence the document came. In answer to the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. C. could give assurance, that this actually was the memorial of the Colonization Society.

Mr. BERRIEN said, the objections extended a little further. It was the petition of a body of persons who had really no legal existence. If it had been the petition of an individual, and the member presenting it could verify his handwriting: or, if the individuals forming that society had placed their names to this memorial, the Senate might act upon it. But the petition of no body, without a legal existence, could be sustained before the Senate.

Mr. CHAMBERS answered the objections of the gentleman from Georgia. He thought that no rule of the Senate ought to exclude any citizen, or body of citizens, from presenting their wishes to the Senate, unless that rule was exerted for some useful purpose. The rule was made to preserve the Senate from deception, and to guard against entertaining petitions from fictitious applicants. But it was sufficient if the petition was vouched for, and the style in which it was worded was unexceptionable.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, in commenting on the memorial, observed, that it was before the Senate without any solid form. It was a mere name, and no person was designated by it, to whom an appropriation might be given, should Congress see fit to make it. It was the duty of Congress to know who to refer to, and who was responsible: but as, in this matter, no one was known, and as privileges or donations could not be granted to a mere name, he thought the Senate could not act upon the memorial. In continuance, he gave a slight glance at the history of the origin and the progress of the society, and alluded to the proceedings at the late meeting in the Representatives Hall, at which, he remarked, it had been stated that the object of the society was, to transport, annually, to Africa, 6,000 free blacks, which, it was said, would cost 1,040,000 dollars; and this was to be given, although, but a few days since, they could hardly afford to reduce a few hundred thousand dollars on the Salt tax. But he saw another object in all this, which must be connected with the colonization of the free blacks, and which he did not wish to touch upon. The free blacks, he thought, would be better where they were, than to send them to Africa, and he was opposed to the scheme. There was more designed by this application, than appeared on the face of it. It was an entering wedge, which he should oppose. He, therefore, moved that the memorial be laid on the table.

The Chair then observed, that it would refer the Senate to a rule by which discussion was prohibited on a question to be decided by the Chair. It ought to have been mentioned before. The decision of the Chair was, that no petition could be acted upon, unless signed, or written in the presence of the member, or unless the handwriting was avowed by the member presenting it. Such was the rule in Jefferson's manual.

Mr. CHAMBERS said he could not take it upon himself to aver it; and (after some further conversation on the subject,)

The papers were, for the present, withdrawn.

Payment for Slaves deported by the British during the late War.

On motion of Mr. BERRIEN, the bill to provide for the settlement of claims under the first article of the Treaty of Ghent, was taken up, and having been read a second time, its objects and details were briefly explained by Mr. BERRIEN.

Mr. CHANDLER inquired what was the object of the provision in the 10th section, in relation to the investment of the fund in four per cent. stock.

Mr. HOLMES observed that, as it would be a considerable period before the sum would be paid to the claimants, it was considered desirous that the money should not lie unproductive.

Mr. CHAMBERS observed that the benefit would be derived by the claimants, who would receive their claims with interest.

Mr. KING objected to the power given to the Secretary of the Treasury, to invest the money in stock, as, when the claimants came, and demanded their respective amounts, where would the money be? It would be invested: and would they be satisfied to receive stock? The stock might at that time be depreciated; and, if they took it, instead of being gainers, they might lose by the investment. He was fearful that the money of the claimants would be swallowed up by the complicated means of transacting the business. He should prefer the simple process to all this machinery; and he was afraid that three Commissioners, with salaries of three thousand dollars, and a Secretary and Clerk, would rather impede than advance the interests of the claimants.

Mr. HOLMES said he had objected, like the gentleman from Alabama, to the Board of Commissioners. But that gentleman proposed no other method; and how then should they come at any improved mode? The money must be distributed, and it was necessary that somebody should be charged with that duty. The claimants themselves could not do it; and it was plain that somebody must be appointed. It had been proposed in the committee, to appoint but one Commissioner; but the question arose, whether the claimants would be satisfied with the decisions of one Commissioner; it was thought that they would not, and it was deemed better to appoint three, to serve for two years. It was now pretty well ascertained that the duties of the Commission would last about two years; and the question is, whether the money due these claimants, and now in the Bank of the United States, shall lie idle, or shall be employed in a productive manner; whether the United States shall take the money, and pay the claimants four per cent. for the use of it, or shall invest it in four per cent. stock? Of course, if the claimants are not hereafter willing to take the stock, the United States will pay them the money. It will not force them to take depreciated stock.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, had no idea of making the United States the parties in a petty stock operation. The bill was to give the claimants power to come to the Treasury and claim their dividends, and four per cent. upon them. Why was the Government to be involved in this trouble? It was never done to mercantile claimants, who never received the interest on their claims. The Government did not want to take this money as a loan; why, then, was this provision made, and why was it proposed to make a very difficult matter of one that was clear in itself? To remove this difficulty, he would move to strike out the last section of the bill.

Mr. SLASKE thought, if the United States wanted the money, it would be perfectly proper to retain it in the Treasury, and pay an interest on it of four per cent.; but, should the Secretary of the Treasury invest the money in stock, and, when called for, that stock should be at a discount, would it not be productive of much difficulty and discontent?

Mr. BERRIEN said, that the gentleman who made the motion was mistaken. He had probably not read the bill. He seemed to suppose that the bill enforced upon the United States the alternative of either taking the money, and giving four per cent. interest, or of investing it in four per cent. stock. But it was not so. On the contrary, it left to the Secretary of the Treasury the choice of doing the one or the other, or neither, as he should see fit. Did the United States want the money? Then take it, and pay the four per cent. If they did not want it, then invest it in some stock that shall yield four per cent., and let the claimants have the benefit of it. The only object of this provision was, to make, if possible, some exertion of the powers of Congress for the benefit of these claimants, and, if possible, to the advantage of the United States. Why should the discretionary power be taken from the bill in which it was inserted for the benefit of the claimants, who had been long enough deprived of their property, and ought to be given every advantage possible? He would repeat, that it was not obligatory upon the United States to follow either of the courses pointed out. When the last section of this bill was framed, he (Mr. B.) was desirous to ensure this little boon to the claimants, in addition to the share they would receive on the division of the fund allotted for their payment. If the Senate approve of it, he should be gratified.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, thought the 10th section ought to be stricken out. The United States did not want to loan the money; part of it had been already paid, and he had understood that the United States had commuted with the United States Bank for eleven per cent. Why should this be? Why not let the Commissioners give the interest and profit on this sum due the claimants to them? Why should not the Commissioners give to each claimant a draft on each branch bank of the State in which he resides, for the principal and interest in full, from the time the money was placed in the hands of the United States? The gentleman from Georgia had stated that the provision was not imperative; and that the course to be taken was discretionary. But, he believed, that, if the provision was retained the claimants would receive their shares in stocks, and whether it was depreciated or not, was a chance which they would risk. Some immediate application ought to be made, as the claimants had lain out of their money ten years, and it seemed to him high time they should receive their money.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, commented at some length on this motion, observing that two plans had suggested themselves to the committee that reported this bill. One was to deposit the money in the Treasury, and employ it as well as possible, and the other, to invest it in some productive stock. A large sum of this money having already been paid to this Government by the British Minister, it was thought, as some time would elapse before it reached the claimants, in the mean time it had better be invested. For his own part, he had considered that a portion of the money paid over now, would be more acceptable than a delay until the whole of the claims should have been investigated. As the whole amount of the claims were about 1,500,000 dollars, and as 1,200,000 had been received, there could be no risk in paying 75 per cent. on the claims immediately; or, to put it lower, he thought even sixty per cent. in hand would be more satisfactory than to wait the final decision of the Commissioners. The whole of the claim was, as he had said, one million and a half; and, if the interest were computed, it would be about two millions and a half. But the claimants would be well satisfied with their principal. There were many difficulties in the way of this settlement. It would be very difficult to decide upon the number of slaves carried away; it would also be for the Commissioners to fix on what sort of evidence would be, in their view, satisfactory. This would cause a long period to elapse before the whole could be decided upon; and he had ascertained that, in the mean time, a part of the sum would be acceptable to the claimants.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, inquired what the difference would be, whether the dollars were paid here, or in England?

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said that, if the dollars were obtained here, they would be worth 100 cents; while, in England, their value was 110 cents.

Mr. WHITE did not like the alternative in the 10th section. The course ought to be fixed on by Congress. Every officer of the Government should have, in all payments of money entrusted to him, some specific directions. They ought to know now whether this sum was for the use of the United States, or whether held in trust. If the money was laid out in stock would the claimants take it? If it was to be considered the money of the United States, then let them take it, and pay the claims with four per cent. interest, when the certificates were presented. If it was to be invested in stock, the section ought to provide for the sale of this stock. As to the Bank of the United States, he thought the Government and the bank two distinct things. Suppose the bank had made a purchase of bills of exchange—whether from our Government or the British Minister, the bank had the benefit of it; it was a bank operation, and interested the United States no farther than as stockholders in the institution. If the Government made any thing he should entirely agree with the gentleman from South Carolina, that it ought to be paid to the claimants: but it was not so. He thought that the project of paying 70 per cent. was not practicable. It could not be done until the claims were all ascertained, as, until then, it was impossible to decide how much each one should receive. The definitive list did not, he believed, comprise all the claims. When they were fully decided upon, all the claimants would come forward and receive their proportions of the dividend. How much it would be, was uncertain; it might be 50, and it might be 100 per cent.; and, if it should pay the whole principal, and 20 per cent. interest, so much the better. He found no fault with the bill; if he had been disposed to recommend any thing, it would be that the old commissioner, who was well acquainted with all the details of the subject, and could, in a shorter time, settle the questions which would arise in this investigation of these claims, than persons unacquainted with them, should be re-appointed. He was very willing that the claimants should receive an interest on their money; but he did not approve of leaving the disposal of the money to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. TAZEWELL said, that the motion to strike out the tenth section did not stand alone. There was another motion, which, although not now before the Senate, had been touched upon, and was, therefore, open to comment. He meant the proposition to pay 75 per cent. of the claims. What were the facts? The Government of Great Britain having acknowledged itself indebted, not to the Government, but to the citizens of the United States, the Government assumes the character of a receiver for those citizens. In discharge of the obligation, Great Britain had already paid a certain sum, and, no doubt, would pay more. It belongs to the United States to provide some method for paying this money, in just proportion, to the claimants. This bill was to provide for that distribution. He thought it encumbered with too much machinery, which he would notice hereafter. It was supposed that the claims could not all be settled until by the end of next Congress; and, meanwhile, it was proposed that the money should be invested. During that period, the United States would have this large sum of money in the Treasury, in which they have no direct interest; and, really, it could not be doubted that justice would dictate its being applied so as to produce a profit to the claimants. This was the course pointed out in courts of justice in every part of the world, and was founded on principles of justice, that, where money was in the hands of the court, and it was ascertained who was the rightful owner, it should not be kept unproductive, but should be so applied as was best for the interest of the person who should finally be decided to be its owner. The principle, then, was plain, and the question was, how should it be applied? Could it be employed by the United States? He believed there was no doubt that it could; there was, he believed, three millions of the public debt due; and why not pay it? Why not apply this money for our own purposes, and then pay to the claimants the interest for its use? Or, why not lay it out for stock of the Bank of the United States, and redeem it at six per cent.? Thus, the Government would make two per cent., and four per cent. would be made for the claimants. Indeed, he thought the interest to be paid them might be put higher. The Government were borrowing money at five per cent.; and, it seemed to him, that it would be peculiarly hard if they could allow but four per cent. on this money, which might be looked upon as a kind of forced loan. But, it had been said, that it would be beneficial to the claimants, to give them sixty per cent. on their claims, at once. He should be willing to agree to this, if he thought so: but, it appeared to him, that it would be rather injurious than beneficial, if it was at all practicable. It certainly appeared to him that this would be productive of partiality, and consequent discontent. The payment of the claims would then be according to chance, or, perhaps, the caprice of the Commissioners. The claims would not come in at the same time; as they were presented, they would be docketed; and why should one be paid his claim eighteen months before the other, merely because, by chance, it was on the first part of the docket? Besides, Mr T. thought, with the gentleman from Tennessee, that it was entirely uncertain what the amount to be paid might be; and, it might happen, after all the claims were presented, that the claimants would not be entitled to more than thirty per cent. And, suppose one claimant were to apply at an early period, and obtain his seventy-five per cent., while, afterwards, it should turn out that they had paid him more than his share, how could it be forced from him? He would argue that he had a vested right in the money which they had paid him, under an act of Congress, and that he neither could, nor would, refund the money. The gentleman from Louisiana had said, that the amount was ascertained; and that a certain portion could safely be paid now. But it was not so. He knew that $1,500,000 made the whole of the definitive list; but, in the bill, as well as in the treaties, there was a provision for claims not included in that list. He did not know what their amount would be: it might be large, and it might be small; but it certainly was not safe to put them out of view, in paying, summarily, a portion of the fund to those claimants now known. A great many questions, of serious import, would require settlement by the Board of Commissioners, before a single certificate could be issued. These reasons induced him to oppose the motion to strike out the tenth section; and, as to the payment of seventy-five per cent., he could easily see that it would be of great advantage to those who would be paid first; and, as easily, that it would be great injustice to the other claimants.

Mr. HOLMES said, that the case, to him, appeared a very clear one. The section did not enjoin it as a duty upon the Secretary of the Treasury to invest the money in four per cent. stocks, but left it to the discretion of that officer, either so to invest it, or, if the United States retained it, the Government were to pay the 4 per cent. As the gentleman from Virginia had said, it was an established usage, where money was held in trust by public authorities, to apply it in such a manner as to yield an interest to the owner. Why, then, should it not be done? It was of no importance, and not worth disputing about, that the United States received a profit, so that the claimants received the four per cent.

Mr. TAZEWELL said, that when the Convention had been appointed by the Emperor Alexander, a definitive list was to be presented. But many bona fide claimants were not, through error, or some other reason, included in the list; and the Government of Great Britain would not include in the treaty any person not named in that list. One of these cases was that of a gentleman of New Orleans. The treaty lately made, did, however, make provision for those not included in the list. Thus it was highly improper to make any disposition of this matter, until the Commissioners had decided on the full amount of the claims.

After a few observations from Messrs CHAMBERS, and SMITH, of Maryland, the question on striking out the tenth section, was taken, and negatived—16 to 21.

Mr. TAZEWELL moved to strike out the word three, and to insert in its stead the word one; providing for the appointment of one Commissioner, instead of three.

Mr. T. said that he did not see the necessity of all the machinery that had been attached to the bill. The difficulties attending the object to be effected by it were only increased, as a multiplication of screws and pulleys always increased the friction of the machinery, and consequently lessened the power of the machine. He did not conceive that three men were necessary to settle what had been mainly settled already. And they would delay very essentially the final adjustment. It was his opinion that the American Commissioner employed to settle the claims thus far—who had examined them, and must be more or less acquainted with the nature of each one, would be the most fit person to perform this duty, and would do it to the more perfect satisfaction of the parties interested, and of the Government. If this proposition was agreed to, he should follow it up by proposing to strike out the other unnecessary wheels and pulleys, which now clogged the operation of the bill. In one word, he had no desire to appoint, in any case, a greater number of officers to perform a duty, than were necessary. When large salaries were paid, he thought at least economy might be used in the number of officers to be appointed. By adopting his amendment, and dispensing with two Commissioners, with salaries of three thousand dollars, six thousand dollars would be saved, and he thought the services would be as well, if not better performed.

Mr. WHITE thought, if the American Commissioner was appointed, the whole subject would be satisfactorily arranged. It had been said by the member from Georgia, that delay was the price that must be paid for justice; to a certain extent, he agreed that it was so; but he was of opinion that three Commissioners, instead of one, would be of so little advantage, as not to outweigh the consideration of the additional expense. As to appeals to Congress in case of dissatisfaction, it did not appear probable that it would be at all increased or diminished in one case or the other. Whether three Commissioners or one was appointed, persons who did not succeed in obtaining their demands, would appeal to Congress. It was always the case. There was never a Commission from which disappointed claimants did not appeal. It was, however, objected, that the appointment of one Commissioner, in this case, would not give the claimant the same privileges as were enjoyed by citizens in other cases. But he need only remind the Senate that one man had had, in certain cases, the keeping and disposition of the enormous sums entrusted to the United States Courts, in nine States, and decided on all high criminal cases without appeal. He thought the trust in this case no more dangerous than in others, and he was disposed, therefore, to fall in with the motion. He believed the principles on which the adjudications were to be made, were established in times past, and that there would be no great difficulty, except in the hearing of testimony. He should make no proposition; but would merely inquire whether, in the case of the appointment of three Commissioners, two could not act, if there should be no necessity for the services of the third. He thought, however, that one would be competent to do all that would be required.

The question on Mr. TAZEWELL's amendment was then taken, and decided in the affirmative, 19 to 13.

Mr. TAZEWELL then moved the further amendment of the bill, by striking out the word Secretary, so that the appointments should be confined to one Commissioner and one clerk. He observed, he did not see the necessity of such an officer; and he was sure, if one was appointed, the clerk would be obliged to do all the business.

The motion was then put, and carried, and the bill was ordered to a third reading.

THURSDAY, February 8.

Claims for Deported Slaves.

The bill to provide for the adjustment of claims of persons entitled to indemnification under the first article of the treaty of Ghent, &c., was read the third time.

Mr. HARRISON said that, when the bill was first introduced, it made provision for the appointment of three Commissioners. An amendment was however adopted, yesterday, which reduced the number to one; and, as the duty and responsibility must be much greater, he thought it but justice that the compensation should be increased, also. No doubt could be entertained that the duties would be much enhanced by the alteration. It had also been intimated that the appointment was likely to fall on a gentleman who stood high in his country's honor and confidence. And he would ask whether the Senate would enjoin on that individual to accept this office with a small compensation? for delicacy might prevent him from declining it, on account of the narrowness of the salary. He then moved to recommit the bill to the Judiciary Committee, with instructions to make the compensation four, instead of three thousand dollars per annum.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, sustained the motion; and made some explanations as to the claims mentioned yesterday, not included in the definitive list, but alluded to in the treaty, which he also moved to submit to the committee.

Mr. TAZEWELL said, that his recollection corresponded with the explanation made by the Senator from Louisiana. The definitive list proper was the list containing all the claims, nor were those which were omitted by mistake when the list was made out, by any means to be excluded. He had no objection to recommit the bill on this ground. He was also in favor of raising the salary of the Commissioner; and had no objection, since the office of Secretary had been stricken from the bill, to increase the salary of the clerk, whose labor would be greater. He also thought the 10th section might be submitted to the attention of the committee, to be altered should they see fit. On all these grounds he should be in favor of having the bill recommitted generally.

Mr. HARRISON then varied his motion, and moved a general re-commitment of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, suggested, that an additional clerk, to copy the papers of the claimants, would be found absolutely necessary.

The Senate then adopted the motion to recommit.

FRIDAY, February 9.

The Colonization Society.

Mr. CHAMBERS presented the memorial of the Colonization Society, for aid in its objects, and moved its reference to a Select Committee.

Mr. C. said, when he had, two days since, offered this memorial, a question of order, made by the Senator from Alabama, (Mr. KING,) had prevented him from having opportunity to say one word in answer to the remarks which were made by both the gentlemen from South Carolina. The question of order was now at rest—the demand of the rule, as announced by the President, having been gratified by the signature of the distinguished individual who presided over the society; and he had now availed himself of the first moment to bring the subject again to the notice of the Senate. He had not, he said, anticipated discussion at this incipient stage of the proceeding, and he believed the assertion might be safely made, that, on no other occasion when he had been in the Senate, had there been an attempt to discuss the merits of an appeal to this body on the presentation of a memorial. He could not perceive the reasons for a deviation from the usual course, or why the friends of the measure were not permitted to present to the Senate the facts connected with it, before they were called upon to answer to charges; but the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. HAYNE) had the right to select, and had selected, his own course; and it was now his duty, Mr. C. said, to vindicate the objects of the society, and to enforce their claims upon the attention and patronage of Congress. He claimed the liberty of correcting, at the outset, the error into which both the Senators from South Carolina had been betrayed, when they charged upon the society ulterior views, inimical to the Southern or slaveholding States, and hostile to the tenure by which citizens of those States held their property. The society indulged no such views—he felt authorized, in the name of its members, to disclaim them. If such purposes had been entertained, the society could not have selected an agent less willing than himself to effect them. He was willing to go as far as any man in the doctrine of the exclusive rights of the slaveholding States upon this subject, and in denying the power of Congress to touch their rights to this property coercively. Upon this subject, the official declarations of the society announced invariably, and on all occasions, the same doctrines which he had avowed. There might be, and it was not his wish to be understood to deny there were, individuals who were governed by different considerations, who did look to ulterior objects, and who had a false and erroneous view of the motives and purposes of the society. It would be matter of infinite surprise if such persons were not to be found; and where, or when, he would ask, had a great question been agitated until it excited the feelings and enlisted the partialities of one large mass of the community, and the prejudices of another, without producing precisely the same result? For the mistaken opinions of such individuals, if such there were, he did not hold the society responsible. But for themselves, acting by their accredited agents, in official documents and on all occasions when a formal exposure of their objects had been proper, they had been prompt and explicit in their avowal. In this memorial, "the constitutional and legitimate existence of slavery is admitted," and the averment distinctly made, "that the Government of the Union has never been looked to as the proper or authorized instrument for effecting its removal." These are not declarations made to suit the occasion—they are consistent with all their official and acknowledged professions and acts. The true and undisguised objects of the society, as distinctly announced in this memorial, is "the removal, to the coast of Africa, with their own consent, of such people of color, within the United States, as are already free, and of such others as the humanity of individuals, and the laws of the different States, may hereafter liberate;" and with the conviction that this object cannot fail to be considered of deep and general interest, they present their history and their situation to your notice, invoke your aid, and submit to your wisdom the suggestion and application of the means necessary to accomplish it.

The gentleman from South Carolina, on his left, (Mr. HAYNE,) had denounced this as a visionary and chimerical project. He (Mr. C.) had indulged the hope that the exalted character and distinguished intelligence of the individuals who had been connected with the society, would have restrained the gentleman from this sweeping denunciation. He need not mention to that gentleman, or to the Senate, the names of these individuals—they were high in the confidence of the nation; men who had acquired fame in every department of the Government; who had graced your senates, your courts, your pulpits, as well as those who, in private life, had invited and deserved the respect and esteem of all who knew them. Amongst these, he would say, were very many whose education, habits of thinking, and interests, would make them of all men least likely to promote an object which would loosen the bonds by which the citizens of the South held their property. If the names of illustrious individuals could not rescue the society from the reproach of the Senator from South Carolina, he would remind that gentleman of the countenance it had received from nine or ten of the States of this Union; and if nothing could avert the determined purpose of the Senator from South Carolina, he was willing to be ranked amongst the visionary men who had been fascinated by this chimera.

The Senator from South Carolina had arraigned the conduct of the agent of the society, Dr. Ashmun, and had referred to the documents from the Navy Department for proof. It was not the time or the occasion to go into the merits of these transactions; but he must be allowed to say, the whole affair had been placed in the most glowing colors by the gentleman's fancy and his wit. The plain narrative would not, he thought, place the conduct of Dr. Ashmun in a view so censurable or so ridiculous as it had been represented. Dr. Ashmun was the agent of the Government, as also the agent of the society. The act of 3d March, 1819, had authorized the Government to take care of, and return to their country, such Africans as were unlawfully imported or captured in vessels engaged in the slave trade. In virtue of that law, an agency had been established at Liberia. In his person, Dr. Ashmun united the various offices of civil and Military Governor of the colony, and agent under the Government for the safe keeping of captured Africans. As the responsible head of the colony, it was his duty to use all the measures necessary for its protection against all, whose acts were likely to endanger its existence, its peace, or its prosperity, whether they were the neighboring native tribes, or piratical visitors, or others. The first act of imputed misconduct was, the destruction of a Spanish factory at Digby. The facts are, that a Spanish slave ship had fired upon, boarded, taken possession of, and removed from her moorings, an English brig, a well-known trader, engaged in lawful commerce at Cape Mesurado, and then at anchor in the Roads, and finally plundered the brig of her anchor, and a variety of articles from her cabin and deck; the robbery was clearly, according to the strictest rules of law, an act of piracy. Complaint being made to Dr. Ashmun, he selected a force from his two military companies, and the Spanish schooner having escaped, he pursued the property which the pirates were known to have in a factory on the shore, and, having possessed himself of the property, destroyed the factory.

The second transaction, alluded to by the gentleman, (Mr. HAYNE,) was the destruction of the French factory on the St. Paul's. Four of the natives who had been found at Digby, and brought into the colony, had left the establishment, and found their way into the immense woody region, extending into the interior of the country, with every prospect of either perishing, or becoming victims to the avarice of the slave dealers. After the lapse of a month of fruitless effort to discover them, Dr. Ashmun learned they were loaded with chains in this French factory, and held as slaves. They were demanded once and again, and the answer to the demand was a written declaration that they should not be delivered up. A French schooner was lying near, prepared to receive slaves. In this emergency, Dr. Ashmun despatched two boats, with an armed force, ascended the Stockton River, broke up the factory, and brought off the slaves confined in it, to the number of forty-three men, thirteen women, and forty-three children. This factory, it should be recollected, was within the territorial limits and jurisdiction of the colony.

The last transaction which has been the subject of animadversion, was the destruction of Trade Town; the particulars of which are furnished by Captain Chase, late commander of a Colombian armed schooner, who is said to be a highly honorable man. He states that the inhabitants of the town had seduced about thirty free blacks from the colony, and had sold them to Spanish and French slave traders; that these seduced colonists were frequently demanded by Dr. Ashmun, with a threat to use force, if necessary; that the threats were not only disregarded, but the depredations on the colony were continued; that these facts being made known to Captain Chase and to Captain Cothell, commanding a Colombian brig of war, they consented to assist Mr. Ashmun, in an expedition to the town. As they approached the shore, they were fired at from the French and Spanish factories, although the Colonial flag was hoisted in Mr. Ashmun's boat. The landing was effected, and the factories were taken possession of. Mr. Ashmun addressed a note to the head man of the tribe, informing him that his object was to regain his colonists, promising a cessation of all hostilities, if they were peaceably surrendered, and threatening destruction to his town if they should be withheld. The delivery of the colonists and a number of natives, held as slaves, was promised by the head man, but delay was used in completing his engagement, until an armed force of not less than two or three thousand men were collected, who were not finally subdued until the armed vessels were brought to bear, and fired several broadsides. The town was then destroyed. This is the history of the facts, which, with the decorations contributed by the fancy and wit of the gentleman, have been held up to the Senate as a spectacle fit not only to be gravely censured, but to be ridiculed. It had been denied that Dr. Ashmun could find warrant for these proceedings, in any power derived to him as agent for the Government. Mr. C. said he did not contend for any other authority on the part of Dr. Ashmun, as the agent of the Government, than that admitted by the Secretary of the Navy. If the recaptured Africans, delivered at his agency, were taken from him, and about to be sold into slavery, he could promptly use the means necessary to rescue them. Mr. Ashmun, however, had other and higher powers than those conferred on him by the Government. As the civil and military head of the community, he owed protection to the lawful commerce of all who visited his colony. As the protector of the colony, he was bound to use the means in his control to rescue its citizens when taken captive, and to secure them against the dangers to be apprehended from lawless and piratical aggressors. Mr. Ashmun defends himself on these grounds, and appeals for his vindication to the broad principles of the laws of nature and of nations, which confer the right of self-defence upon individuals and upon communities. He was alone, unaided by wise counsels, and surrounded by lawless pirates, capable of any outrage. When the total destruction of his colony and the loss of life, certainly perpetual bondage, was the inevitable result to his subjects of an unfavorable issue to the hazard, perhaps a very nice and exact calculation of chances ought not to be expected. At a distance from the scene, and in retrospect, Mr. C. said he did think the danger had been magnified, and that the means of prevention applied, were not fully justified; but he should do injustice to Dr. Ashmun, did he not acquit that gentleman from all intentional error. He thought it probable there were very few men, however intelligent and discreet, who, with the same causes for excitement, and under the same circumstances, would have avoided the same error; and he certainly believed him to have been influenced by the best and purest motives, and so did the society, when, at their last annual meeting, they passed the vote of approbation which had been spoken of. The remarks he had just made, were in reference to the destruction of the factory at Digby, and the seizure of the slaves confined there. He did not think that proceeding absolutely necessary, and he believed he was authorized in saying such was the opinion of the society, when this specific subject had been before them, and Mr. Ashmun had been so informed by the managers of the society.

The destruction of the factory on the St. Paul's, established immediately in the vicinity of the capital of the colony, and on its acknowledged territory, and in open violation of its laws, for the avowed purpose of carrying on the slave trade, was, in every view of the subject which he could take, perfectly justified; nay, it was a duty. Not less so was the proceeding at Trade Town; all the previous transactions there having been notoriously piratical, and the conduct of its chief and its citizens having furnished just cause of war.

So much in justice to Mr. Ashmun. But how does this affect the question before the Senate? The Government has said to him that the destruction of the factories was not within the limit of the authority conferred upon him as agent, and another agent had been appointed. The society had the power to examine and decide upon his conduct so far as he had acted for them, and if dissatisfied, they, too, could select another representative. It had been said the society wished to transfer the colony to the United States, to be taken under its protection as a colony, contrary to the known policy of the Government; and that the society, apprehensive of a war, provoked by the misconduct of Mr. Ashmun, now sought protection from the military power of the Government. Nothing could be more remote from the views of the society. They have no desire to draw the Government into a war to protect a distant colony; they had no apprehension of an attack upon themselves. No civilized power, it was believed, would lend an ear to the clamors of that odious class of men who alone could urge complaint. The laws of nature denounced the slave trade; it was abhorrent to the feelings of humanity, and had been made highly penal by almost every Christian Government on the globe. The owners of the demolished factories then could never move the French or Spanish Governments to assume the attitude of war in vindication of their claims to prosecute this base traffic. The society could not perceive cause of apprehension from foreign war. In regard to the natives, the colony possessed all the necessary means of self-protection. The local militia, which had been so contemptuously spoken of, were in fact well organized, well disciplined, well officered, and efficient. Their supply of arms and munitions was inadequate to their numbers and means of applying them, as was the case in some other countries, but, small as they were, no fears were entertained for the result of any attack from the natives.

The Colonization Society.

It has also been said, that there were constitutional objections to legislation by Congress on this subject. This must of course depend upon the measure proposed for our adoption. It is not possible now to anticipate what may be recommended by the committee which you are asked to appoint. There certainly are means of aiding the colony, which involve, it would seem, no constitutional difficulties. To invoke the interposition of foreign powers, to prohibit the access of slave ships to that part of the western coast of Africa in the vicinity of the colony, might materially promote its interests, and yet, he supposed no constitutional objection would prevent our recommending such a measure. Others might be suggested, and no doubt the committee would properly estimate this consideration. He could not, however, avoid the remark, that a direct appropriation of money by Congress would certainly find high authority, as well as precedent, to justify it. The Caraccas—the New Madrid—the very late Alexandria appropriations, were not, perhaps, easily justified by any principle of the constitution which would exclude this. To all these objections, however, it may be remarked, that the memorial, in respectful and decorous terms, asks a hearing. Let the request be treated with the same attention which all others receive—let the facts be ascertained—let the objects of the society be fairly stated, and the case fully presented—the various modes of practicable aid suggested—the advantages from their successful application, enumerated—the constitutional difficulties which oppose them examined—and then the Senate will be able to appreciate the arguments for and against any proposition that may be submitted.

The gentleman from South Carolina has said it is too late in the session to mature any measure which can grow out of this memorial. He was aware of the difficulty, but he would use the authority of the gentleman himself, to show that this fact, assuming it to exist, should not prevent the action of the Senate, to the extent now asked for. At the last session, the gentleman, after devoting much labor and attention to a favorite subject, had brought it to the notice of the Senate at a very late period, and, if his recollection did not mislead him, had proposed its discussion, for the avowed purpose of inviting the attention of members, as well as the attention of the community, that it might be finally acted on at the present session. He did not find fault with the gentleman: on the contrary, he commended his whole course, and had gone with him in supporting the Bankrupt Bill, and sincerely regretted the decision of the Senate on that subject. But, important as he admitted the Bankrupt Bill to be, in its influence on the country, he must claim permission to think the subject to which this memorial refers, more interesting to the peace and happiness of the people of the United States. He knew no question, not immediately involving the very existence of the Government, which ought to excite so deeply the anxious reflection of every patriot. That part of the population of the States which it was the object of the society to remove, was a degraded, miserable race of beings. Claiming no political rights themselves, they are incapable of appreciating those great principles on which all our institutions are based—excluded, by the indelible distinctions impressed by the Author of their being, from their rank in social life, which is the reward and the stimulus of high moral and intellectual acquirement, they find no motive for the cultivation of virtue, and abandon themselves to the indulgence of the worst passions of the human breast. They are not, cannot, be citizens of your country—they do not add to your physical energies—they do not effect the legitimate object of any one appropriate class of a well-organized community—they are any thing but a laboring class. It were well did they only present a negative character. The reverse was too well known. They not only are the drones and moths of your society—who occupy the place, and exclude the presence, of a laboring, hardy, useful, and moral class of white men, actuated by a common attachment and devotion to your country, its constitution, and its laws, the beneficent protection of which they would feel, and the highest honors of which they would consider accessible to merit, in whatever garb—but your free blacks exert the most deleterious influence on every class, and almost every individual in society. The corrupting poison of their example, and their habits, has infected our slaves, and made them indolent and immoral; its impulse is to be traced on the lower orders of our citizens; it insinuates itself into our domestic circles, into the early habits of our children, and is felt in all our relations in life; and shall we be told that a proposed remedy for these evils is to be lightly considered? We should hail, as the best benefaction to our country, the advent of that scheme which shall present the means of escape from the mischiefs which we now feel, and from dangers, the magnitude of which, at a coming period, no man can permit himself duly to estimate.

You are advised, by intelligent and discreet men, whose lives have been devoted to the consideration of this subject, that the plan now proposed will probably remove, certainly lessen, these evils. You are advised that the means of accomplishing the plan are in the power and under the legal control of Congress. If authority be required to sanction such opinions, you have it in the deliberate and formal decisions of the Legislatures of a large proportion of the States of this Union—States in which slavery is allowed, and States in which it is not allowed. The States of Virginia, Maryland, Kentucky, and Tennessee, have each made a legislative declaration of their views upon this subject. Georgia has so far expressed an opinion, in that she has directed the captive Africans, who, by former laws of Congress, were placed at the disposal of the State, to be delivered to this Colonization Society, to be sent to Africa. In some of the resolutions passed by the States, you have a distinct reference to the system of colonizing these people under the patronage of the General Government. In giving authority upon this subject, it would be injustice to the society, it would be injustice to the great cause in which they are embarked, and also to the memory of the illustrious patriarch himself, to withhold the sanction of a name which could never have been connected with a project subversive of the rights of our Southern brethren, or involving an infraction of constitutional law. Mr. C. here read from a letter of Mr. Jefferson, dated in 1811, the following extracts: "You have asked my opinion on the proposition of Ann Mifflin, to take measures for procuring, on the coast of Africa, an establishment to which the people of color of these States might from time to time be colonized, under the auspices of different Governments. Having long ago made up my mind on this subject, I have no hesitation in saying, that I have ever thought that the most desirable measure which could be adopted for gradually drawing off this part of our population. Most advantageous for them as well as for us. * * * * You inquired, further, whether I would use any endeavors to procure such an establishment security against violence from other powers. Certainly, I shall be willing to do any thing to give it effect and safety. But I am but a private individual, &c. Whereas, the National Government can address themselves at once to those of Europe, to obtain the desired security, and will unquestionably be ready to exert its influence with those nations to effect an object so benevolent in itself, and so important to a great portion of its constituents. Indeed, nothing is more to be wished than that the United States would themselves undertake to make such an establishment on the coast of Africa."

Was the Senate prepared to unite with the Senator from South Carolina, in denouncing a system thus recommended to their consideration? To reject, without affording themselves opportunity to learn facts, an appeal to the Government for necessary aid to promote an object dear to the best feelings of a large portion of our citizens—an object, on the prosecution of which was suspended the high hopes and anxious anticipations of those who looked with fearful apprehensions to the final results of that unnatural combination in our community of such heterogeneous materials? We are furnished with data on which detailed estimates have been framed, by intelligent and distinguished men, to demonstrate the practicability of the scheme. The annual increase of free blacks is believed to be less than six thousand; the experience of the society has proved that the cost of transportation does not now exceed twenty dollars for each person; and when the rapidly growing commerce of the colony shall present the inducement, which a very few years of continued patronage will ensure, the cost will be materially lessened. By this trifling expenditure, it is in our power to arrest, effectually, the growth and increase of this alarming evil. Future years will find us with enlarged views and increased means, and future experience of the salutary influence of the system will make us ardent in its prosecution, with all the facilities and improvements which it will disclose. And here he begged leave to remark that, when a great and alarming evil was felt and acknowledged, dangerous to the tranquillity and moral order of society, and when a remedy was proposed by men, eminent for every virtue which could adorn the patriot and philanthropist, it did appear to him that a denunciation of the remedy proposed should be accompanied with the tender of some other and better mode of relief. Was this the case? What plan was proposed in lieu of that now offered? None. The whole body politic was diseased; parts of it paralyzed; the causes of this malady still exist, and alarming apprehensions of a fatal termination are expressed by intelligent men, who have deeply and anxiously studied the case, unless a particular course of practice is pursued—and we are told not to listen to their opinions. Does not the question immediately occur, What then is to be done? This question has been asked and repeated with all the solicitude of a suffering patient, in the agony of distress, but no consolatory answer has ever reached our impatient ears.

Mr. C. said he had before him sundry documents to sustain the several facts he had asserted, and copies of the resolutions of the States he had referred to, which he had declined reading, because he was unwilling to waste more of the valuable time of the Senate; and he should conclude by remarking, that, assuming all the purposes of the society to be chimerical, and all the hopes of its friends to be delusive and visionary, as they had been charged to be; assuming that Congress cannot, or will not, extend the aid they ask; yet he claimed for them the usual courtesy of a hearing by a committee, on whose report the Senate should announce its final decision.

Mr. HAYNE rose, in reply to Mr. CHAMBERS, and said, he must repeat the expression of his deep regret that this petition should be forced on the consideration of the Senate at this time. I had indulged the hope, sir, when it was withdrawn, two days ago, that we should hear no more of it, at least during the present session. I stand prepared, however, to resist the application at all times, and under all circumstances; and, especially, when it comes before this body in such a questionable shape, and under circumstances calculated, if not intended, to forestall public opinion, by precluding a full and fair inquiry into the merits of the application. The gentleman from Maryland had complained of the course taken in relation to this petition. He had asked if it was usual to meet a petition, coming from any respectable quarter, by refusing even to refer it to a committee. Without intending any disrespect towards that gentleman, I must be permitted to say, that we have just cause of complaint at the course which the Colonization Society have thought proper to pursue in this matter—a course, liable, as it appears to me, to the strongest reprobation. For two years past, as I am informed, have this society, at their annual meeting in this city, adopted a resolution, directing an application to Congress; but, while we were anxiously looking for the attack, not unprepared to meet it, no petition was presented. At the last meeting, however, held in this city, on the 20th of the past month, the following resolution, proposed by a gentleman high in office, (Mr. CLAY,) who made a speech in its favor, which has been published and extensively circulated, was unanimously adopted, viz:

"Resolved, That the Board of Managers be empowered and directed, at such time or times as may seem to them expedient, to make respectful application to the Congress of the United States, and to the Legislatures of the different States, for such pecuniary aid, in furtherance of the objects of the society, as they may respectively be pleased to grant."

The moment this resolution was adopted, I became satisfied that the subject would, at length, come before Congress, not for a final decision, but in such a form as to obtain, if possible, a victory without a battle. The direction contained in that resolution, to select a favorable time to present the subject to the consideration of Congress, and the State Legislatures, it was obvious, might be so used as to produce a most decisive effect on public opinion, without affording an opportunity for opposition. By watching an opportunity, such a petition might be introduced at a moment when it could not be thoroughly examined—it might be referred to a select committee, (which, according to Parliamentary rule, must be composed of its friends,) and, at the last day of the session, a report might be obtained, to be printed and circulated without the opportunity being afforded of examining it, and counteracting its deleterious effects, here, or elsewhere. A lodgment might thus be made in the public mind, by the friends of this measure, from which it would be extremely difficult hereafter to dispossess them. Now, sir, whatever may be the design of gentlemen, their course on this occasion leads directly and inevitably to these results. The petition has been brought forward at the close of a very busy session, when our tables are already groaning under the weight of several hundred bills, and when (as the gentleman from Maryland himself acknowledges) it is not intended to act on the subject, further than to refer it to a select committee, and to obtain a report, (favorable, of course,) to be disseminated at the public expense, throughout the country. The gentleman thinks this is a very fair and usual course, and says it is that which we pursued last year in relation to the Bankrupt Bill. In this he is mistaken. The Bankrupt Bill was reported on, and debated last year, in the hope that it would then have been finally acted on; nor was it abandoned until that hope had vanished. The usual and proper course on this subject, is, to send to a select committee of its friends, any measure where there is a general opinion favorable to the object, in order to enable them to present it in its best form; but never has such a reference been allowed, where novel or dangerous measures are proposed, or where there are great and irreconcilable differences of opinion on the subject. Sir, there is a portion of this House—I trust, and confidently believe, a decided majority—who are altogether opposed to the objects of this petition. Some of us believe that these objects are extremely dangerous to the peace and safety of this Union; and it is preposterous to suppose that we should consent to a course being taken with respect to it, the only, the almost avowed object of which is, to forestall public opinion, and to infuse a poison into the public mind, under the color of our authority, to which it may not be in our power to apply an antidote, and which may produce hereafter the most fatal consequences. Entertaining this opinion we are bound to protest against the course pursued by the Colonization Society, on the present occasion. We are bound to resist the reference of this subject to a committee of its friends, or to any committee, when it is acknowledged that it is not even expected that we should now act upon it definitively.

The gentleman from Maryland denies that it is the present object of the Colonization Society to induce Congress to establish a colony on the coast of Africa, or to appropriate money for that object. Sir, I speak from the language and plain import of the petition itself, which is perfectly clear and explicit on that subject. The tenor of that petition is, that the society find that they cannot command the pecuniary means from private resources to accomplish the objects of the society; that they cannot govern with sufficient wisdom and energy, a colony so far off, and composed of such discordant materials; and, therefore, they pray for the interposition of the authority of this Government, and the application of the national resources to this object. I will quote a part of the memorial itself, to put this matter beyond doubt:

"But the period has at length arrived when the society would no longer be justified in relying on its own limited resources for accomplishing what yet remains of its patriotic undertaking.

"The Colony that has been settled, small as it is, is yet too large to be governed by a distant and unincorporated society. If the acknowledged imperfections of human nature, and the uniform history of mankind, did not evince the dangers necessarily connected with the sudden transition of any people from a state of moral and political degradation to one of unqualified freedom, the experience of the British Colony at Sierra Leone would sufficiently demonstrate how utterly fallacious must be all reliance on political restrictions, deriving their only sanction from the voluntary submission of a population such as that of which the Colony at Liberia will be composed. And if, with these evidences before it, the society should leave its infant settlement to the inadequate protection to be derived from its own resources, it would be justly chargeable with all the evils that must necessarily result from the defective powers of control with which it is invested.

"In reference, too, to the great objects to be accomplished, it is now time to look to other means than such as can be supplied by individual charity. The extent to which reliance may be placed on this resource, has been, in a great measure, ascertained; and if, at the very commencement of the undertaking, aided as it has been by all the charms of novelty, means have been furnished for removing only a few hundred out of the many thousands that are annually added to the free colored population of the country, it is obvious that a further dependence on this resource would be little less than an abandonment of the enterprise. The evil to be removed is continually increasing, while the means for its removal are proportionably diminished; and, with every exertion on the part of the Colonization Society, unless access can be had to other resources, each succeeding year must find it more remote from the object of its pursuit. Under these circumstances, the society has felt itself justified in asking the immediate and effectual interposition of the Government of the country. The object it proposes to accomplish, is the removal to the coast of Africa, with their own consent, of such people of color, within the United States, as are already free, and of such others as the humanity of individuals, and the laws of the different States, may hereafter liberate. Such an object, connected as it is with the justice, the humanity, and the welfare of our country, and calculated to elevate the character and to improve the condition of a very degraded portion of the human race, cannot fail to be considered as one of deep and general interest; and the wisdom of the National Legislature may be safely relied on for suggesting and applying the necessary means for its accomplishment."

Now, sir, every argument which I formerly urged against the adoption of the colonial system, and against the right and expediency of appropriating the public money for transporting persons of color to Africa, are directly applicable to this petition. I said then, that I did not propose, at this time, to discuss at large either of these great questions. My object is, to get rid of the subject; to dispose of it at least for the present session, merely stating the strong grounds of objection which had presented themselves to my mind. I shall not depart from that course now, except so far as may be necessary to answer the arguments urged on the other side. The gentleman from Maryland insists that the objects of the Colonization Society are purely benevolent; that, among its members, are the names of many distinguished men, and that they have no design whatever to interfere with the institutions or the property of the Southern States. As to the persons, sir, who compose the society, there are many for whom I entertain the most unfeigned respect. I believe they consist of several classes. There is a large and respectable class of paper members—men of high standing and reputation, whose names are used to grace the lists,—but who never attend the meetings of the society, or take any part in their proceedings—many of them now as much opposed to the society and its objects, as the gentleman (a member of this body) who told us last year, in a speech against the society, how his name came to be enrolled among its members. Another class consists of very benevolent gentlemen, whose philanthropy has induced them to engage in a scheme, which they hope may, in some degree, (though they do not clearly perceive how,) ameliorate the condition of the African race in this country.

There is still another class, sir, I fear, of men, (and what proportion they may bear to the whole, and what influence they may exercise over the proceedings of the society, it is not for me to say,) who are influenced by a love of popularity and distinction, and who seek all such occasions of bringing themselves before the public as the zealous advocates of any scheme which takes the popular ear for a day, or addresses itself to the sympathies of the people. Such men never hesitate to throw themselves on the popular tide, in the expectation of being carried safe to the haven of their hopes. To them it signifies little how dangerous the scheme may be, if they can attach to it the names of liberty or philanthropy.

Mr. Jefferson's name has been quoted, as if he had sanctioned this society. I was glad to be informed that the letter alluded to was written sixteen years ago, and could, therefore, have had no bearing on this society; which had then no existence, and which, I believe, he never countenanced, even so far as to become a paper member.

The gentleman from Maryland has vindicated the object of the society. I do not consider this a fit occasion to go at large into that subject. The time may come when it will be my duty to do so, and I shall not shrink from the task. I trust, however, I shall be excused in saying a few words in reply to that gentleman, even at this time. He insists that it is not the wish or intention of the society to interfere with, or in any way disturb, the policy of the Southern States. So say the society. But, sir, facts speak stronger than professions. And what are the facts? Are not the members and agents of this society everywhere (even while disclaiming all such intentions) making proclamations that the end of their scheme is universal emancipation? Have we not heard their orators, at their meetings here, openly held under the eyes of Congress, asking whether, when all the free people of color are transported, we are to stop there; and answering their question by the avowal that the great work will be but then begun? Sir, let any man examine the whole scope and tendency of the reports and speeches made to this society, nay, of this very manifesto, published by their authority, and he must be dull of apprehension, if he does not perceive that the spirit which lurks beneath their fair professions, is hostile to the peace and best interests of the Southern States; and not the less so because it comes clothed in the garb of friendship, and with professions of peace and good will. Besides, sir, does not every Southern man know that, wherever the Colonization Society has invaded our country, a spirit of hostility to our institutions has instantly sprung up? This may be what the gentleman whose speech I have just quoted, calls "the collateral consequences" of the society's proceedings; for which he says the "society are not responsible."

But, sir, if gentlemen will do acts, and hold language, and encourage a spirit which must, of necessity, sow the seeds of sedition, and produce discord, it must be a strained construction which shall justify their conduct, because these consequences are "collateral" and "not direct." Look at the object expressly avowed in this petition: for the accomplishment of which, Congress is now called upon to furnish aid. "The object," say the petitioners, "is, the removal to the coast of Africa, with their own consent, of such people of color within the United States, as are already free, and such others as the humanity of individuals and the laws of the different States may hereafter liberate." Passing over the first part of this scheme, what would be the direct tendency and effect of the adoption of the policy recommended by the first clause of this sentence, by the Federal Government? The national funds are to be appropriated for the purpose of transporting such slaves as their owners may consent to emancipate for that purpose. If this be taken up as a national object; if we have the power and the inclination, and should resolve to appropriate the public money to this object, of course we would be at liberty to offer any temptation we please to induce the owners of slaves to consent. It is useless to disguise the truth—if this policy should ever be adopted by this Government, they will go directly into the market as the purchasers of our slaves, for the purpose of emancipation and transportation. This is the point to which this policy directly and inevitably leads. Now, I will ask gentlemen to contemplate dispassionately the effect that is to be produced on the Southern States, by this Government being notoriously in the market, with its Treasury of $20,000,000 or $30,000,000, as the purchasers of our slaves, for the purpose of emancipation. Can you touch this mass of a now contented, happy, and useful class of beings, without disquieting their minds, creating dissatisfaction, destroying their usefulness, and bringing ruin on the whole community? Much has been already done to destroy the confidence and impair the mutual affection which has hitherto so happily subsisted between the master and his slave; but adopt this policy and it will be destroyed forever. Besides, sir, once bring this Government into the market as purchasers, and they will fix their own terms. Once admit the principle, and, in its application, it must inevitably lead to divesting us of our property, on such terms as Congress may choose to prescribe; the insidious movements of Colonization and Abolition Societies, the distribution of political tracts, and a few incendiary resolutions, introduced into Congress and the State Legislatures, (events which have, in part, occurred even in our own time,) will reduce the value of our property to any standard this Government chooses to prescribe. So it has been in the West Indies, and so it will be here. I am informed by a gentleman who has lived many years in the West Indies, that, by the perpetual agitation of this question in Great Britain, in and out of Parliament, lands in that country have been reduced to less than half their value; and slaves to ten pounds per head; and should the British Government choose to purchase them, it will be the easiest thing in nature so to shake the public confidence in that species of property, as to reduce their value to nothing.

In this view of the subject, can any man be so blind as not to see and feel the dangerous tendency of the measures recommended to us by this society? Sir, the truth cannot be disguised—it must be told. The only safety of the Southern States is to be found in the want of power on the part of the Federal Government to touch the subject at all. Thank God, the constitution gives them no power to engage in the work of colonization, or to interfere with our institutions, either for good or for evil. This is the very "Ark of the Covenant," in which alone we will find safety.

I have said, sir, that the whole scheme of the society is altogether visionary and impracticable. Without going fully into the argument, I will offer one illustration of it. In the speech made in the society, in support of this application to Congress, the views of the society are explained, and, I presume, it will not be considered unfair to try the society by the test of the deliberate opinion expressed by one of their high officers, in a speech made in support of this very application to Congress, printed at the request of the society, and extensively circulated. In the sixth page of this speech, it is explicitly stated, "that the true nature of the evil," (for which it is the object of the society to provide a "remedy,") is "not that there are some, but that there are so many among us of a different caste." "That the African part of our population bears so large a proportion to the residue of European origin, as to create the most lively apprehension, especially in some quarters of the Union," and that the object is, "in a material degree to diminish, or render stationary, this dangerous element in the general mass."

The means are next pointed out by which this great object is to be obtained. It is to transport 6,000 free persons of color, annually to Africa, which, at twenty dollars each, will cost one hundred and twenty thousand dollars per annum. "This (we are assured) is the whole scheme of the society." Now, sir, can any scheme be more preposterous, any evil more imaginary, or any remedy more inadequate to remove it, if it had an existence anywhere but in the disordered fancies of those who conjure it up to alarm the timid, or influence the weak and credulous? We are told of "the danger" to the people of this country, from the large number of the African race among us, and of "the lively apprehension" felt on this subject. Danger, sir! from less than two millions of ignorant and unarmed people, scattered over an immense region, and without the means of concert or co-operation, in a population of twelve millions of brave, intelligent, and united freemen! As to the "lively apprehensions" from which our kind and considerate friends have volunteered to relieve us—let me tell them, that we have no fears, except from their uncalled-for interference in our concerns. Sir, a mistake has gone abroad on this subject, which must be corrected. I know that language, similar to that which I have just quoted, has been so often used in certain quarters, that an opinion prevails in some portions of this Union, that the Southern States are dependent upon them; that they cannot maintain their existence, without the protection of their Northern brethren; and hence it is, sir, that very little scruple is felt in imposing burthens (by tariffs and other impositions) on those who are supposed to be "in mercy." Sir, let me assure our Northern brethren that this is altogether a delusion. We feel ourselves perfectly adequate to our own protection, and we feel no apprehensions whatever, except from their unauthorized and dangerous intermeddling with our institutions. It is true, sir, that much has been already done to create difficulties, and our only apprehension arises from a belief that a reckless perseverance in the course which has been for some time pursued, (ostensibly for our benefit, but in truth to our injury,) may lead to scenes over which humanity must weep.

But, if the danger was in reality such as the Colonization Society suppose, what are we to say to the remedy proposed for so great and pressing an evil? Sir, it is absolutely beyond belief, that any one should gravely propose to accomplish so great an end by such feeble means. The safety of ten millions of people is endangered by the great relative proportion which two millions of people bear to twelve millions, and to remove this, it is proposed to transport six thousand per annum to the coast of Africa, at an expense of twenty dollars each. Now, what influence can the removal of six thousand persons annually, possibly have on the safety of such a nation as this? Sir, the number would not even be missed. According to the laws which govern population, their places would be supplied immediately, and the country would proceed on its steady march, without the smallest interruption from this insignificant diminution of their numbers. And yet, this, we are assured, is "the whole object of the society." The other part of the calculation is equally fallacious. Twenty dollars to transport a person to Africa and establish him there! Why, sir, it would cost more to carry him to the place of embarkation. To transport him, including all expenses, would cost double that amount; and then, if you do not mean to leave him to perish, you must build houses, and furnish food, clothing, medicines, and efficient protection, for at least a year. If you put the expense of all this at $100, I am sure you would fall far below the mark. Gentlemen, on whose judgment and accuracy I rely, have estimated it at $200. But we have some lights on this subject, which may assist us in counting the cost of transporting persons to the coast of Africa, at the expense of the public. I have the official documents before me, showing that there has already been actually expended by the United States, under the act for transporting captured Africans to the coast of Africa, $69,767 57: there having been actually transported only about thirty, equal to about $2,000 apiece. It is true that there have been supported in the United States, (pending certain legal investigations,) about 180 more. But here is an estimate just submitted by the Government, of the sums now wanted to transport and maintain these. The transportation, from the port of embarkation, is put down at $40 each—equal to $7,800.

Provisions and clothing (including the 30 already at the agency)	$5,000
Medicine and Hospital Stores,	1,000
Lumber, &c.	2,000
Salaries, Principal and Assistant,	2,800
For various expenses of the Agency that cannot be estimated with any accuracy,	11,290
Making in all the sum of	29,290

FEBRUARY, 1827.]

The Colonisation Society.

[SENATE.]

Equal, in round numbers, to about $150 for each African transported.

But, if you add the whole expenses to which the Government will have been subjected in the transportation of these 200 Africans, the amount, as appears from the document before me, will stand thus :

Expenditures to 31st December, 1825—Reported
20th January, 1826,	$40,400 31
Expenses by account, to
2d January, 1827,	$19,347 59
Advances to Agents,	10,366 67
	$29,714 26
	$70,114 57
Additional sum now demanded as above specified,	29,290 00

Equal to about one hundred thousand dollars for the transportation of 200 Africans, or about $500 each.

But, if it is really and truly the single object of the society to relieve the country from the danger resulting from the large proportion which the African population in this country bears to the rest, surely nothing short of the transportation of the whole annual increase will effect that object. Even this would leave that population undiminished. Now, what is the annual increase? At 4 per cent. it would be 80,000; at 2 per cent. it would be 40,000—but taking the average increase for thirty years, from 1790 to 1830, it exceeds 3 per cent. In round numbers, therefore, it may be estimated at 60,000. Nothing short of the transportation of this number, annually, could accomplish the objects of the society, and this would cost six millions of dollars, at the lowest calculation, and probably double that amount. Can the society do this? Can the Government do it? No rational man will, for a moment, say so. So perfectly chimerical then, Mr. President, are the plans and calculations of this society. The whole object of the society is to remove an imaginary danger, and by means as inadequate, as if they should attempt to move the world, even without the lever of Archimedes. Sir, this whole subject is grossly misunderstood, and egregiously misrepresented. The progress of time and of events is providing an effectual remedy for the evil, concerning which, some gentlemen are so sensitive. In this very speech facts are stated, that ought to quiet forever the minds of the most philanthropic, on this subject—facts drawn from official documents, which show conclusively that the relative increase, for many years past, has been decidedly in favor of the free white population, and that the relative proportion of the colored population, whether free or slave, is certainly diminishing, almost in an arithmetical proportion.

Without going over the table before me, I shall merely give a few results.

VOL. IX.—31

The rate of increase of slaves , for ten years, from 1810 to 1820, was	2.911 per cent.
Ditto of persons of color	2.525 per cent.
While the mean ratio of increase for thirty years , from 1790 to 1820, was—
Of slaves ,	8 per cent.
Persons of color, upwards of	5 per cent.

Showing, clearly, that the increase has been considerably less, during the last ten years, than for the twenty years preceding, and also that the present ratio of increase is much below that of the free white population.

Thus, sir, it appears, that the Almighty, in the wise order of his providence, has marked out the course of events, which will not only remove all danger, but gradually, and effectually, and “in his own good time,” accomplish our deliverance from what gentlemen are pleased to consider as “the curse of the land.” The European population is now increasing at the rate of four per cent., that of the African race at from two to three per cent., (and their rate of increase constantly diminishing.) The former will be doubled in about twenty-five years, the latter will not probably be doubled in less than fifty years. While this process is going on, the colored classes are gradually diffusing themselves throughout the country, and are making steady advances in intelligence and refinement; and if half the zeal were displayed in bettering their condition, that is now wasted in the vain and fruitless effort of sending them abroad, their intellectual and moral improvement would be steady and rapid. The history of this country has proved, that, when the relative proportion of the colored population to the white is greatly diminished, slaves cease to be valuable, and emancipation follows of course, and they are swallowed up in the common mass. - Wherever free labor is put in full and successful operation, slave labor ceases to be profitable. It is true that it is a very gradual operation, and it must be to be successful or desirable. Time and patience, therefore, are only wanting to effect the great object which gentlemen profess to have in view—and to effect it safely, prudently, and in the only mode in which it can be done, without the inevitable ruin of all parties concerned. And gentlemen, in their intemperate zeal in what is miscalled the cause of justice and humanity, are attempting to anticipate events, and insist on reaping the fruit at once, not only before the harvest is ripe, but before they have taken the pains to till the ground, or to sow the seed.

The gentleman from Maryland, admitting that the conduct of Dr. Ashmun has been censurable, yet seems to think that I have represented the matter too strongly, and he insists that, as Agent of the United States, he has a right to capture slaves on the coast of Africa; and at all events, however censurable his conduct may be, that the Government, and not the society, are answerable for it. Sir, though Dr. Ashmun dates his letter at the “United States Agency,” and speaks of himself as the Repre-representative of the United States, and of his acts as the acts of this Government, I am yet to learn that our constitution and laws give the slightest sanction to these pretensions. His authority is derived entirely from the act of 3d March, 1819, which merely appropriates a sum of money to enable the President to cause to be sent back to their own country, any Africans illegally imported into the United States. Dr. Ashmun has been employed as Agent under that act, and his powers and duties are strictly limited to receiving such Africans as may be sent from this country, and causing them to be restored to their respective tribes. Where, then, can he derive authority to destroy the slave trade—to suppress piracy—to capture and break up French and Spanish establishments on the coast—to take prisoners, destroy property, and conduct military expeditions? As to the alleged piratical character of the Spanish schooner, against which the Dr. undertook his first hostile expedition, he himself expressly declares, that her papers were all regular; that she was engaged in a lawful trade, and that there was not even a suspicion of her having been engaged in any unlawful act, prior to her taking from an English brig an anchor, and some other articles not specified. The case, therefore, is clear—that expedition, like all the rest, was undertaken in furtherance of the great scheme of putting down the slave trade—an object doubtless very desirable, and extremely benevolent, but with which Dr. Ashmun has no more to do, than he has in that of establishing free Governments throughout the world. There can be no other pretext than this for the attack on Will's Town, and the capture of the slaves and other property there—nor indeed for any of the expeditions of which I have before spoken. Now, let it be remembered, that the Executive formally disavows all of these unlawful acts, and throws them on Dr. Ashmun, as the Agent of the society. And what do they do? I know nothing of their proceedings or opinions, except what I derive from their public acts; but I do know that, at their annual meeting here, on the 20th January last, they did pass a resolution approving of the conduct of Dr. Ashmun, without any restriction or limitation whatsoever. I repeat, therefore, that the society has sanctioned the unlawful acts of Dr. Ashmun, as their Agent—acts of which this Government has disapproved—and they now come here and wish us to take the business into our own hands. Sir, the course of this affair has demonstrated that political power cannot be entrusted to Agents three thousand miles off, (whatever the character of such Agents may be,) without being liable to abuse. It is manifest that a private society always must be inadequate to the Government of a Colony—a discovery which the Colonization Society seems at length to have made, and which it would have been well for themselves, for their country, and for the persons who have been transported to a barbarous and distant land, if they had made before their society was instituted. What then? Shall the United States adopt this ill-fated Colony? Shall they, with the fatal experience of all other countries on the subject before their eyes, enter upon the Colonial System? Shall they form a Colony three thousand miles off—a Colony on the Continent of Africa, and above all, a Colony to be composed entirely of a description of persons unfit for self-government, and in every respect unprepared for the new state of political existence in which they are to be placed? For my own part, Mr. President, I am resolved to give no countenance whatever to any such wild and extravagant projects, by whatever specious names they may be called. I will not consent even to entertain the question; and I shall move to lay this petition on the table, for the express purpose of preventing its reference to any committee, and in the hope that the Senate may hear no more of it, either during the present session, or at any other time.

After a few words from Mr. BENTON, on the same side of the question, the petition was, on his motion, laid upon the table.

MONDAY, February 12.

In Secret Session.—Panama Mission.—Nomination of Mr. Poinsett.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the nomination of Joel R. Poinsett, as Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States to the Assembly of American Ministers, transferred from Panama to Tacubaya, in Mexico, in the place of Richard C. Anderson, deceased.

Mr. BENTON offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient for the United States to send any Minister in the place of R. C. Anderson, deceased, to the Congress of American Nations at Tacubaya.

The question being taken on this resolution, it was negatived by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Berrien, Branch, Chandler, Cobb, Dickerson, Eaton, Findlay, Hayne, Kane, King, McKinley, Macon, Randolph, Ridgely, Rowan, Smith of South Carolina, Tazewell, Van Buren, White, Williams, and Woodbury—22.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barton, Bateman, Bell, Boulogne, Chambers, Clayton, Edwards, Harrison, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnson of Louisiana, Knight, Marks, Mills, Noble, Reed, Robbins, Ruggles, Sanford, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith of Maryland, Thomas, and Willey—25.

Mr. BENTON submitted the following resolution:

"It appearing to the Senate, from the documents communicated by the President, in the Treaty of Union, League, and Perpetual Confederation, concluded by the Assembly of American Nations at Panama, on the 15th of July, 1824, it is stipulated that the Governments there represented, would renew their invitations to the neutral and friendly powers to send Plenipotentiaries to Tacubaya; and it further appearing that no such invitations have yet been given to our Government:

"Therefore, resolved, That, without now expressing its opinion as to the expediency of the United States being represented at the Congress of Tacubaya, the Senate are of opinion that no further steps ought to be taken in that Mission, nor any further expense incurred."

The question being taken on this resolution, it was decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Berrien, Branch, Chandler, Cobb, Dickerson, Eaton, Findlay, Hayne, Kane, King, McKinley, Macon, Randolph, Ridgely, Rowan, Smith of South Carolina, Tazewell, Van Buren, White, Williams, and Woodbury—22.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barton, Bateman, Bell, Bouligny, Chambers, Chase, Clayton, Edwards, Harrison, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnston of Louisiana, Knight, Marks, Mills, Noble, Reed, Robbins, Ruggles, Sanford, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith of Maryland, Thomas, and Willey—26.

The question being put, "Will the Senate advise and consent to the appointment of Joel R. Poinsett, as Minister Plenipotentiary," &c., it was decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barton, Bateman, Bell, Benton, Bouligny, Chambers, Chase, Clayton, Eaton, Edwards, Harrison, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnson of Ky., Johnston of La., Kane, Knight, McKinley, Marks, Mills, Noble, Reed, Robbins, Ruggles, Sanford, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith of Md., Thomas, Willey—30.

NAYS.—Messrs. Berrien, Branch, Chandler, Cobb, Dickerson, Findlay, King, Macon, Randolph, Ridgely, Rowan, Smith of S. C., Tazewell, Van Buren, White, Williams, Woodbury—17.

The Senate then proceeded to the nomination of John Boyle, of Kentucky, to the office of Judge of the United States, for the District of Kentucky, and on the question of advising and consenting to that nomination, it was decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barton, Bateman, Bell, Benton, Berrien, Bouligny, Chambers, Chase, Clayton, Eaton, Edwards, Harrison, Hayne, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnson of Ky., Johnston of La., Kane, King, Knight, McKinley, Marks, Noble, Reed, Ridgely, Robbins, Ruggles, Sanford, Silsbee, Smith of Md., Tazewell, Thomas, Van Buren, White, Willey, Williams, Woodbury—37.

NAYS.—Messrs. Branch, Chandler, Findlay, Macon, Randolph, Rowan, Smith of South Carolina—7.

On motion, the injunction of secrecy was then removed from the above proceedings.

TUESDAY, February 13.

Land for a Canal in Indiana.

On motion of Mr. HENDRICKS, the bill to appropriate a certain quantity of land for the opening of a canal to unite the waters of the Wabash with Lake Erie, and the amendment offered by Mr. HOLMES on Friday, were taken up.

Mr. HOLMES then withdrew that amendment and offered two others, making the grant of land for the canal to amount to the half of five sections in width on each side of the canal, and each alternate section to be reserved to the United States, to be sold by the Commissioner of the Land Office, under the direction of the President of the United States; which were put and carried.

A debate of considerable length took place upon this bill, chiefly upon points of the discussion of Friday, in which Messrs. SMITH, of South Carolina, HARRISON, and BELL, took part.

Mr. CHANDLER observed, that, as no time for the completion of the canal had been fixed, he would suggest whether it would not be proper that some such limitation should be fixed.

Mr. EATON then moved an amendment to the bill, by which the State of Indiana was bound to commence and complete the canal in given periods. This proposition gave rise to much discussion between Messrs. HENDRICKS, EATON, CHANDLER, RIDGELY, HOLMES, and NOBLE, when the proposition of Mr. EATON having been modified to make it incumbent on the State of Indiana to commence the canal in five years, and complete it in twenty years, and binding the State to pay the amount of any lands that shall have been sold, should the canal not be completed—and making all titles to land under the State valid,

The motion to amend was taken and carried.

The question then recurring on engrossing the bill for a third reading, and Mr. CHANDLER having called for the yeas and nays, it was carried by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barton, Bateman, Bell, Benton, Bouligny, Chambers, Chase, Eaton, Harrison, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnston of Louisiana, Kane, King, Knight, McKinley, Marks, Noble, Reed, Ridgely, Robbins, Ruggles, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith of Maryland, Thomas, Willey—28.

NAYS.—Messrs. Branch, Chandler, Clayton, Cobb, Dickerson, Edwards, Findlay, Hayne, Macon, Randolph, Sanford, Smith of South Carolina, Tazewell, Woodbury—14.

On motion of Mr. KANE, the bill to appropriate a quantity of land in aid of opening a canal to unite the waters of the river Illinois and Lake Michigan, was taken up.

WEDNESDAY, February 14.

The bill to authorize the State of Indiana to locate and make a road was read a second time.

Mr. HENDRICKS explained the objects of the bill.

Mr. CHANDLER called for the yeas and nays, which being sustained, the bill was ordered to be engrossed by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bateman, Bell, Benton, Bouligny, Chambers, Chase, Eaton, Edwards, Harrison, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnston of Louisiana, Kane, King, Knight, McKinley, Marks, Noble, Reed, Ridgely, Robbins, Rowan, Ruggles, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith of Maryland, Thomas, Willey, and Williams—30.

NAYS.—Messrs. Branch, Chandler, Clayton, Cobb, Dickerson, Hayne, Macon, Randolph, Sanford, Smith of South Carolina, Tazewell, and Woodbury—12.

Duty on Teas, &c.

The bill to reduce the duties heretofore levied on certain articles, (comprising teas, coffee, and wines,) was read a third time.

Mr. SEYMOUR moved its recommitment to the Committee on Finance, with instructions to strike out the section relating to wines and coffee. Mr. SMITH of Maryland opposed the motion on the ground that, if the bill was recommitment, it could not pass this session. Mr. CHANDLER sustained the motion. Mr. WOODBURY moved to divide the motion, and take the question on wines first; which was agreed to, and the motion to recommit, and strike out wines, was rejected, 19 to 22.

The question then recurred on recommitting, with orders to strike out coffee, and was rejected, 14 to 28.

The question was then taken on passing the bill, and was decided in the affirmative, by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Benton, Berrien, Boulogny, Branch, Chambers, Chandler, Clayton, Cobb, Eaton, Edwards, Hayne, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnson of Kentucky, Kane, King, Macon, Randolph, Reed, Rowan, Sanford, Silabee, Smith of Maryland, Smith of South Carolina, Tazewell, Thomas, Van Buren, Woodbury—28.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bateman, Bell, Chase, Dickerson, Findlay, Harrison, Knight, Marks, Noble, Ridgely, Robbins, Ruggles, Seymour, Willey—14.

THURSDAY, February 15.

Mr. DICKERSON, by direction of a majority of the Committee on Manufactures, reported the bill to increase the duties on certain articles of imported woollens, without amendment.

Gradual Improvement of the Navy.

The Senate then proceeded, in Committee of the Whole, to the consideration of the bill to provide for the gradual increase of the Navy.

Mr. HAYNE (Chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs) rose and addressed the Senate as follows:

By an act "for the gradual increase of the Navy," passed on the 29th April, 1816, the sum of one million of dollars, per annum, for eight years, was appropriated and set apart, for that purpose. On the 8d March, 1821—five years afterwards—this annual appropriation was reduced to half a million, for six years, from the year 1821; so that this act will expire on the 8d of March next. This policy, therefore, of setting apart a fund for the improvement of the Navy, has now been established in the United States for eleven years, and comes recommended to us by an experience neither very short in its duration, nor at all doubtful in its results. The wisdom of this policy seems now to be firmly established by general consent; and it is a remarkable fact, that, during a period of eleven years, not a single proposition has been made, in either branch of Congress, or in any Department of the Government, to depart from it. The amount of the appropriation has, indeed, varied; but the principle has been held sacred. I do not feel, therefore, that it is incumbent on me to do more, on the present occasion, than merely to state a few of the leading considerations which induced Congress, in 1816, to establish this policy, and which still recommend it to our adoption and support. A brief retrospect of the events which preceded and accompanied the late war with Great Britain, will, perhaps, be useful, in enabling us to form a just estimate of the value of a Navy to this country, and of our true policy on that interesting subject. The people of the United States, though inheriting from their British ancestry a decided predilection for the sea, and though tempted, by their peculiar situation, to seek employment on the ocean, were yet so strongly impressed with the omnipotence of Great Britain, on that element, that they hardly dared to look forward to the day when these scattered Republics would be able to maintain a Navy that could be of the smallest service in the defence of their coasts and harbors, much less in the protection of their commerce on the common highway of nations. It entered not into the wildest speculations of the most sanguine among us, that, at any period to which we could reasonably extend our calculations, the United States would be able to build and support a Navy, capable of maintaining its existence in the presence of the "Mistress of the Seas." So strong was this delusion, that our ablest statesmen, and most devoted patriots, looked to a defensive system as the only one to which the United States could, in any event, resort, for the redress of her wrongs, or the protection of the persons and property of her citizens. Hence it was, that, when some of your seamen were impressed, you withdrew the rest into your cities; when your ships were captured, you retired from the ocean; and when redress for these wrongs was perseveringly and finally refused, you abandoned your commercial pursuits, shut yourselves up within your own Territory, and cut off all intercourse with those who had committed these outrages. Mr. President, it has often occurred to my mind, that, in some respects, a more sublime moral spectacle has seldom been exhibited to the world than that presented by the people of the United States, during that period of unparalleled endurance. I well remember the period, sir; it made an impression on my mind and my feelings, which can never be effaced to the last day of my existence—when, under the operation of the restrictive system, the whole maritime frontier was hermetically sealed; when our mariners, driven from the ocean, sought refuge in our cities almost to starve; when our ships lay rotting at the wharves, and every class of persons connected with trade were driven from their employments; when the produce of the farmer lay rotting in his barns; and when all, who depended on their daily labor for support, whatever might be the nature of their pursuits, were left almost without the means of getting food and raiment. In that period, sir, of unparalleled suffering, amidst the deprivation of all our accustomed comforts, the people of every part of the United States, with but few exceptions, were found submitting quietly, and without a murmur, to what would have driven any other people on earth to despair and madness. And why did they so submit? Because they had the most perfect confidence in the wisdom and patriotism of their rulers; because they knew that the honor of the nation had been assailed; and firmly believed that, incapable of contending with Great Britain on the ocean, we could not redress our wrongs by war. Sir, I was young at that time; but I partook of the universal enthusiasm which would have induced the people, among whom I lived, to have submitted cheerfully to any extremity of suffering, rather than consent to relax, in the smallest degree, those restrictive measures which we then believed to be called for by a just regard to the national honor, and which we supposed to be the only means of coercing our enemies to do us justice. I admit, sir—the nation now admits—that we were under a delusion. We underrated our resources; we undervalued ourselves. The capacity of this country for war was not understood. We had yet to learn, that a people, capable of making the sacrifices required by the restrictive system, could never be conquered; that a patriotic people could at once create armies; that war itself would raise up Washingtons and Jacksons to lead us to victory; and that the oaks of our forests, and the sturdy virtues of our gallant tars, were capable of making the ocean itself the immediate scene of our glory. The war at length came, and, notwithstanding the numerous errors committed in its conduct—errors, sir, in a great measure inseparable from our peculiar situation—we came out of it with the redress of all our wrongs, and with a character cheaply purchased by all our sufferings and sacrifices. Whatever differences of opinion existed at the time war was declared, none exists now, as to the incalculable benefits which that war has conferred upon this country. It is looked upon as the great era in our history, scarcely inferior, in importance, to the establishment of independence itself; and the men who declared that war, as well as those who conducted it to a successful conclusion, will live forever in the hearts of the American people. But it is not my present purpose to notice the events or the results of that war, except so far as they relate to the part which the Navy contributed in producing them, and as they tend to illustrate the true policy of the United States on that subject.

The declaration of war found the public mind in the state which I have described, in relation to the Navy. We possessed, it is true, a few frigates, which had been provided from time to time, chiefly for the purpose of protecting the commerce of the United States from the Barbary Powers, and we retained a few officers who had acquired reputation in the Mediterranean, in their contest with the Turks. But to these the nation hardly looked, except for aid in defence of our harbors. Hence the naval means of the country were, in the first instance, chiefly directed to the building and equipment of a great number of gunboats, and our most gallant and experienced officers were devoted to that service. I have heard it stated, sir, as a fact, (of the truth of which I have no doubt,) that when the proposition was first made here, that the few frigates and sloops of war which we then had, should be sent out to meet, in single combat, the ships of Great Britain, the proposal was considered rash and desperate. Happily for us, these rash counsels prevailed, and, from the moment that Captain Hull, in the Constitution, met and captured the Guerriere, up to the final termination of the war, the whole career of the Navy was one of daring enterprise, heroic achievement, and splendid victory. Wherever it moved, whether upon the ocean, or on our inland seas, its path was a flood of glory. Sir, I cannot stop to dwell upon these achievements in detail, which filled every American bosom with enthusiasm, and during every period of the war, animated our hopes in prosperity, and cheered us in our reverses. It is sufficient for my purpose to say, that the Navy literally fought itself into favor—it became its own architect. Experience had now demonstrated that it was the true policy of the United States to become a great Naval power; that no time was to be lost in putting forth the resources of the nation, for the establishment of a Navy, commensurate with our wants; capable of protecting our commerce in peace, and defending their country in war, not only by maintaining the command of our own waters, but by carrying on an offensive operation on the ocean itself, and thereby causing our enemies to partake of the evils of war. Sir, it was demonstrated by our statesmen in both Houses of Congress, by the clearest arguments, and the plainest calculations, that a Navy was not only the safest, but the cheapest defence of this nation.

The honorable gentleman from Maryland (Mr. SMITH) has, on more than one occasion, contributed much to establish that position—and it is with pride and pleasure that South Carolina recollects the convincing statements and conclusive arguments by which one of her favorite sons (Mr. Cheves) so justly acquired the name of "one of the fathers of the Navy." The peace of 1815 found the whole nation in favor of a Navy. The act of April, 1816, was the first fruit of that feeling, and was the foundation of the naval policy of this country. It appropriated one million of dollars for eight years, for the increase of the Navy, and provided for the building of a number of ships of the line, and other vessels, which, with those before and since authorized by law, will give to the United States a Navy, consisting of 12 ships of the line, 20 frigates, 16 sloops of war, 4 schooners, and 3 steam batteries.

I come now, Mr. President, to the Dry Docks, which form the next object of this bill. And here I must begin by saying, that it is not a little surprising, that a country, possessing a navy of twelve ships of the line, and twenty frigates, should be without one of these necessary appendages of all navies; and that, with the experience of the rest of the world before our eyes, we should have gone on, for so many years, incurring the delay, risk, and expense, of heaving down our ships, when we possessed so many admirable positions for docks, and when the saving, in a single year, would have almost paid the expense of constructing them. It is estimated that the expense of heaving down a 74-gun ship, coming into port from a cruise, and putting even small repairs upon her, would not fall far short of $20,000. She would have to be unloaded, her guns taken out, her spars and sails removed, a large number of men must be employed in the operation, and, when the work was done, she must be reloaded and equipped. Great delay would also necessarily take place from such an operation. For ordinary repairs, such a ship would be detained a month; and, at certain seasons of the year, it would not be considered safe to subject a vessel to the dangerous operation of heaving out. At all times, and under all circumstances, the vessel is greatly strained. Nor is this all: in the present condition of your Navy Yards, your vessels of war must be hove out, not only for repairs, but even for examination. It is not deemed safe to send vessels to sea that have been lying some time in port, nor after long cruises, without examination; and to do this, all the delay, expense, and risk, of heaving out, must be encountered. In time of war, this would greatly impair the efficiency of the Navy. Time, in all military operations, is of great importance to success; and promptness in preparation, and celerity in movement, have often gained battles, that must otherwise have been lost. Now, with suitable dry docks, ships can be examined and discharged immediately, and repairs, when necessary, effected with the least possible delay and expense. I have the highest authority for stating the fact, that, not long since, a British frigate, with her provisions and entire armament on board, was run into a dry dock for examination, and sailed on her destination during the same tide—thus saving all the expense, delay, and risk, of an examination, according to our clumsy method of heaving out. The advantages derived from dry docks are so fully understood in Europe, that there is no naval power without a number of them. In England, there are now sixteen, and three more building; and in France, there are twelve, all of the most durable materials. On the subject of dry docks, we are in possession of the most minute and satisfactory information. It is known to the country, that one of our most intelligent naval officers (now a member of the Navy Board) was not long since sent to Europe to obtain information on this and other subjects connected with the naval establishments of that continent. Through him, the country has been put in possession of a mass of valuable information, and especially on the subject of dry docks. In addition to this, an intelligent and experienced civil engineer (who had resided many years in England) has, under the orders of the Navy Department, lately made minute surveys and calculations on this subject, which I have now before me. From these statements it appears—

That the following will be the whole expense of constructing dry docks, on the most approved plan, at the following Navy Yards, viz:

At Portsmouth, N. H.	$349,571 71
At Charlestown, Mass.	356,864 04
At Brooklyn, N. Y.	380,116 86
At Gosport, Va.	398,800 00

The committee have no doubt that there ought to be a dry dock at each of these places; but, for the sake of deriving the advantages of experience on this subject, they have determined to recommend the construction of only two at this time, one to the south and the other to the north of the Potomac River. Holding myself in readiness to make any further explanations that may be required on this point, I shall now pass to the next object proposed in the bill, the construction of a Marine Railway at Pensacola, on the Gulf of Mexico. From the best information the committee have been able to obtain, they are well satisfied that railways are much cheaper than docks, and that they may be advantageously used for the repair of sloops of war and other smaller vessels; but that there would be great risk in using them for the repairs of frigates and ships of the line. This is the received opinion in Europe, and our most experienced officers concur in its correctness. In no point of view, however, can railways supersede dry docks. It is now proposed to erect a railway at a point where it will certainly be extremely useful, and where we will be able to learn from experience its practical value.

With respect to the contemplated improvements in our Navy Yards, which it will be seen forms one of the objects of this bill, I shall now make but a single remark. These yards have hitherto been improved from time to time, without any regular plan. It is extremely desirable, therefore, that system should be introduced into establishments which are daily expanding, and which must necessarily be considerably enlarged hereafter. The adoption of the plan here recommended, will introduce economy, and greatly promote the efficiency of these establishments.

Gradual Improvement of the Navy.

[SENATE,

I come now, Mr. President, to the great, the interesting question, of the Naval Academy. It cannot be necessary, at this day of intellectual light, to enlarge on the great advantages of education; it must at least be superfluous for me to say to the gentlemen who compose the Senate, that mental culture must enlarge and improve the intellectual faculties, elevate the sentiments, establish the principles, and strengthen, ennoble, and adorn, the character of man. But, however universally acknowledged these truths may be, there still remains a doubt on the minds of some, whether they are strictly applicable to naval men. The time was, when the hardy virtues and noble traits which form the character of the sailors were supposed to belong to a being altogether different from the rest of mankind. In former times, it was believed to be necessary, to complete the character of a naval officer, that he should be a profane swearer and a hard drinker; that he should be proud of his ignorance, despise books, and be distinguished by habits, manners, and language, different from the rest of the world. But these, sir, are the exploded errors of the last century. No one, now, supposes that these peculiarities ever constituted any portion of the merit of an accomplished seaman. Amidst the universal spread of light and knowledge, which has formed a new era in the history of the world, it has been discovered, and generally admitted, that military and naval men form no exception to the universal rule, that, in every department of human affairs, the success of individuals, as well as of nations, will be in exact proportion to their intellectual and moral strength. No one now doubts that, every thing else being equal, the scientific officer will bear away the palm from a less accomplished competitor. There is no class of men among whom the march of improvement has been more steady and uninterrupted than among naval men. In our own country, and especially during the last war, this truth has been most conspicuously developed. The naval officers who, during that conflict, immortalized their names, and covered their country with glory, were men of cultivated minds, elegant manners, and the noblest sentiments of honor—men who graced the drawing room as well as the quarter deck, and were fitted to shine in any situation in which they could be placed. In their characters were combined extensive scientific attainments, and perfect nautical skill, with the sentiments and feelings which gave grace and dignity to ancient chivalry. Sir, if Perry had been an officer of the old school, he would have gone down at the battle of Lake Erie, with his colors nailed to the mast, and his country would have lost one of the proudest trophies of the war. But, Mr. President, the effect of cultivating the minds, improving the manners, and elevating the character of our officers is not confined to themselves; it produces a decided moral effect on the men committed to their charge; it elevates the character of our seamen. If, sir, we could discover all the causes which produced our naval victories in the late war, I doubt not it would be found, that the high moral character of our seamen contributed as much as any other; and for this they were indebted to the excellent example of their leaders. Where, in the naval history of the world, was such a spectacle presented, as that exhibited by the crew commanded by the all-accomplished Decatur (the man over whose untimely fate the whole nation mourned) when returning from a long cruise, covered with laurels, they were invited by the grateful citizens of New York to a public festival. Upwards of five hundred men, abandoned by their officers, were seen traversing the streets of a crowded city in the night, partaking of the amusements of the theatre, and returning quietly to their ship at midnight, not one untold. Look, too, at the conduct of the crew of the Adams, when commanded by the excellent and gallant Morris. When that vessel was driven on shore by a superior enemy at the Penobscot, the crew, consisting of several hundred men, were dispersed, after receiving orders from their commander to rendezvous at Portsmouth, at a time appointed. They wandered through the country (on a journey which occupied five days) and at the time and place appointed every man was at his post. It is unnecessary to multiply examples of the high character of our naval officers who most eminently distinguished themselves during the war, or to trace the influence of their example in elevating the character of our seamen. But, sir, I must notice the fact, that these officers were, almost without exception, men of well-informed minds, consummate professional skill, cultivated manners, and elevated sentiments. It is true, that they were in general self-educated men, who had not the advantages of early instruction at a naval school. There is no mistake, however, greater or more common, than that which condemns education as useless, because eminent men have educated themselves. When we show you the triumphs of learning, and point out the advantages actually derived from science and information, by distinguished individuals, is it any answer to say that these men educated themselves? Sir, unquestionably the best of all kinds of education is that which a highly gifted man secures to himself from the deep conviction of its immense importance. But, when we see the rich fruits of this education, as exhibited in the lives and characters of such men, is it not preposterous to say, that education is of no value? The correct inference is directly the contrary, and the only question which remains, is as to the best means of extending its blessings to others. The mass of men never will, never can become self-educated. In all the professions and pursuits of life, early, judicious, and persevering efforts must be used, to form the minds, principles, and moral habits of youth, or they will run to waste, and produce no fruit. It is for men formed "in the prodigality of nature," to be self-instructed. All others must receive the aids of early and constant lessons. Sir, the object of the naval academy is to give to all the young men in our Navy, the means of becoming Decaturs and Perrys; to take them at 13 or 14 (at their first entrance into the service) and putting them under able instructors, to cultivate their minds, not only in the sciences immediately connected with their future pursuits, but to a certain extent, to make them acquainted with general literature; to imbue their minds with a love of knowledge, to give them a taste for books, to encourage good habits and principles, to hold out proper examples for their imitation, and to convince them that their future standing in the service will be exactly proportioned to their professional acquirements, and intellectual and moral character. By such a plan, how many gallant and promising young men will be saved to their friends and their country! how much vice and ignorance will be banished from the Navy! Our plan, Mr. President, is extremely simple. None are to be educated but midshipmen or other officers of the Navy. These will receive their first lessons at the school, where they will remain about two years, partly on shore, and partly on board of a vessel to be attached to the school, and to be employed in short cruises along the coast. At the end of this time they will be sent to sea on long voyages, and will continue in actual service for five or six years longer before they will be examined for promotion. During this time, they will be required to return to the academy, and prosecute their studies in naval architecture, and the higher branches of education, whenever they shall not be actually employed at sea, instead of wandering about, as they now too often do, in our cities, exposed to a thousand temptations, so difficult for the young to resist. By a rigid adherence to this plan, and raising the standard of attainments necessary for promotion, it is believed that the whole number of your midshipmen may become not only good practical seamen, but scientific officers and accomplished gentlemen; and this, with hardly any increased expense but the annual salaries of the professors. The pay of the midshipmen, and the cost of maintaining the vessel, are expenses to which we are already subjected. Sir, both in France and England, there are naval schools. The navies of those countries are steadily improving, and we must at least advance step by step with them. There is one other consideration, Mr. President, which presents the necessity of a naval academy in this country in such a point of view, that I am at a loss to conceive how it can be resisted. No nation can keep in actual service, in time of peace, one-fourth of the vessels necessary to be employed in war. In time of peace, therefore, by far the greater part of our Navy must be laid up in ordinary. But it is not only necessary to have the ships, but, what is of equal importance, you must have skilful and experienced officers to command them. Now, how is this to be accomplished? The whole number of officers now in the Navy would not be sufficient to command one-half of the vessels we now possess. Of this fact we have official information in the report of the Secretary of the Navy, made to Congress two years ago, showing the number of officers necessary for the command of our vessels on a war establishment. In Europe, provision is made for the requisite number of officers in war by employing a much larger number in peace than would be consistent with the settled policy and economical habits of the United States. What, then, are we to do? Without experienced and skilful naval officers, ships are useless, and we cannot afford to employ in peace more than half the number that will be necessary in war. I insist, sir, that a naval academy will afford us the means of surmounting this difficulty in an easy, safe, and economical way. If nearly the whole number of your midshipmen were thoroughly educated men, and fit to be lieutenants, (which is notoriously not the case at present,) you could, in the event of a war, fill up the post captains from your master commandants, complete the list of masters from your lieutenants, and make as many of your midshipmen lieutenants as the service might require. You could then have remaining perhaps about one-half of the requisite number of well-instructed midshipmen, and no doubt can exist, that, with this number, the deficiency might be safely supplied from the promising young men of the country. The present organization of the officers would admit of no such arrangement. The number of well-instructed men, among either the lieutenants or the midshipmen, are not, and never can be, sufficient to afford the means of filling up the higher grades. I have made a calculation on the subject, from which it appears that a moderate addition to the present number of midshipmen, with the aid of a naval school, would enable us to maintain in peace, and at a very reasonable expense, a number of officers sufficient to command all our vessels in time of war; and I do not perceive how this can be accomplished in any other way.

I have now gone through what I intended to say on this subject. In proposing the appropriation of half a million of dollars a year for the gradual improvement of the navy, the committee deemed it fair and proper to introduce into the bill all the objects to which it was proposed to apply that fund. The Senate thus have a connected view of all that it is designed to do for the improvement of the Navy, and by taking their opinion on each proposition separately, we know that nothing can be retained in the bill which has not a majority in its favor. If this bill shall pass, very little will remain to be done, for several years to come, for the advancement of the Navy. It will be necessary, indeed, to give a better organization to the peace establishment, and to revise the Rules and Regulations for the Government of the Navy, both of which objects will engage the early and earnest attention of the committee, at the next session. Nothing further will then remain to be done, but to keep the system in vigorous and harmonious operation, in order to fulfil the proudest hopes of the nation in relation to the Navy. If, sir, I shall have the good fortune to contribute in any degree to elevate the naval character of the country, and to add vigor to this "right arm of our national defence," I shall consider it as one of the happiest incidents of my life.

Gradual Improvement of the Navy.

[SENATE.]

Mr. ROBBINS then rose. He said, to the very able and impressive exposition made by the Chairman of the Naval Committee of the principle of the bill, and of its details, I beg to add a few words only on the subject of the naval academy. I propose to speak merely to this abstract question: Is it expedient for the United States to establish a naval academy? I shall forbear to touch upon those principles upon which the plan should be formed and adjusted, in order to ensure its anticipated results. These principles would open an interesting field of inquiry; but a field too wide to be attempted on the present occasion: for, among other things, it would lead to the examination of certain opinions, which appear to me, however consecrated by great names, or by long and almost universal adoption in practice, to be erroneous, opinions which have an extensive but most pernicious influence upon the whole business of education; opinions which abridge its improvement, in all instances, and, in many, occasion its total failure. But, then, to do this, we must go back to principles, must go into explanations, must give illustrations. Now, neither is the time fitting for this exposition, nor would it be seasonable till first we are agreed as to the expediency of the thing itself. It appears to me, if a navy is to be a part of our system of common defence, for our common security, that we must have a naval academy; that is, if we intend to adapt our means to the ends we have in view. Genius is the gift of nature; but art is the gift of education. This is true of all the arts, not excepting the slightest: it is eminently true of the great art of war; and no less of its naval than of its military branch. No man was ever born an artist in any art, not even in that of poetry, though it is said, poeta nascitur, non fit. But this is a saying of poetic vanity or poetic license. The genius is born, but the poet is made, and made by education, as every artist must be. It may happen that this education may be wholly given to the individual by the individual himself; he then is supposed to have had no education; whereas, in truth, he has then had the best; and that which never fails, unless nature has failed to give him an aptitude for his pursuit. Some individuals of this class (I mean the self-educated class) have astonished the world by their power, and have astonished it the more, as nothing in them is attributed to education, but every thing to the force of nature; whereas, in truth, these are the very individuals who, of all others, were the most indebted to education: for learning, that is, to know what others have known, is not education, as it is commonly supposed to be. Education is that system of exercise which develops and perfects the faculties of the individual; and which system is dictated and formed, as to the given art, by the principles of that art. Here is found the true secret of those results which astonish us so much in the education of the ancients: its infallibility, in every instance in which nature had given the faculty to be improved; the rapidity of its operation in developing the faculty and giving to it its ultimate perfection; and the sublime heights to which that perfection ascended: results so astonishing, that they would be incredible to us, if we had them only in history or tradition, and had not the monuments remaining to attest their existence. If a country is to have a particular kind of talent for its service, it must be indebted for it to the appropriate education; and the only question is, whether it will depend for this education upon accident or upon system; upon such education as it may happen that individuals may happen to give themselves, or upon such as the country may provide, and by which it may be certain that the kind of talent wanted will be produced, and will be forthcoming when wanted, and as wanted? No one, I think, will hesitate to say, that the latter of the two, system rather than accident, will be the preferable resource. All our prosperity, all our prospects of its continuance and increase, depend on our security; that depends on our means of common defence, and the efficiency of those means. Now, the Navy is the principal mean of those means; it is the right arm of the Union; and the strength of that arm depends upon that skill which education alone can give. The revenues of the country depend on its commerce; that depends on its protection; and that, again, on the Navy; the Navy on its tactics; and these on education.

In every point of view, therefore, looking at our security; looking at all our interests depending on that security; we see that this education is indispensable. But it may be said, that the Navy itself is a naval school. It is so; it is valuable and indispensable as a school; but we want this academy as subsidiary to this school; as the means of giving to that school the most perfect efficiency. A blind mechanical practice, no doubt, will improve the faculty, and make a tolerable artist; but it is only that enlightened exercise, which is directed and regulated by principle, that makes the consummate artist in any art. It is the combination of science and discipline that is wanted; and this may be, and will be, effected, by means of the academy, and is not to be expected without one; at least, not with the same certainty, nor to the same extent. The army, too, is a military school; still we have one military academy, and some are contemplating the establishment of another. Can there be any doubt but this institution is providing the country with military talent far beyond what the discipline of the army alone would provide it? I should suppose there could be but one answer to that question. The navy of Great Britain, too, is a naval school—a most excellent school; still Great Britain has a naval academy. The navy of France, too, is a naval school, not so good, perhaps, as the British or the American, but still a school; yet France has a naval academy. These older and more experienced countries have found it of great use, as no doubt we should, to connect the preparatory institution of an academy with the subsequent and perfecting discipline of the Navy. The expense of the institution will be something, it is true; but nothing to be felt as a burthen on the finances of the country; nothing to be compared to the benefit of the results to be anticipated from the institution. Still, I am aware that the expediency must depend, more or less, upon the plan itself of the institution. That a plan may be devised that will make it expedient for the country, I have no doubt: that a plan may be devised that will make it the most useful of all our institutions, I have no doubt—not only as to its direct effect on the Navy itself, but by its collateral effect in practically illustrating the infinite effect of education, when conducted on its proper principles.

I take leave, in conclusion, to suggest one other consideration, which, however visionary it may appear to others, has weight with me, and constitutes one source of my anxiety for this establishment. The day, I think, is coming—I hope it is a distant day—when the United States will be obliged to dispute for the supremacy of the ocean. It is evident that the statesmen of Great Britain are looking forward, and not without anxiety, to the possibility, nay, to the probability of such a contest, and with us. Desperate, desperate indeed, will be the battles in which that question will be decided. Not like the battle of the Nile, or the battle of Trafalgar, where the combatants were unequal; they will be battles in which Greek will meet Greek; battles, in which the whole resources of valor and of discipline, of genius and of science, will, on both sides, be displayed and exhausted; battles, that will resound through history in all future time. It is evident, I say, that Great Britain is looking forward to that important day; that she considers the United States as the only power over likely to dispute with her the empire of the seas; that if that sceptre which she now holds, and has held so long, is ever to be wrested from her grasp, the United States are to wrest it. In these opinions of hers, are to be found the true secret of those commercial regulations of which we so much complain—regulations in which her commercial interest seem as little consulted as our own. The object of them is not commerce, but policy; the object is to retard the growth of our commercial marine; to put off, and, if possible, to prevent, the evil day which she apprehends may come. I called it a secret, but it is no secret. This object has been most distinctly avowed by one of her most leading statesmen, in speaking of the policy of Great Britain in her navigation laws: I allude to the speech of Mr. Huskisson, delivered in the House of Commons, in May last. He says: "The House is aware that our navigation laws have a twofold object; first, to create and maintain in this country a great commercial marine; and, secondly, an object, not less important in the eyes of statesmen, to prevent any one other nation from engrossing too large a portion of the navigation of the rest of the world." Hence we see why other commercial, but minor States, have commercial arrangements made with them, and favorable to them, which are refused to the United States. Of the growth of the commercial marine of those States, she is not jealous; she has no occasion to be; but of the growth of the commercial marine of the United States, she is jealous, and would gladly restrain that growth. She sees in the infant Navy of the United States, a young giant, and anticipates with alarm, its growing strength. Now, as she is looking to the future, and acting with reference to the future, as regards the United States, ought not the United States to be equally provident of the future, as regards Great Britain? Equally attentive to all the means which may best qualify them to meet the demands of that future? Let prudence make the reply. But, however visionary this speculation may be in me—however little consideration it may receive, or be entitled to receive, from others—still, I flatter myself that the other grounds on which the adoption of this measure has been urged, will not be deemed visionary, nor insufficient to procure for it the approbation of the Senate.

Mr. CHANDLER said, that the bill reminded him of the Alkoran; he believed that nearly every chapter in it begun somehow in this way—God is great, or God is good; and almost every section of this bill begins with "the President of the United States shall be, and he is hereby, authorized." And, if he understood the Chairman of the Naval Committee, it became necessary to leave so much in the discretion of the President, because the committee could not agree how one thing should be done, or where the other should be done; and that the committee did not believe that the Senate would be more likely to agree than the committee. This was sufficient to satisfy him (Mr. C.) that the bill was not sufficiently understood, and that it embraced such important principles, he did not believe it could be understood during the few remaining days of the session. As there was so much other important business which must be acted upon, he, therefore, moved to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. SILSBEE observed, that the gentleman from South Carolina had, in his remarks upon dry-docks, said, that, in heaving vessels down for the purpose of repairing, great injury was done. He had often been led to observe this fact. It was the custom in building ships, to put salt between the timbers. In heaving down, the salt often became injured by being wet, and the seams were impaired. This was a continual source of injury, as every ship must, after remaining any time in port, be hove out before going to sea, first on one side, and then on the other. The strain, in doing this, was very great; and it was impossible, in most instances, to do it in the Winter. He had heard many naval architects say, that they would not take the responsibilities upon themselves of heaving out a ship in the Winter. In New England, this custom has been abandoned, since the erection of railways, and so great was the employment for those establishments, and such their advantage, that ships were often delayed a month for their chance in the railway; and it was also in contemplation to establish dry-docks. If a ship was now ordered to go to sea, it would be necessary to examine her, and make repairs. To do this by the former process much time must be taken up, beside the danger incurred in the process; while a vessel could be taken on, examined, and discharged, from a dock, in a few days, without the slightest risk or injury. He was therefore very desirous that this portion of the bill should be retained.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said, he had never heard a clearer elucidation of a bill, than had been made by the Chairman of the Naval Committee; nor did he think a bill had ever been drawn in a more able or more careful manner. Every provision had been weighed with judgment, and he gave his entire coincidence in the measure. If he understood the design of this bill, it was the outline of naval improvement, which was hereafter to be filled up by Congress, as necessity required, or as should be thought fit. It took up certain great objects, and commenced a plan by which they were to be attained. The first provision in the bill was one of very great importance—the accumulation of timber. We have now in store, timber for the erection of a certain number of ships of the line. But when that is exhausted, what was then to be done? And suppose another war should overtake us: suppose Great Britain should again impress our seamen? We cannot shut up our ports as a means of defence, unless we wish to starve our merchants; but must meet them with unequal force. But if, by accumulating timber and other materials, we go on and build twelve ships of the line, retaining the means to increase our navy as necessity may require, we might then defy our enemies: we might say to England and France, thus far you may go, but no farther. If England invaded us, we might throw into the scale the trade of France; or, if France invaded, the trade of England; and thus keep up the equilibrium of prosperity. Timber was an essential article for the increase of the navy; because without proper care and management, it became unsound, or so far exhausted as to make it difficult to obtain a supply. Of copper, he thought there was no need of making provision, as this country produced it in sufficient quantities for any emergency. If cordage was stored for future use, it would be lost by decay. Besides, there was never a scarcity of that article. So that he considered it advisable to pass the bill as it stood, and make any additions hereafter, as they might be suggested by experience. The subject of dry-docks had been so well and so fully treated by the gentlemen from South Carolina and Massachusetts, that he did not think it necessary for him to add any thing in relation to it. He should only say, that although he was not fond of referring decisions to the Executive, under all circumstances, he could not but think that the committee had taken a wise course in this case. Had the location been left to Congress, it might have brought on a debate, which might have lost the bill. He remembered an instance of a debate which took place upon the location of a fortification. Every member had a favorite site, which was, in his opinion, better than any other; and it was finally found to be necessary to leave the location to the President. This was a polite manner of commanding the President to make the location, and it was, in fact, putting no individual discretion into his hands. He would do it with the advice of experienced officers, well acquainted with the subject, and would also apply to the Navy Board. So that, upon the whole, it was better to leave it to the Executive, than to be debated for in Congress. On the subject of the Naval Academy, the gentleman from Maine appeared to think it useless, as all the education required could be obtained on board ship. Mr. S. believed the officers would find but poor education there. There were many reasons why an academy was as much required to be attached to our Navy as to our army. Our army fight at home and do not need that thorough acquaintance with many branches of study, that is required by naval officers. Our Navy, on the other hand, visit all parts of the world, and it was necessary that the officers should be acquainted, not only with navigation, but with the French and Spanish languages. The former has become common in this, and in every civilized country. The latter was fast becoming so; and considering the intercourse which existed, and was fast increasing, between this country and the South American Republics, was highly important, and necessary to finish the education of naval officer. There were other branches of learning still more essential, and which could not often be mastered on board. He had known many midshipmen of talents, who had served seven years, who had a thorough knowledge of tactics, and were in every respect promising young men, who could not pass the Board of Examiners for want of sufficient knowledge of astronomy and mathematics. Their situation alone and the absence of the facilities, prevented them from attaining the necessary qualifications. It was not to be supposed that midshipmen should be able to obtain all their knowledge of navigation, in a school. But Spanish, French, mathematics, and astronomy, they could attain there; and they would thus be enabled, when they were abroad, to appear in any society, to the credit of themselves and their country. A sufficient knowledge of these branches could be obtained in two or three years, and they then would commence their career at sea, and finish their education by learning the management of a ship, her guns, &c. As the midshipmen in the service of the United States could not rise by favor, it was plain that they must have merit to obtain promotion. As it was at present, they could not be promoted until after nine years' service; and they surely ought to have every facility to enable them to rise after that period, if they had merit to entitle them to advancement. To bring forward young officers entitled by their qualities to distinction, this school would have an admirable effect, and, in every view, it appeared to him as promising the most beneficial influence in advancing the character, and increasing the confidence of the people, in the right arm of our defences, and in adding to the composure and security with which this country would meet a future war, which, although now apparently far off, might, at some future period, visit us. Should such a time arrive, the chief means of repelling invasion would be found to exist in our maritime armaments; and then the nation would have cause to rejoice at the timely prudence that had strengthened the sinews and enlarged the growth of our gallant Navy.

Mr. NOBLE said, for his own part, he looked with a favorable eye upon this bill; not because he was to reap any peculiar advantages from it, but because the wise people of the present generation were now returning, and he was glad to see it, to the good old-fashioned John Adams system of national defence. He would not now stop to inquire who had formerly cast so much reproach and ridicule upon it; nor would he say what fanciful gunboat systems had intervened. Let them all pass—they were only worth remembering for the sake of the lesson that was to be learnt from them. In going back to former times, he might have asked what new terror had made gentlemen afraid to trust the President? Afraid to trust the President—to do what? Why, to do what belongs to his duty—to consult the officers about him, upon subjects which come directly under their observation, and make a decision from the advice he may obtain! He did not see what this fear could arise from, and it was a new subject of apprehension. I am glad [said Mr. N. in conclusion] that our statesmen have at last come back to the naval policy of John Adams, notwithstanding the manner in which it has been traduced; and now they had done so, he hoped they would stick to it: for wisdom late found, was better than none. He rejoiced to see men of intelligence come out in support of the Navy, which he looked upon as the right arm of the country. He hoped its interests and welfare would be attended to, steadily, and permanently; and then, if war came, the country would know where to look for defence.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, said he could not vote for the whole of the bill at this time. He wished to have that portion relating to a Naval Academy struck out. The subject to him was a new one, and it would be attended with expense, of the extent of which they were not yet aware. He thought the Senate should have more information on this subject before it acted. If this portion was stricken out, and time allowed to investigate the subject, he would vote for the bill. He, therefore, moved to strike out the 7th, 8th, 9th, 10th, and 11th, sections.

Mr. HAYNE said that he would give his colleague all the information in his power on the subject. The proposition in relation to a Naval School, was not a new one. It had been acted upon during the last session, had been recommended by the Executive the session before, and had also been most fully discussed. As to the expense, information was last year requested of the Secretary of the Navy, who had given an estimate, which it was supposed was as accurate as any computation upon the subject could be made. That estimate gave, as the probable cost of the establishment of the school, 30,000 dollars. The permanent expense of the establishment was computed at a much smaller sum than that required for the support of the Military Academy. Many of the professors of the naval school, it was proposed to select from the officers of the Navy, already in the pay of the Government; so that the charge for professorships would be comparatively small. The pupils were not expected to be as numerous as those at the Military Academy; and it was also to be taken into consideration that the sloop of war to be attached to the school, was not to be specially appointed for that purpose, but was to be one stationed on the coast, on actual service; consequently, the midshipmen and officers, while employed on board, would take the place of others, and thus be no extra expense, as the same number of officers must be employed, whether there was a school or not. On the whole, he thought the annual expense of the academy would not go beyond a few thousand dollars. He had said thus much for the information of his colleague. If, after all, he should not be satisfied, Mr. H. could only say that he should regret it.

Mr. H. further observed, that it was not supposed that the school would be, by any means, an expensive one.

The question on the motion of Mr. SMITH was then taken, and decided in the negative, 19 to 21.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, said he was not now prepared to pass a bill so important as this, without a full investigation of its merits. He had not the honor of a seat in the Senate during the sessions in which this provision had been discussed. He was, therefore, unacquainted with the grounds which had been taken for and against it. He had listened to the eloquent remarks of his colleague this morning; but, in doing that, he had heard only one side of the question. As this was a time of profound peace, he did not think a Naval Academy immediately necessary. At all events, he wished time to consider the subject, and express his opinion upon it. He would, therefore, move to lay the bill upon the table until to-morrow, but waived his motion at the request of his colleague.

Some further conversation took place between Messrs. HAYNE, JOHNSON of Ken., and HOLMES; when Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, having renewed the motion made by Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina—the bill was ordered to lie on the table till to-morrow.

FRIDAY, February 16.

Naval Academy.

The Senate resumed the unfinished business of yesterday, which was the consideration of the bill for the Gradual Improvement of the Navy.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, moved to strike out the 7th, 8th, 9th, and 10th sections, providing for the erection and government of a Naval Academy. He had the honor yesterday to offer some objections to this feature of the bill, as worthy more mature consideration, for which he had wished it to lay over for a separate investigation. He had no objection to the other parts of the bill; but agreed entirely in the views entertained by the Naval Committee, of the importance of preserving a store of live oak timber for future use, providing thereby a permanent stock, to be kept until called for by future exigency. This object had been thought of formerly, and acts passed upon it. Whether the object had been fully attained, was very doubtful at any rate, he saw no objection to the passage of the present bill, so far as this object was contemplated. Nor did he find any objection to the plan which had been promulgated, in relation to dry-docks. He had believed, before he heard the able argument in their favor, of his colleague, that they were, if not absolutely necessary, at least very useful; and that, besides the services to be expected from them, they promised in the end, to lessen the expenditure of the Government for the repair of ships. Thus far, he went with the committee and their bill. But here he must stop. Useful as he believed these provisions, he should not, on principle, vote for the bill, if the project of a Naval Academy were to be retained. To this project he had the most insuperable objections, founded, not only on theoretical speculations, but upon practical experience. It was true, that his colleague had said that the subject was discussed, and its merits settled in the Senate last year; but to Mr. S. this was no argument for letting it pass at this time. He was not present last year, and consequently the discussion was lost to him. If others had been convinced, he also required to be, before he could give his sanction to this contemplated institution. What he had heard yesterday, from his colleague, did not at all satisfy him, and he could not subscribe to the doctrines that gentleman then advanced, or the effects anticipated by him. There was already a Military Academy in this country; and as the plan laid down for the imitation of Government, in the formation of the Naval Academy, was drawn from the institution at West Point, he thought it would be but fair to deduce from the condition and effects of that already established, the measure of good or evil to be attained or feared by the erection of the institution projected. Whatever good tendency the Military Academy might have had upon our military character, or upon the organization of the Army, he believed there were many very sensible men who felt as much anxiety for the defence of the country as could be felt by any patriotic mind, yet who thought this military system carried too far. He believed, in 1802, the number of students at West Point was only ten, and it was then the sole object of the institution to rear Engineers for the purpose of surveying the vast country which we possess, and to elevate our Army in this peculiar branch of the science of war to a level with those of other countries. But the character of this institution changed as it advanced, by the operation of various circumstances, until, at length, we find it at the present moment, containing upwards of 260 students. He had thought that one of the laws relating to this Academy, had limited the number of cadets to 250; but, on reference being had to the Attorney-General, he gave it as his opinion that the 250 to which the number was limited, were in addition to the ten admitted by the law of 1802. Thus the number had risen to 260. And, to him, it appeared that this was carrying the military establishment too far. Did the United States want, as Engineers, all the men who would thus obtain military educations? Certainly not. Were they wanted to fill the ranks of the army? The army is now overflowing. What then was the necessity for such an overflow of military education? He was not one who would wish to stint the country in the means of defence; nor was he one who wished a military spirit to become too general. But for every useful military purpose he looked upon the vast expenditure to which the country was subjected by the Military Academy, as, in a great measure, a useless waste. The question which suggested itself to his mind, was, whether all this education would make men victorious Generals; whether they could serve their country with a better chance of success? And to what but experience and facts could the question be referred? If we go back to history, we shall find martial feats achieved with as much gallantry and as complete success, as in modern times, with the exception perhaps, of a single instance. The fame of Julius Cæsar, and his victories, were in the mouth of every one. Yet Julius Cæsar was not reared up in a Military Academy. He was a Roman lawyer, knowing in his early life no more of military education, than did any other civilian of that city—but his battles have been looked upon as exhibiting consummate skill, as well as uncommon valor. But to come down to modern times, the Duke of Marlborough had seldom been equalled in his day for bravery and success; yet he was not educated in a Military Academy; nor was the Maid of Orleans, whose acts have excited wonder and admiration, acquainted with the rules of scientific warfare; but whether by witchcraft or valor, she contrived to overthrow the armies of England, headed by learned and experienced leaders. In our own times, even in our late war, where were our most successful generals educated? Where did Generals Brown, Miller, and Scott, or where did Colonel Towson obtain their education? Not in a Military Academy. They were taught in the field; and their talents and bravery pointed out the way to victory, better than any education they could have received. Without education, they displayed as much gallantry as was ever displayed in any age. Mr. S. believed the acts of Towson and Miller had seldom, if ever, been excelled. He would ask the gentleman on his left, (General HARRISON,)—he was not informed where he was reared; but certainly not in a Military Academy—whether, in the actions in which he was so successfully engaged, he found the absence of education any drawback upon bravery, or any bar to success? (He Mr. S.) was not a military man, and tacticians might say that he was arguing against the acknowledged lights of science. But give me a brave man for the deeds of war, and I care little about his acquirements. Proofs were before their eyes every day, to show that military talent would unfold itself, whenever an opportunity offered, without establishing nurseries for its cultivation. Who has behaved more gallantly, or fought more successfully than General Jackson? And was he brought up in a Military Academy? No. He was bred to the law, and sat upon the bench; and had gone no farther than to be a General of militia, until the late war. Yet, his achievements were equal to those of any general, in any age, and had added much to the glory of our country. These men, whose names he had mentioned, were accomplished gentlemen, their manners were polished; but they were not learned at an Academy. They had raised the renown of our country to an equality with that of the most heroic nation; yet they owed little or nothing to education. What, then, was the necessity of an Academy to teach engineering when such men could be produced without it? Mr. S. said he had before him half a sheet of paper filled with a list of the studies attended to at West Point, taken from an able report upon the subject. (He here read them.) There were certainly many among them which would as well have suited any other course of education as military. He had asked yesterday what would be the probable cost of the projected Naval Academy; and he had been informed by his colleague that 80,000 dollars would probably cover all expenses. But this did not include any thing further than the erection of the building, &c. Contingent expenses and current expenditures were not taken into consideration. The annual expenditure of the Military Academy was 80,000 dollars; the pay of the cadets amounted to 48,000 dollars—he believed it was nineteen dollars monthly pay. But it was worth while to ask who goes to this institution? And this was a delicate question, he would allow, because the truth was perhaps the most disagreeable thing that could be said. The sons of Members of Congress were the candidates, and in some instances, three or four were sent in succession. The sons of the Judges were also educated at the Military Academy. All men in power could educate their children at the expense of the Government. It was impossible that it should be otherwise, when it was only through Congress that the public could approach the institution. The members record their cadets, and it is then left to the Department. The members record, as a matter of course, their own sons or those of their friends. A few wealthy men wished to have their sons educated: they brought them up to the age of 14, with a common education, and then they are educated and entertained for five years at the public expense. About 60 left the Academy every year, and occasioned that number of vacancies to be contested for by members of Congress and others. Was this consistent with the first object of the institution? This system did not point out the advancement of youths who had given proofs of merit—but according to the influence and standing of those who recommend them. You educate a mass of young men, and who from among them goes into the Army? Now and then one. One, perhaps, out of twenty. And it was of some importance to know whether there could be no change of this system? Whether members of Congress were always to be called upon to support institutions in which they alone, or nearly so, were interested? Whether there should still be set before them this severe trial between their duties and their interests? I say, said Mr. S., you cannot resist this system. Resistance has been set up against it, but has universally been voted down; and instead of taking the sons of soldiers, who died in battle, and who thus have a collateral claim to the gratitude of the country, the sons of members of Congress, officers of the Government, and other great men of the nation, seem alone to be entitled to entrance at the Academy. The privilege of admission had become one of the instruments of Congressional influence, and by that alone would they be decided. As to the real utility of the establishment, its advocates might, he thought, be induced to abate some of their admiration, when it was known that many of the students, on their retirement from the institution, never thought of going into the army. Many went into the profession of the law, and other pursuits, for which the country need not have expended its funds. If, then, the students educated at the Academy were in no way bound to serve the country, to which they had been indebted for a good education; or if they were not wanted in the army, and therefore allowed to follow any other course of life that might suit them, why was the establishment maintained in its present extent? Why carry military education beyond the necessity for its application, unless it was intended to make our citizens all soldiers? He should not inquire what effect the education of five additional cadets would have hereafter on the Government. It was, however, a subject worthy of consideration. He would now come to the Naval Academy, which he considered so nearly of the same character as to be readily compared with the Military Academy, upon which he had detained the Senate so long, from the conviction that a statement of the operation of the one would aptly describe that of the other. He had made some little research since this plan had first come under his observation; but he had not been informed that such an establishment existed in any other country, from whom we were often fond of borrowing, and who held out to this country, in many important points, the light of experience. He believed that no such institution existed as yet—and it might reasonably be asked why England, so proud of her naval importance, and so loud in trumpeting forth her naval superiority, had never established a Naval Academy? Or why had not France, which had so often strove to raise a naval force, to defend herself from her old and habitual enemy, never hit upon the plan of a Naval Academy for the perfection of her officers? If he should be in error, in this respect—should it prove that such establishments did exist in England and France—at least England had produced naval heroes who owed none of their advancement or success to the education to be obtained in such an establishment. The celebrated Lord Nelson, on whose name the British people have bestowed so much honor, was not bred to the profession of which he was so bright an ornament; while playing on shore, he was put on board a ship, and there learned to conquer the enemies of his country. He did not idle away his time at a Naval School, or amuse himself alternately at sea. He was not acquainted with all the abstruse sciences which had now become requisite for a naval commander; but he knew what was by far most essential, the science of being victorious. His friend and colleague had yesterday praised, with much eloquence, the intelligence of our naval heroes. But he (Mr. S.) had thought that some of our most accomplished heroes were unacquainted with the studies of an academy. At the beginning of the war with Great Britain, our Navy consisted of a few ships, five only of which were frigates; and it was confidently believed that the British, with their thousand ships, would blow this paltry force out of the water in a month. Yet, in this small way we began; and through the activity of our Government, and the bravery and enterprise of our officers, and seamen, how different was the result! The Navy went on increasing in numbers and in glory, and the deeds of its commanders shed a lustre over the country. The heroes who won the laurels in those conflicts, were never excelled in all the characteristics of heroism. Where were Hull and Bainbridge raised? Was it in an academy that they gained their knowledge of ships, their dauntless courage, and presence of mind, or the address which ensured their success? They were, if he did not mistake, engaged, previous to the war, in the merchants' service—having then no Navy of any importance; and we were obliged to take such men. Nor did they fall short of any more educated officers. Where was Decatur reared? Not in a Naval Academy. His education was obtained at sea; and in the early part of his life he pursued a corsair off Tripoli, and avenged the death of his brother, in a manner so heroic, that the deed was numbered among the most brilliant feats of modern chivalry. And he would ask whether, if, as had been argued by his colleague, the Naval School would polish the manners of the officers, it could make them more accomplished than were those gentlemen whom he had mentioned, or indeed than any of our naval commanders? The manners of those officers were such, to use the words of his colleague, as would "grace any drawing room." Have we any reason to regret that their education was not more perfect; or is there any deficiency to be noticed in that respect in their public services? There was not one instance, in the whole course of the war, in which they did not act with the greatest gallantry. Even down to the privates, there was a devotedness to the service, and to duty, displayed, which claimed the praise and admiration of the country. Do these facts, said Mr. S., argue the necessity for a Naval Academy? Our naval officers have thus far gone to sea, and learned their duties there, where they were to be performed, and not by nursing themselves in idleness on shore. They could do so still, and it would be better for the service. They were brought up in the school of adversity, and were early taught, by service and danger, to scorn the hardships and defy the vicissitudes of the sea. Men, tutored in this manner, were ever at their posts; and in troubled times might be depended upon. It seemed that this Academy was to make room for a great many midshipmen, in addition to the present number. And why was this addition to be made? The ships were already full. Only a few days since, he (Mr. S.) applied for a situation in the navy for a young man of fine qualities, and was told that there were no vacancies. How, then, was it necessary that an establishment should be made for the education of midshipmen not in employment? How was it necessary to erect a Naval Academy for the instruction of young officers, when no room remained for them, as the situations were all filled? The United States Navy would soon comprise twelve ships of the line and fifteen frigates. And where were they? They were, some of them, laid up, and the reason given for it was, that there were not officers enough to man the whole of our ships. He saw, himself, a few years since, two of them covered up at Boston to keep them from the weather. There was also one in Philadelphia, and one in this city, in the same predicament: the house to cover one of which cost seventy thousand dollars. And Congress appointed officers to man those ships when there was no use for them, and they were allowed to spend their time in idleness. Where are your midshipmen? They are staying on furloughs from year's end to year's end; amusing themselves wherever they are inclined to go, without a thought of their duty. These were not the men, who, when called suddenly into action, would do their duties with good effect. No; the men who were to be expected to perform those signal acts of skill and bravery for which our Navy had hitherto been characterized, were of a different mould. They were not those who were closeted in their studies, in learned ease, and there acquired a knowledge of the management of ships. They must be able to dare and to do. Theory was useless to them without practice: and that practice was to be had on the ocean alone. Mr. S. thought this provision misplaced in the present bill. It contemplated a new principle, and he thought required separate investigation, and to be the subject of a distinct bill. He apprehended that the subject of the Naval Academy was not matured. There were many important questions in relation to it, yet to be settled. Who was to go there? Where were two hundred and fifty midshipmen to be chosen, when the ships were already full? In case of war, these officers must be withdrawn from the Academy. Their requirements, however, would hardly fit them for active service: and it would be found that accomplishments which would fit men to appear to advantage in the courts of France and Spain, would not be of much value in active service. If our officers are to prepare for any thing, it is for war—and not to become ambassadors at foreign courts. Enough of them could be found in other walks. The Navy does not want a host of tender youths, carefully nursed and indulged in a quiet life; neither did it stand in need of a troop of silk-stocking gentry to lead to battle our hardy seamen, who would look with contempt upon trifling or effeminate leaders. These are not the men to add to the victories already achieved. As to the filling up of the school, he believed that it would be done in imitation of the process in gaining admission to West Point. Members of Congress, and their friends; officers of Government, &c., would be the first on the list. Their fathers being great men in the nation, it would be supposed, as a matter of course, that the sons would also be great. But this was not always the case. The race of giants sometimes dwindled; and the sons of great and wise men often proved any thing but great and wise. The sire may be a man of talents, and the son a dunce. Even the renowned Tully, whose eloquence gained him the admiration of Rome and of the world, expended great care and expense in educating his son Marcus, who, after all, turned out to be a blockhead. So it would frequently happen. This would fill the institution with lads of every character: some with a disposition for the business in which they were to be engaged, and some of a different character. The establishment would be filled by the sons of rich men. Every wealthy individual, who had a chubby-checked boy for whom he had as yet chosen no profession, would send him to the Naval Academy. The genius of men was often discovered by chance; and to this the United States was probably indebted for much of her naval talent. Perry, McDonough, and Rodgers, whose names he had not yet alluded to, were not educated to the profession. He believed the latter had been a farmer until he was of age. Merit promoted him; and as there was no disposition in this country, at large, to elevate one man at the expense of another, through an idea of hereditary superiority, he saw no reason to doubt that merit would hereafter raise, in a similar manner, men whose natural abilities fitted them for any particular station; and that a sufficient portion of the talent of the nation would be directed to the cultivation of naval science. But supposing that the disposition and talent for the profession were capable of being produced by an education at a Naval Academy, there were still branches of naval knowledge which could not be attained in such an institution. The navigation of a ship could never be learned on shore, nor could a man be made a good seaman in an Academy. Much had been said of the sudden rise of our naval power during the last war; and just encomiums had been passed upon the officers whose conduct had elevated its character so high. But who gave the first impulse to the Navy?

Naval Academy.

[SENATE.]

It was not the Government: it was not capable of producing the effects which resulted from it. The men who raised and sustained its high character were peculiar in being fitted for what they performed. They were not brought up in academies; they were nursed on the ocean, and familiar with its perils. The intelligence which they possessed, and the polished manners which it is supposed are attainable in a school, were gained in a continual intercourse with the world. Go to your wharves, said Mr. S., and you will find that the sea-captains in your merchants' service are gentlemen: they have become so by constant associations with men of various nations. In most instances, you will find them highly intelligent; and the knowledge they possess is of the best and most useful kind—because it is practical. The merchants' service is the great school in which naval officers and seamen are to be instructed; and it is dangerous to close the Navy to those who are educated in it. He looked upon the endeavor to establish a Naval Academy as likely to jeopardize the safety of the essential principles on which the Navy of the United States is founded. The preliminaries only were settled by the bill: all the details were to be left to future enactments, or to Executive discretion: such as who should be the pupils, and what the expenditure of the Academy. It was not that he would intimate that any fear was to be entertained of the present Administration; but others were to come after, and what is here begun, as a small matter, may result in great injury to the service to which it is attached. Was Congress to establish an Academy to be under the direction of one individual? Or in what manner would the details be decided upon? These were questions which appeared to him to be of moment. He was a friend of the Navy, and was in favor of every measure which would really tend to its benefit. Every other provision of the bill appeared to him salutary and worthy of support: but he could not give support now to the simple declaration of Congress that there should be a Naval Academy, without any details being fixed upon; leaving all future arrangements for carrying this decision into execution unexplained. The details were important, and ought to be settled. If this provision was struck from the present bill, he should vote for it—otherwise he could not. He was convinced that the whole bill went too far, and that its great error was the proposition for an Academy, which ought to have been reserved for separate consideration.

Mr. HARRISON said he should content himself with a few observations in reply to the gentleman from South Carolina, and should confine himself chiefly to the remarks of that gentleman in relation to the Military Academy and its results; and the bearing which those remarks had upon the project of a Naval School on similar principles. He has called on us to say whether the events of the late war do not show that such institutions are needless. To this, as a military man, I cannot refrain from putting in a negative declaration. Whatever the experience of other Generals may have been, said Mr. H., I can say for myself that, had it not been for the science and skill attained at a Military Academy, I should probably never have enjoyed the honor of addressing this body. I feel proud to say that the defence of Fort Mifflin, at which I commanded, chiefly depended upon the scientific exertions of a man to whom it is due that his worth should be here attested by me. I allude to the late Major Wood, a man who combined many valuable qualities, and who bade fair to have risen to a high point of professional eminence. Your commander had not sufficient science to have so successfully defended the post without the assistance of that individual. So far, therefore, as my experience goes, I am totally at variance with the gentleman from South Carolina. He thinks that an army can as well be commanded by an ignorant as a learned man. This position I deny to be correct in military any more than in other affairs. There have been instances, it is true, both in ancient and modern history, of ignorant men, who cut a considerable figure in military pursuits. But experience has shown that the fame acquired by such men has generally been obtained in operations against greater blockheads than themselves. The allusions made to the Roman Generals, was, he thought, peculiarly unhappy; for they were universally educated in schools where all the arts of war, and all the athletic exercises, fit to train men to masculine pursuits, were imparted to them from their infancy. And the great Roman orator, to whom the gentleman has alluded, was also a General. An instance of the power of science, in opposition to strength, and a strong proof that ignorance was not always successful, might be found in the battle of Cannæ. But, instead of seeking out the few cases in which ignorant men have been successful warriors, let us look at the vast number of instances in which individuals have established great characters for military achievements. In all the instances of great military renown, we find that it was obtained by the influence of the very qualities which the gentleman entirely undervalues and disregards.

As to the objection made by the gentleman from South Carolina, that the sons of rich men alone went to the Military Academy, Mr. H. was as strongly averse to such a practice as the gentleman himself could be; and in the other House, on a former occasion, he had made a proposition that the sons of soldiers, who had served their country, should be chosen as cadets for West Point—but it was rejected. As to the battles gained by ignorant men, they were generally explained with much ease. They either arose from some lucky accident, or were achieved over an adversary possessing even a less degree of skill and judgment.

Sometimes, also, great intrepidity, without judgment, gained great advantages; but it was unsafe to trust in such good fortune. A cautious and skilful adversary would not be overcome in this manner. Besides, those qualities which, in a lower grade of military rank, are useful and of great service, do not suffice in a commander. The talents which mark the character of a General, are not of the same grade with those of a subordinate. The former requires a great fund of natural common sense, quickness of perception, minute acquaintance with human character, a power of inspiring his soldiers with confidence in his directions, and of sustaining discipline amongst them. He must be able to understand the character of his adversary, so as to take the best advantage of his movements. It was true that a man who was not a proficient in military science would sometimes be as well calculated for the general direction of an action, or for the assault of a place, as a better educated man, because experience and sound judgment would supply the place of science. But, give to such a man the duty of arranging and constructing the works necessary for the defence of a post, and he would, said Mr. H., be as deficient as myself. Such an idea as this might be slighted by those who were unacquainted with military affairs, but considerations arose out of these facts, of great importance. In an army, the perfection of all the parts was the only sure ground of reliance for success. Therefore it was essential that science should be generally diffused among its officers. For, after all, the best plans were often overturned by slight accidents; and the greatest victories often depended upon the promptitude, the intelligence, and the judgment, with which the subordinate movements were made. Thus the greatest science in the General might be rendered useless, by the want of skilful officers to carry his commands into execution.

As to the naval officers, to whom the gentleman had alluded, Mr. H. believed he was, in some of his remarks, in error. For instance, Commodore Decatur did not enter the Navy until he was grown to manhood, and had received a good education. It was also within the knowledge of Mr. H. that Perry was an educated man. It was an argument which had rather surprised him, that education would not render our officers more devoted to their country. He thought, on the contrary, that a liberal course of instruction would serve to attach them to the country. There were other considerations of some importance. Numerous instances might be cited in which the characters of men, engaged in warlike pursuits, were humanized by education. Besides, it was too late in the day to endeavor to depreciate the benefits of education in any class of the community. By that alone were the free institutions of our country sustained; and when the great objects of science should have been neglected, he should consider this country on the high road to destruction. He could safely say, from a personal knowledge of the facts, that the school contemplated in the portion of the bill now under discussion, was of the most immediate necessity to our Navy. He had conversed with many midshipmen, and he found that they were generally of that situation in life in which their parents could not afford to educate them. The Navy was not a service into which rich men sent their sons; and it seemed but proper that the Government should prepare the officers in their youth for the duties which they would afterwards be called to perform. He felt none of the dislike expressed by the gentleman from South Carolina, to the indulgences granted these young men, or the genteel appearance which they were properly ambitious to support. Mr. H. wished them to be, as far as possible, accomplished men, who would, in foreign countries, do honor to the American character. They had shown a laudable zeal in endeavoring to improve themselves, as he was informed that the system had been generally adopted by the officers of the Navy, to set apart a portion of their pay for the purchase of books. Even this, he had no doubt, was productive of much good to the country, as it conferred much credit on the officers themselves. Many of our naval officers had shown themselves well acquainted with the laws of nations, and their communications with foreign powers had redounded to the honor of themselves and of the nation. Certainly these men deserved the favorable consideration, and the most liberal treatment from the Government. The country was in every respect interested in preparing them, by a proper education, for the arduous and perilous duties, to the performance of which their lives were devoted. Therefore, he considered the section of this bill, which provides for the establishment of a Naval School, one of its most valuable features, and he hoped it would meet the sanction of the Senate.

Mr. HAYNE said he could not, by reason of indisposition, go into the argument at any great length; but he could not allow this discussion to pass by without some notice, and a statement of his dissent from the views of his colleague. He has argued that some great and distinguished men have existed, who were not indebted to the education of an Academy for their eminence. He might even have gone farther, and shown that great men have appeared at various times, who raised themselves entirely by the force of natural genius. There are many cases of this kind, where highly gifted men, who came from the hands of their Creator with great qualities, have triumphed over their adverse conditions, and been enabled to educate themselves, at least in the pursuits in which they have excelled. But does it follow from this, that education is of no utility? Certainly not. Such men as he had described, who had known the want of early or systematic instruction, were always to be found among the most strenuous advocates of education. Franklin was an instance of this. He was deprived of early education, yet his whole life was, in various methods, devoted to its advancement. Gen. Jackson had never received any scientific instruction in military pursuits; but he had been heard in this very Hall, to support the interests, and defend the objects of the Military Academy. Generals Brown, Scott, and Towson, were also deprived of the benefit of a scientific education, and yet were among the warmest advocates of the Military Academy; and, indeed, there was no officer of eminence who was not absolutely friendly to that institution. Was it to be supposed, that, because great men had distinguished themselves without education, that it might be abolished? Or could it, from such premises, be argued that it was useless? Mr. H. then enumerated several striking instances of individuals, who had distinguished themselves without the benefit of regular education in naval science. But he observed these individuals obtained by practice, by the quickness of their perceptions, and the closeness of their observations, the skill and experience, by which they were insured the victory. It was nautical skill which led to all these triumphs. It was the very quality, although obtained in a different way, which his colleague thought of no importance. Every gentleman who had experience in these matters, would reply to those arguments in the language of the gentleman from Ohio. Men who had been in actual service, knew well the value of science and education, and those who had wanted them most, were the first to acknowledge the disadvantages resulting from their absence, in the direction of warlike operations. To contend that, because, without these requisites, victories have been gained, they are useless, would not be less unreasonable than to declare, because the Maid of Orleans triumphed over the enemies of France, our defence ought to be intrusted entirely to women. Had his colleague referred to the bill itself, he would not have needed to ask who would go to a Naval School, were it established? It provides that the midshipmen of the Navy, already in the service, shall be entered there. Hence, it would not be devoted to the sons of the rich, as had been intimated. The midshipmen, at present, are educated by the chaplains, on board the ships. Their education was very deficient, and they were deprived of almost every description of apparatus. Instead of this very imperfect system, should a Naval School be established, whenever a boy was admitted into the Navy, instead of being sent directly to sea, he would be placed in the school, where his mind would be formed, and his attention engaged in the theory of nautical science. All the rudiments of his profession will be taught him in advance, and he will go into actual service prepared to apply this knowledge to practice. While at school, he was not to be entirely deprived of an opportunity of becoming acquainted with the element on which his services, in after life, were to be required. A vessel was to be stationed on the coast, in connection with the institution, in which it was intended that the pupils should make short voyages, by turns, to teach them the management and organization of a ship and its crew. After a regular preliminary course of studies, they would be sent to sea, for a term of four or five years; and on their return, would again, instead of spending their time in idleness, be re-entered at the school.

As to the supposition that it would be merely a place of amusement, he would observe, that, if the institution was governed like that at West Point, it would be no place of amusement; but one of laborious study, and constant improvement. His colleague argued correctly, that, if the Military Academy was not useful, neither would a Naval School be so. But Mr. H. considered that to be a conceded point, and that the merits of that establishment had been thoroughly tested. Whether there was or was not any foundation for the complaint of favoritism in the appointment of cadets at West Point, the bill on the table would not extend or increase favoritism. It would not add a single individual to the list of midshipmen; but provide for the education of those already in the service. He had thought that the talents of the youths who were to be admitted to West Point was the first recommendation, and their being the sons of Revolutionary patriots the next. He had never offered but two candidates for appointments to West Point. One of them was the son of a Revolutionary soldier, whose family was left destitute, and he received it. The other was still pending, and was a similar case of a destitute family. He repeated, that, whatever might be the inexpediency of the manner of making those appointments, it did not apply to this bill, as no direction was given as to the appointments. In conclusion, Mr. H. said, he was happy that his colleague agreed to the general objects of the bill. He should have been still more so, had he been in favor of the section now under consideration, and was sorry that he threatened its rejection from the bill. The committee considered it best to incorporate all the objects which appeared to them important, in one bill; and not one of them appeared to him to promise more benefit to the Navy, or more calculated to elevate and improve it, than the establishment of a Naval School. The opinion of the Senate would be tested by their vote; and as he could not believe that the bill would be lost by retaining the section in question, he saw no reason for presenting it in a distinct form.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, in commenting upon the West Point Academy, read several documents relating to that establishment, its expenditures, arrangements, &c. The gentleman from Ohio knew better than Mr. S. the value of education in officers of the army; nor was he disposed to doubt that Major Wood had rendered that gentleman very important services in the defence of Fort Meigs. But he did not doubt that fort would have been defended even without the assistance of that officer. The gentleman mistook him in supposing that he believed ignorant men as capable of the performance of military enterprises as learned men. But it was not necessary to confine all the learning to the Military Academy. There were plenty of colleges in all parts of the country. Fifty cadets were sent out each year to act as engineers, and to fill vacancies in the army. Yet there was no fear of war. Who, said Mr. S., is to come and make war upon us? Will the Holy Alliance do it? They combined to put down certain principles in Europe, but they have never dared to interfere in the affairs of America; and it did not appear to him that any other power or combination would attempt it. It was well known that some of those West Point engineers, who were now crowding the army, and crowding the woods, received double pay for their services: one pay in the line and one in the woods, where they employed themselves in making what they term reconnoissances. In 1821 the army was reduced to its present form; and the President of the United States announced, in the year succeeding, that the organization had been found expedient, and its effects beneficial. Yet we go on to increase the officers, as if in contemplation of an extension of the army. An officer had told him (Mr. S.) that he was from Green Bay, and that there were a number of these engineers at that place, keeping out of the way, and doing nothing under heaven. [Mr. S. here read some further extracts from the documents, stating the course of studies, &c.] He wished to know what the West Point cadets had to do with the French and Spanish languages. He thought they were educated to be soldiers or engineers. His colleague looked upon science as all sufficient in naval officers. He did not deny that it was an advantage; but that was no reason why a midshipman should go from the ship to a college. It was not there that this education should be sought. Besides, it wanted different pursuits; and the science of the Navy must be taught at sea. It was not education alone that made a great commander. He wanted native talent and industry. There were innumerable instances which would prove this position. General Washington was only a decently good scholar: and, although Bonaparte was educated at the Military Academy of Brienne, his career could not be attributed to that cause; for he had displayed a military genius even in his infancy. And when, afterwards, he crossed the bridge of Lodi, at the head of a few followers, and planted his standard on the enemy's walls, he displayed the natural spirit and intrepidity of his mind. No studies at a Military Academy would ever have taught him the rule for performing that desperate action. He
